Mr. Rahv might register less comfort, and more concern, when he presents Randolph Bourne in 1913, finished with his studies at Columbia University and entering on the Grand Tour, as stopping briefly in England and then settling down more suitably at Paris, from which city he writes presently about the Sorbonne: "This splendid free university . . . makes Oxford look like a primary school, and even Columbia, which is incomparably superior to any British university, look like an expensive high school." We think of Bourne's youthfulness; but he was twenty-seven. So far as I know, it is precisely as distressing when a man declares an incomparable superiority for the Sorbonne or Columbia over Oxford as when he declares an incomparable superiority with the terms reversed. An intelligence whose sensibility was both wide and open could not declare it either way. Of course Mr.

Rahv is not so brash as that, but he is like Bourne in that he is not so good with sensibilities as with political ideas. But a civilization is largely made out of sensibilities. There are natural likings which it is not necessary for politics to denounce; there are free perceptions which it is not the business of politics to deny.

He gives us a letter by William James apropos of the Dreyfus affair, and a postscript which reads: "Damn it, America doesn't know the meaning of the word corruption compared with Europe." We like Mr. Rahv for relishing that sentiment. And in due chronological order we come to some discussion of the matter by Ernest Hemingway, taken from "For Whom the Bell Tolls." After much fighting in Spain Robert Jordan is wondering why he feels that the old purity of his participation seems to have been subtly corrupted. At first he thinks it is because he has been softened through self-indulgence—with fine food, with love—but soon he is reflecting upon the dirty tricks he has had to play as a soldier, and the lies and "political assassinations" that he has seen performed in the name of the good cause. It seems to be the final sense of Hemingway's hero—and I believe Mr. Rahv would share it in the last resort, as I do—that corruption comes not so much by softening oneself as by hardening oneself. The virtue of American politics, according to this principle would be in the fact that at least the great political figures have been innocent, maintaining their integrity as human beings, amateurs rather than professionals at politics, and even in office keeping the scruple of sensibility. Like wise it would be the virtue of the American electorate to sense this innocence, and rate it high in their official, as a kind of safeguard against trusting their business to liars and assassins.

PM's Views On Greek Relief

President Truman on March 12th requested from Congress a $400,000,000 appropriation "for assistance to Greece and Turkey" and—authority to send a detail of American civilian and military personnel to these countries "to assist in the tasks of reconstruction and for the purpose of supervising the use of such financial and material assistance as may be furnished."

PM's Editors believe that this is a definite step towards a New Struggle for World Power.

Here is PM's Formula for Handling the Situation in Greece

"First, give aid to the Greek people, but on conditions that the government be reformed to include the elements now unrepresented. To help such a government would not involve us in a struggle with Russia, yet it would give the stability in Greece which ought to be what we are seeking. There were some rumors, before the President's speech, that he would incorporate in it this condition. His failure to do so is an omission of first importance.

"Second, the aid we give the Greek people must be wholly economic, not at all military. It should include no military or training mission or war material, as the President proposes. Granted a change in the government, as proposed above, it would be possible to keep the aid wholly economic. For there would be no need for fighting a civil war to the bitter end.

"Our action in aiding Greece should be done under the UN, along with Britain and Russia, (to the extent that either can afford aid), and within the spirit of all our international commitments. It is hard to grow wrathful at Russian violations of that spirit and Russian interventionism when we make ourselves guilty of both."

ment. Reading it, one can readily see that the author tells only a small portion of what he knows. But what he does tell is damning, and even sensational. Budenz declares that the plot to murder Leon Trotsky was organized on American soil, and he even admits that he was used as an unwitting dupe in the organization of this plot. His revelations concerning the assassination of Trotsky are consistent with what is already known. Budenz also remarks that a leading member of the Communist Party, "H," declared to him that the Russian NKVD (the OGPU) had "liquidated" Julia Stuart Poyntz. She was a leading member of the American Communist Party and a known Russian agent. The late Carlo Tresca—himself mysteriously assassinated on the streets of New York—made the same charges some years ago before a federal grand jury. In addition to these revelations, Budenz describes the leaders of the American Communist Party as puppets and pawns who tremble before foreign agents. Critics of the Communist Party have long been aware that these men and women do not think for themselves: the revelations of Louis Budenz confirm what these critics have long maintained. When Earl Browder was deposed as the beloved leader of the party, nearly all his faithful followers confessed to being guilty of "Browderism," and then denounced him. Budenz includes a description of this scene in his book. It was one of the most debasing and shameful spectacles in contemporary American politics.

Louis Budenz left the Communist Party to return to the Roman Catholic church. He substituted one form of authoritarianism for another. Shortly after he joined the Communist Party, that organization advanced the slogan that communism is twentieth-century Americanism. Budenz's present views can be characterized as a mere variation of the same slogan. He now seems to think that Roman Catholicism is twentieth-century Americanism. He equates American democratic thinking with Catholicism. This is incorrect. The Constitution is a secular document. It contains no appeal to the Deity; on the contrary, its appeal is to the self-interest of men. Thus it must be described as a materialistic document. However, to Louis Budenz, the greatest evil facing the world today is that of "sinful" materialism. He also affirms the economic and moral principles laid down in papal encyclicals of the last half-century or so. These encyclicals advance the idea of the corporate state. In urging America to adopt the proposals of the popes, Budenz is really asking us to establish a corporate state.

After years in the Communist Party, Louis Budenz gives the impression of a man who has been humiliated but who is not humble. He associates his own reconversion with the conversions of St. Paul, St. Augustine, and John Henry Cardinal Newman. He is different from these men. When he writes to expose his old comrades in the Communist Party, his style is clear, direct, and reportorial: when he tries to convey his own emotions of reconversion, he indulges in pieties and banalities, and he seems to find it necessary to rely heavily on quotations. The Italian novelist, Ignazio Silone, once remarked that in a dictatorship men do not think; they quote. As a reborn Catholic enjoying his new state of grace, Budenz must use quotations to express his deepest feelings. As a Communist, he was a zealot and an authoritarian; he has not changed. He insists as strongly on conformity as do the American Communists. His change of mind and of heart is in reality a mere change of rigid dogmatism. His views are clerical, and he proposes an out-and-out Vatican political line for the American people.

Budenz also declares that he was aware of the methods of the Communist Party as far back as 1921. He admits that for almost the entire period that he was a party member he was aware of the control which foreign agents exerted over this party. He indicates that he had knowledge of the plot against Trotsky for about five years before he spoke out in public. Despite such knowledge, he was able to remain a leading Communist for many years. And he worked zealously for an alliance of his party and the church. Let his fellow-Catholics now remember that before he rejoined them he wanted to make them the allies of the NKVD.

This is a terrible book. It is always terrible to read of how men turn themselves into puppets. The fact that after he had passed the age of fifty he needed to write a confession such as this presents a striking lesson for all Americans. Here are some of the fruits of totalitarianism. And by its fruits one shall know it. Louis Budenz reveals, in an extreme form, the experiences of thousands all over the world who welcomed the Popular Front when it was laid down by Dmitrov in Moscow in 1935. Others feel as he does. Some of them have already talked, and others will talk. Budenz's book is not likely to be an exception. It should be studied for its symptomatic value and also for its revelations. At the same time it is essential to stress the fact that Louis Budenz is a man who has only a strait-jacket to offer his fellow-countrymen. If we accept his pious advice, we have nothing to lose but our dignity and freedom.

Infantilism and Steinbeck

THE WAYWARD BUS. By John Steinbeck. The Viking Press. $2.75.

FROM the popular practice of honoring the makers of half-truths in order to stay clear of whole ones probably no living writer has profited more than John Steinbeck; and probably as good a way as any to indicate the diseases of the time would be to analyze the particular combination of narrative skill and dishonesty of mind involved in this triumph. Of the most obvious aspect of the dishonesty a good deal has been said already, and more will be, for Steinbeck's various falsifications of the "lower depths" of this country—swinging from one social sentimentality to another that cancels it out, and back again—have to do with more than the faulty vision that shows up in any ten pages of "The Grapes of Wrath," however effective the tear-jerking of which he is a master. There is also a will to irresponsibility which is never missing in this author's work, though it takes many forms, literal idiocy and immersion in the Communist Party being only two of them, and in which lies the root of more political troubles than Steinbeck will ever dramatize. But there is another aspect of this infantilism, and of its appeal in some quarters, too, no doubt, that is not so easy to stop and that bears more directly on "The Wayward Bus." That is the question of sex and the relations between men and

STOP THIS MAD RUSH TO WAR!

"IT IS NOT A GREEK CRISIS THAT WE FACE, IT IS AN AMERICAN CRISIS. ONLY THE AMERICAN PEOPLE FULLY AROUSED AND PROMPTLY ACTING CAN PREVENT DISASTER."

—Henry A. Wallace

PRESIDENT TRUMAN has set America upon the road to World War III. The claim that the proposed $400,000,000 loan will be used to bolster Democracy in Greece and Turkey will not hold water. In the first place, neither Greece nor Turkey is a Democracy. Secretary of State Marshall, suggesting the minimum changes required in Greece, called for political amnesty, participation of all elements in the government, and a host of other reforms which make it abundantly clear that Greece today is NOT a democracy. Turkey is run by the same gang of reactionaries who all during the war made millions from the sale of chrome to the Nazis. American lives also paid for that chrome. To embrace Turkey now and call her a Democracy and offer her our millions and perhaps our sons is indeed a perversion of everything we fought for.

What Greece Needs

Greece, like most of Europe, needs a peaceful period of reconstruction and rehabilitation. Greece needs FOOD, CLOTHING, MEDICAL SUPPLIES, MACHINERY, and FARM EQUIPMENT. Greece needs to rid herself of the quislings who have been placed in power by British guns and who have made Greece a land of prisons and Isles of Exiles. And until a truly democratic, coalition government comes to power, Greece will continue to seethe with civil strife. Hunger, starvation, and misery will continue to be her lot, and all the money and all the young men that America will sacrifice will not bring one shred of Democracy to this unhappy land. On the contrary, American intervention will only strengthen the present fascist government of Greece in its determination to exterminate all opponents and will leave the people no choice but to continue the struggle.

The Danger to America and World Peace

There is talk of a crisis in Greece. But it is the whole world that is in crisis because of American foreign policy. Our concern for the tottering fascists of Greece broadened overnight to include the feudal rulers of Turkey. The warlords of China long ago received our blessings, our money, and more military equipment than China received during the war. It is clear that no government is too reactionary for us to support so long as it is anti-Russian. This can only fore-shadow a revival, on a vaster scale, of the anti-Comintern pact which resulted first in the destruction of Democracy in most of Europe and finally in the bloodiest slaughter in world history.

We Must Use the U. N.

Have we already forgotten the lessons of the war that we blithely by-pass and scuttle the United Nations Organizations? Why not refer the Greek situation to the U. N.? If Iran could be taken to the U. N. why not Greece? At this very moment a U. N. commission is investigating conditions in Greece. Why not await its findings? How do we justify this unilateral action . . . we who have always condemned it in others? There is no substitute for U. N. EXCEPT WAR.

The People Can Stop This Rush to War

Only an aroused people can stop this mad rush to war. Already there is hesitation in Congressional circles. All of us must speak up NOW. We must tell our President and our Congressmen that we are absolutely opposed to any loans to Greece until she has put her house in order—until democracy has been restored and all sections of the population are fully represented in the government, and until all political prisoners have been freed and all exiles returned from their barren Aegean purgatories. Then and only then should America help. For only then will she be helping democracy in Greece.

The Time Is Short

But there is little time left. Congress, afraid of an America awakened to the danger inherent in our present Greek policy, seeks to rush through the President's request for aid to Greek and Turkish reaction. They hope that by March 31st they can confront the people with a "fait accompli." Then it will be the old story. "We're in it now and we can't turn back." But we need not be "in it," if we but act quickly! An aroused public opinion, an America aware of the threat of war inherent in our present policy, can force the Administration and Congress to place the issue of Greece on the agenda of the United Nations Organization.

Funds Needed

Reaching the public with the facts is a very expensive undertaking. Newspaper advertising, mailings, public meetings, forums, speakers—all require a great deal of money. But no cause is more worthy. It is an investment in Democracy, an investment in the peace of the world. Our organization, American Council for a Democratic Greece, has carried on a continued educational campaign on the importance of Greece to world peace. We have sought to bring the truth about Greece to the American people. We have always advocated aid to the democratic people of Greece. We need funds to carry on our work. A stroke of your pen will mean a great deal. Make checks payable to:

women in general, and it is relevant because the only conceivable purpose of this otherwise trite and meaningless book is to express an eruption of sexual interest so crude and obsessive as nearly to swamp even the technical talent that Steinbeck has usually had at his command.

This seems surprising only because the nature of his subjects until now has drawn attention chiefly to his social meanings, such as they are, and somewhat obscured the much deeper escapism in his treatment of adult human relations. But the process is embarrassingly clear, even to the glorification of the mother. His other women are the merest sex objects, usually rather comical and the stupider the better; and when he speaks of "love" he is referring to an association of men, at least two of his books being quite literal fantasies of escape into a world without women, that is, a world without the main component of adult responsibility. This was the childish charm of "Tortilla Flat" as well as the basic distortion in "Of Mice and Men," in which he made it quite plain that he was not even retreating into homosexuality but was simply abandoning the problem of sex as an integral part of life altogether. It is a separate, biological matter, so desperately kept apart from Steinbeck's thoughts of human beings in general that if women are capable of any personality or intelligence aside from bed and motherhood, no one would know it from his books, as witness the young moron who passes for a woman, and even an admirable one, among the male Communist heroes of "In Dubious Battle"; and even she is kept apart by having just had a baby. It is also suggestive that a writer so concerned with social injustice should never, as far as I can remember, have spoken of prostitution as anything but amusing.

All this adds up to one of the commonest, and saddest, maladies of the time, and it expresses itself in "The Wayward Bus" in a fashion that will be equally recognizable, especially to anyone who has ever traveled in a club car. This time the social implications, if there are any, are lost in the hay; the contrivance of throwing an assortment of characters together in a public vehicle has an air of being a stock one even if it is not, the characters have the same air and are, and the only overt motivation of the whole business is to show, as the blurb says and with no more irony than we all have our heartaches, etc. But the real purpose is to lead up to the moment toward the end when the bus breaks down on a lonely mountain road and all its occupants except one old man who is having a stroke can scamper or be dragged off into the bushes. It is a story of sexual polarity, the two main forces in which are a kind-hearted "cookie" named Camille, who causes all men to lick their lips and say "Whew!" and who makes her living sitting in large wineglasses at stag conventions, and the half-Mexican bus-driver Juan representing what is perhaps the noblest effort Steinbeck has ever made to create a grown-up man. But he is spoiled, too, by being paired off in the crisis with a stereotyped college girl, who fell "swollen and itchy" at her first sight of him, and who when she feels sexually rebuffed says to herself, "Basket-ball . . . that's the stuff"; so that the D. H. Lawrence episode we have been led up to through 200 pages turns out to have more the quality of peanut brittle. Other figures in the parade are an unattractive waitress dreaming of all things, of Clark Gable; an adolescent youth with acne, called Pimples; a well-off business man borrowed whole from Sinclair Lewis—"Wherever he went he was not one man but a unit in a corporation, a unit in a club, in a lodge, in a church, in a political party"—and his wife, who provides what ought to become some kind of classic among writings on the female mind: "Bernice too could draw a magic circle around herself, with motherhood, or, say, menstruation, a subject like that and no man could or would try to get in."

This extraordinary performance is by the man who is reported to be one of the two or three modern American writers most highly regarded in Europe and Russia, and who has been praised at length by some of the most astute critics in France. It is also a current Book-of-the-Month Club selection; if it were not, at least if it were not by Steinbeck, it is doubtful whether anyone would have reviewed it. And yet though its cheapness is easier to see, not being hidden behind picturesque personalities or a righteous cause, essentially it is of a piece with the rest of his work, and ht to inspire a little sober question-of the nature of the author's popu-

y. For the reputation he enjoys in ope, aside from the French respect some of the technical equipment he res with and may have learned from ningway, there are presumably some ra-literary reasons such as curiosity ut American life, because, unlike oyan, Steinbeck has known how to ce the most of his California sur-undings. To some extent the same osity probably operates here. But it not on those grounds that he is most russed, and this latest book makes wonder again whether the Stein-k phenomenon may not represent ve all an increasing yearning in peoto be either morally incapacitated what amounts to the same thing,

ELLEY: A LIFE STORY. By Edmund
Blunden. The Viking Press, $3.75.

NOW that Shelley has been mocked, lamented, and vilified, now that life has been academically explored
Newman Ivey White and then, again, te microscopically, by Robert Met-f Smith, with opposite conclusions, re would seem to be small room for Blunden even if he has tempered scholarship to the "general reader."

we have, for the moment, exhausted Shelley biography. The "general der" will probably still wish to think Shelley as Ariel; the literary hisians will still rely on White or ith, according to their persuasions.
As a life of Shelley we could hope little from Blunden's book. As icism we could hope for everything.
nd we get nothing, or almost nothing, ond a sensitive and reliable comment

Shelley's literary affiliations. In a orous sense all the Shelley criticism still to write.

Here and there Blunden enlarges our erpretations—when, for example, he phasizes Shelley's wit and suggests at the caprice and illusion of "Protheus Unbound" and "The Witch of las" are operative. There are, however, tortions: he dislikes Godwin too ch or else does not understand him.
ere is also too much Victorian ap-eciation—Shelley's "dearest adventure was simply watching the changing and eternal heavens above him, their gathering thunderstorms, their delicate gossamer clouds, . . ." and so on.

The pity is that Blunden has missed his opportunity, critically, for the poetic problem in Shelley is inseparable from the biography. It is nothing less than Art and Neurosis or Art and Society.

Except for Mario Praz critics have not been much concerned with the romantic agony, its confusion of impulse, its ambiguities and paradoxes. For Shelley the delight in sorrow, the "shadow of the pleasure which exists in pain," is sweeter than pleasure itself. Hence open those abysses in the soul, those ambivalences that paralyzed Schopen-hauer and drove a frantic Nietzsche, later, to transvalue all values. Read believes that the separateness of Shelley is really an integrity of personality.

Blunden is not deceived as to Shelley's integrity, though he does no more than describe his "many-sided" temperament.
The many-sided temperament is a fissure within the romantic world-view. Shelley creates, like Schopenhauer, his own

world as a projection of his ideas and his will. For Schopenhauer the world "is there only as idea," an extension of our consciousness. Since consciousness is will, it is also there as an extension, a mirror, of our own urgencies. Further, the activity of the will is from suffering to suffering, for "the basis of all willing is need, deficiency, and thus pain"; and the fulfilment of the will is satiety or despair—like the frustration in those unbidden chants issuing from Shelley's incandescent mind. What began as Shelley's dilemma of will and idea was resolved in Carlyle and Nietzsche as a mystique of violence.

The narrower, more literary problem in Shelley is the paradox of pleasure in sorrow, Wellschmerz, the desire to surrender without the ability to do so, the vision that is pain, the attainment that is ennui, the pursuit that is escape. Ecstasy and death, triumph and defeat—that is the agony upon which Shelley endlessly improvises in his life and in his verse. Prometheus suffers and defies; his Byronic insolence, through a feat of pity, forgiving wrongs darker than death or night, makes the world anew by a submission that is no submission at all. In "Adonais" Shelley presents himself as a Power girt round with weakness. Beneath the affirmation of an awful Beauty is the terrible fear that even the poetic triumph of the dead Keats did not allay:

Whence are we, and why are we?
of what scene

The actors or spectators?

Similarly in "Alastor" the attainment of the ideal is defeat, death—the poet is hounded to destruction by the vision for which he quests. Thus Life becomes Death, Pursuit becomes Flight, and Vision ends in Annihilation. Out of disillusion springs the wildest assertion, in which will is only desperate wish. Blunden does not speculate upon the final line of Shelley's final poem, the inescapable riddle: "Then, What is life? I cried." Behind the painted veil, the many-colored glass, lurk Fear and Hope, Shelley's twin destinies. The high Promethean triumph is the vision created by Hope from the wreck of what it contemplates. The achievement is not stoicism but idealism, not attainment but perpetual quest and reaffirmation of illusion.

Throughout Shelley's illuminations the veiled maid, his most obsessive symbol of the Ideal, is a figment of the will. The vision was never realized in woman herself—Harriet, Mary, Claire, Emily; and thus Shelley was cruel. Blunden notes Harriet's verdict: "This is a vampire." Shelley's special hypocrisy—dividing him from Blake, a visionary who scorned the curtain of flesh over the bed of desire—is his self-deception in his sexual impulses. Always in Shelley Venus Pandemos—she of Eros—is disguised as the pure Uranian Venus.

The rapture of "Epipsychidion" is death, too: "I pant, I sink, I tremble, I expire." Read has diagnosed the malady as narcissism. Undeniably Shelley's intensest Platonic vision is orgastic, both possession and surrender.

The fierce luminism of Shelley's imagery is also rapture and death, the flame before extinction; for life is light and death is dark. "A Vision of the Sea" is for Blunden an "inedited conception of the terrible." It is more—a burning chaos, like the conflagrations of Turner, of the impulses to life and to death; the inedited Shelley was savage a voyant as Rimbaud. As he lies in the agony of his neurosis among the Euganean Hills, senseless and cold when the "solid darkness black" closes over him, the sun springs up within chasm of light and flames over Venice at once in Shelley mounts the brilliant vitality that is pain, and then as the illumination is withdrawn, the blackness of defeat. (Ruskin knew the same vocation, the infuriating radiance and then the night, the will to renounce; in very prose is luminist.) Shelley's Platonism was never authentic; his idealism was never more than an instant of vision when intellectual beauty fell momentarily on him as he shrieked and clapped his hands in ecstasy. For the instant the will was imposed on a world consumed within his madness. But the triumph was defeat, for the brightness was transitory and could not insure to onw life either calm or liberation from the real world's dark slavery. The vision at once compensation and alienation. The Blunden record includes Shelley's letter to Godwin: "My father has regarded me as a blot, a defilement of his honor." One thinks of Kafka; in Kafka this alienation was acceptance of profound and final guilt. In Shelley it was intolerable revelation, then, immediately, exhaustion and a sense of inadequacy—"kindled he was, and blasted."

If art is neurosis, then in successful art, William Barrett has argued, the writer displaces his neurosis far away and incorporates larger and larger areas of reality within it until a triumph of adjustment occurs in the imagination. But when the world idea, this displacement is not achieved; the imaginative triumph is only another evasion, a further removal from reality. Blunden has submitted considerable evidence that Shelley might have belonged to the intelligentsia, the writers who correlate social with intellectual evolution. When Shelley visited the Groves, he wrote in disgust, "I now with people who, strange to me, never think." One of his own thoughts was that "vile as aristocracy is, commerce is more contemptible." Yet, Blunden admits, his revolt bears marks of aristocracy. With a place to stand on, Shelley might have moved society. He had no such place. He v intellectual disinherited because he understood the social problem only fitly, illuded as he was by his Platonic version of Godwinism. With sad pathos Hazlitt called him a philosophic madman. His art was deprived of its triumph because he was unable to incorporate large areas of reality within Simply because to him the world is as he is not, like Blake, the Aristotelian social man. His vision is not political. Shelley's revolution—as in "Prometheus Unbound"—occurs by a change of mind; when man is redeemed from his delusions and becomes "an agent of pure emotion," tyranny is conquered and the state of nature is instituted. In Nietzsche values are unvalued by force; in Shelley by ease.

The close of "Prometheus," Shelley's ultimate social vision, establishes man as scepterless, uncircumscribed, king over himself. This sounds like Freudian operation, or the stoicism of Bertrand Russell, who sees the free man defiant of the forces that rule his outward life and sustaining alone a private world at his own ideals have fabricated. The difference is that in Shelley's case the outward world, the reality principle, the trampling march of power, never existed. Shelley never accepted Godwin's determinism, the "immense and uninterrupted chain of causes and effects." He neo-Platonically transformed the mechanical atoms—necessity—into "the Universal Spirit," a benign pantheism.

The romantic paradox has nowhere been more injurious than in Shelley, and we welcome Blunden's generosity toward him. He was not of the intelligentsia; he was not a revolutionary. He was calamitously estranged—the atonic bohemian. His political failure was, initially, a failure in imagination. In his "Defense of Poetry" he wrote that poetry is the expression of imagination, that the good man will imagine intensely, that he will "put himself in the place of another and of any others." By this definition the poetic imagination will perform a displacement into reality, a submission to necessity. Through this detachment, his comprehension, Shelley might have left his Byronic-Platonic world of will and idea. In verses like "The Masque of Anarchy"—his protest against the Peterloo massacre—Shelley in his wrath at social injustice becomes the political man. But he is not the poet because his neurosis—what is most personal to him—has not displaced itself into the world, and is only indirectly involved. There is reference to reality instead of an appropriation of reality; the triumph of "The Masque of Anarchy" is political, not imaginative. In 1821, at last—shortly before he was drowned—Shelley seems to have understood, by a conversion resembling Wordsworth's "Ode to Duty," that his imagination must, in humility, incorporate larger areas from the real world, that he must establish himself

Of hopes and fears . . .

Too late, his political imagination finally rose up against the idealist-immoralist who had made madness beautiful.

WILLIAM McCLEERY, the author of "Parlor Story" (Biltmore Theater), will probably never know why he hasn't a smash hit on his hands. What, he must be asking himself, did "State of the Union" and "Dear Ruth" have that I haven't got?

One answer might possibly be: precious little—and that is the trouble. Half of "Parlor Story" is a bit too much like the first of these hits and the other half a bit too much like the second. But that answer, though neat, would be more convincing if audiences were not rather more prone to like than to resent the comfortable discovery that they know in a general way what they are in for, and I am afraid the limit of my helpfulness will have been reached when I assure Mr. McCleery that the answer, if he ever discovers it, will be found to have something to do with the show business rather than with either art or intelligence.

We like to think that contemporary playwrighting operates on a somewhat higher level than it did in the days when Eugene Walter confessed that it was essentially a trade and when the maxim "Plays are not written but rewritten" was supposed to sum up the attitude of a skilful practitioner. Sometimes, more often, I think, than thirty or forty years ago, it does actually operate on that higher level. A man with something to say and merely a reasonably competent way of saying it has at least a chance. But the fact remains that so far as the run-of-the-mill comedy or drama is concerned the difference between a smash hit and "what closes Saturday night" is determined, nine times out of ten, by the success or failure of the author or his director to exhibit some slick shrewdness which is so far from being important from any other standpoint and so largely a matter

"A classic in its field."

CAPITALISM SOCIALISM AND DEMOCRACY

Revised Edition by

Joseph A. Schumpeter

"Easily the outstanding book in its field. . . This is genuine scholarship and real political economy brought to bear on a mare's nest of ideologies and political slogan thinking camouflaged as 'economics.'"

"The new material, which covers the Second World War and its aftermath is easily the most pungent bit of writing as the Soviets and their policies that I have seen in print anywhere. It is strong medicine, but that is a tribute to the author and publisher."

of the mode of the moment that I doubt it will still be detectable ten years from now, when, to return to our previous example, the difference between "State of the Union" and "Parlor Story" will have ceased to exist. I am told, and I take it on faith, that a really skilful milliner can, by the mere touch of a finger here and there, make all the difference between a hat for which an ultra-fashionable woman would pay a hundred dollars and one which she would not wear to a dog fight or a parent-teachers' meeting. The difference between a smash hit and a failure is often of the same order.

"Parlor Story" is concerned with a professor of journalism who finds himself in the middle of a political intrigue when he is proposed as candidate for the presidency of his Midwestern university. Most reviewers complained that there was rather too much of this plot, which really means, of course, that it was too obviously contrived. But "State of the Union" has a plot which could hardly be less inevitable or more deliberately pushed around in just the directions its authors have decided it ought to go. Both plays try to buoy themselves up with smart dialogue, and there is, so it seems to me, rather more spontaneity in "Parlor Story" than in the smash hit. Indeed, as most of the reviewers noted, there is a good deal of warmth and charm as well as humor in the conversation which Mr. McCleery has written and which Walter Abel, especially, speaks with informal ease. There is nothing exactly new in the sub-plot, involving the elder of the professor's two adolescent daughters and the love affair of one of them with the editor of the college paper whose editorial against that outworn institution called marriage gives the professor's enemies their talking point. But it is quite an ingratiating family, and it doesn't seem fair that by lacking so little a play and a production should, on Broadway, lose everything.

At the Century Theater "The Chocolate Soldier" gets a lavish, well-sung, and beautifully costumed revival in a version which has been subject to no very drastic modernization. It is due, I think, for a successful run but also pretty certain to be the subject of violent disagreement between those to whom it seems delightfully quaint and those to whom it is merely old-fashioned enough to be thoroughly tiresome. Despite the fact that the librettist took a

Shaw play as his starting-point, he managed to fashion out of it a book which follows with positively Byzantine fidelity every tradition of the romantic operetta, and he constructed the action around the four inevitable dramatis personae—hero, heroine, soubrette, and comic—whose types are as fixed as those in a Punch and Judy show. The composer adhered with the same fanatical piety to the established formula, and having first written the big waltz song to be introduced in the first act and then having dutifully arranged to bring it in as a réprise at the end of the second, where it always comes, he felt himself relieved of the responsibility of doing more than providing listenable but forgettable melodies to be scattered here and there. In the present production Frances McCann and Keith Andes sing very agreeably the romantic leads, which they act with a certain degree of stiffness, and Billy Gilbert plays the comic with a good mastery of the absolutely standard technique. Since we are inclined—perhaps often with reason—to regret the good old days, it may be worth while to point out that there is five times the invention in one act of "Oklahoma!" that there is in the whole of "The Chocolate Soldier," but I

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IT IS not a lack of proper respect for musical scholarship that has produced my occasional unfavorable comments on the operations of the German musicologists in our midst, but a proper lack of respect for the poor quality and the misuses of their scholarship. This column's favorite correspondent is at present satisfying a desire for factual knowledge with which he is and will be able, on suitable occasions, to document or amplify the judgments of a first-rate critic. That is all right; what is wrong is the fact-grubbing of people for whom this is a substitute for the esthetic response to music they are incapable of, and who then claim a validity and importance for their "objective" facts which they deny to "merely subjective" judgments of value.

My correspondent passes on to me the results of his researches when he thinks they will interest or amuse me. And the following item gave me the pleasure he expected:

On p. 829 of his magnum opus ["Music in Western Civilization"] Herr Professor Doktor Lang informs us that Auber's "La Muette de Portici" (1828) founded the French grand opera—which may or may not be true, but which is a statement often found in music histories. On the same page he also says Auber's opera was a success. But on p. 832, when he gets to Meyerbeer's "Robert Le Diable," he tells us that "the modest beginnings of 'La Muette' had been forgotten." This is absurd on the face of it; a successful opera just isn't forgotten in three years. I looked up "La Muette" in Lajerte's "Bibliothèque Musicale du Théâtre de l'Opéra" (vol. 2, p. 130) and found that up to 1876 it had had, in fact, 471 performances, and had not been out of the repertory between 1828 and 1852. Lang could have looked also; but nobody except an unthinking fool would have made the statement he did in any event.

That could stand as the complete and sufficient comment on the equipment, methods, and achievements of the man who at Harvard University's symposium on music criticism presumably will repeat his denunciation of the ignorance of musical journalists and his demand that newspapers remedy this by opening their columns to musical scholars.

But I wish there were space to supplement it with a detailed description of another performance of the Herr Professor Doktor—his review of the fourth volume of Ernest Newman's "Life of Richard Wagner" in the July 1946 issue of the Musical Quarterly, and in particular his method of dealing with the "Bombastes Furioso" appendix. The appendix is concerned with a paragraph from Carl Engel's review of the third volume, and is largely a demonstration that this paragraph about "the royal patient" reveals Engel's ignorance of the published evidence that the doctors who certified King Ludwig's insanity had never even "been in his presence, exchanged a single word with him." Lang omits Engel's paragraph and Newman's discussion of it; instead he states falsely that Newman "rehabilitates the King, pronounces him hale and hearty" (as well as correctly that Newman pronounces the King "the victim of unscrupulous politicians"), and answers this with evidence of the King's insanity. I don't need to say what would happen to a physicist or a geneticist who, writing in a scientific journal about someone's report on a piece of work, suppressed the essential part of the material he was supposedly discussing and misrepresented the rest. Nor do I have to add that nothing of the sort has happened to Lang for doing this with Newman's appendix. On the contrary, he has been given a column in the Saturday Review of Literature, where—after having screamed once against the type of music criticism concerned with "the amorous adventures of singers and virtuosi" which "in our day . . . appears in so-called biographies (cf. Ernest Newman's 'Liszt')"—he recently published a vulgar account of Liszt's amorous adventures.

Another letter from my correspondent brought me the news of his discovery of a French musicologist who "beats the Germans on their own ground—thoroughness and accuracy—and in addition has an obvious flair for, and love of, music; and being a Frenchman he writes a prose that reads like a sane language and always makes good sense. His name is Lionel de la Laurencie; he wrote the article in Lavignac on 'La Musique française de Lulli à Gluck,' and his great work is a history of the seventeenth and eighteenth century French school of violinists." By now my correspondent was certain that

"French musical scholars are as good as the Germans or better, and have been passed over simply because the Germans have all been blowing their horns like mad for the last fifty years while the French have been backward in the fine art of self-advertising."

This was only one of his comments on the bias of the Germans in favor of their own achievements in music, and the way they have imposed it on our musical life—which I too have been made aware of. A couple of years ago, discussing Dr. Willi Apel's Harvard Dictionary of Music, which I said was the only good book the German scholars had given us, I mentioned the bibliographies in it that referred mostly to obscure and inaccessible German publications, and the article on music criticism—a shockingly sloppy and shoddy job of scholarship in the assembling of its factual material—in which Dr. Hugo Leichentritt held that "Eduard Hanslick, who wrote from 1864 for the Neue Frei Presse (Vienna), may justly be called the father of musical journalism"—in disregard of Berlioz's writing in the Paris Journal des Débats from 1835 to 1863. A few weeks ago I happened to look up the article on conducting, and discovered that Dr. Archibald T. Davison had added a few English and American treatises to Wagner's and Weingartner's in the bibliography, but not Berlioz's. And I also found that the editor had added to the entirely German bibliography of the article on the concerto only the worthless book by Veinus—omitting Tovey's great monograph in "Essays in Musical Analysis" and the well-known French book by Girdlestone.

The Shape of Things

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IS TECHNICALLY responsible for violations of the Safety Code that led to the tragic mine disaster at Centralia, Illinois, since this is among the properties seized last year. That being so, and because there is good reason to believe that recommendations made by Mines Department inspectors are often ignored, we hope that the Committee of Inquiry will be rigorous and thoroughly unbiased in its work. However, if Senatorial speeches are any guide, there was rather more political opportunism than human sympathy in the demand for an inquiry. Senator Brooks's failure to refer to the conduct of state and company officials clearly showed that his indignation had also the object of discrediting Secretary Krug and past and present Democratic Administrations. Hardly less demagogic, and certainly no more effective, was John L. Lewis's decree of a week's work stoppage in the soft-coal industry. It seems to us that it would have been just as dramatic if the nation's coal miners had been asked to contribute a day's pay to the survivors of the 111 victims, rather than forego a week's pay with no one the gainer. We hope, in any event, that these grandstand plays will not divert attention from the real source of responsibility. The Centralia operators had twice ignored recommendations of mine inspectors, and more than a year has passed since Local 52 of the United Mine Workers first appealed to Governor Green of Illinois to compel the owners to put their pits in safe condition. A country that has exercised itself so strenuously to check the irresponsibility of Mr. Lewis can do no less than demand safeguards for his hard-working followers.

THE HUTCHINS COMMISSION ON FREEDOM of the press, like many another prober of that institution, has found that it is easier to say what is wrong with the press than to suggest a sure-fire cure. In other industries in which technological progress has encouraged concentration of ownership, we may prescribe government regulation or, in special cases, nationalization. But few of the many people who feel that freedom of the press is inadequately provided for now would wish to see the entry of government into the field, and even public regulation is a tool to be handled with extreme care. The commission recognized this fact by including in its recommendations only one suggestion for legislative action—a law which would supplement the present remedy for libel by giving an injured party the right to obtain "a retraction or a restatement of the facts by the offender, or an opportunity to reply." In regard to the decline of competition in the communications industry generally—the commission has covered radio, movies, magazines, and books as well as newspapers—there is a recommendation that "the government maintain competition among large units through the anti-trust laws but that those laws be sparingly used to break up such units." Put into concrete terms, which the report of the commission, an academic body, studiously avoids, this means presumably that the action of the Department of Justice in attacking the exclusiveness of the Associated Press is approved, but that any attempt to separate the links in a newspaper chain, like the Scripps-Howard press, would be regarded as dangerous. Yet, of all monopolies, those in the field of communications are the most dangerous. With due respect to the commission, we feel that the time has come to curb those horizontal combines which gather into one hand the production of newsprint. For newsprint is the raw material of press freedom, newspaper publication, and the operation of radio stations.

THE COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM IS hurt. It feels that The Nation and other interested outsiders who assumed that William Shirer was displaced from his famous 5:45 Sunday "spot" because of his liberal views have been unfair to the company. To a deputization of citizens who questioned him about the change, William S. Paley, president of CBS, insisted that the company acted on the basis of an "editorial decision" which had nothing to do with Mr. Shirer's opinions or with the action of the sponsor. We cannot prove the contrary and are willing to believe that, in spite of Shirer's high Hooper rating among news analysts, the management may have had uncommercial, non-political reasons to shift him. But we'll wager that if the Williams shaving-cream company, sponsoring the program, had renewed its contract with Mr. Shirer, he would have been retained by CBS. The fact that cannot be ducked by the broadcasting company is the neat coincidence in time between the action by the sponsor and its own. If its decision had been made strictly on an editorial basis, it would have told Mr. Shirer directly about it and not waited for the Williams people to break the news. Through its own unfortunate acts, CBS has generated suspicion of its motives from here to Moscow, and its great public has been deprived of Shirer's insight and immense knowledge. We shall wait with impatience to learn on what station he will be heard from now on.

BY CASTING THE DECISIVE VOTE FOR THE Lateran Treaty of 1929 the Italian Communists have written that relic of medievalism into the constitution of the Italian Republic. What has been gained by this bewildering move is difficult even to imagine. No one supposes, least of all the Vatican, that a Communist government would continue to tax the Italian people for the payment of clerical salaries or that it would sanction compulsory religious education in public schools. The Holy See will therefore not abandon its implacable hostility to communism, or for that matter to any other form of socialism. It may also be doubted whether the turn-about will win any large number of votes for the Communist Party at the October elections, although Mr. del Vayo's analysis on page 388 suggests that this must have been one of its chief objectives. Signor Togliatti has vehemently denied any such political motive. But if we are to believe him, what is the explanation? Why have the Communists gone out of their way to strengthen their mortal enemy?

THE BEST ANSWER WOULD APPEAR TO BE that the maneuver was partly based upon a tactical estimate of the situation in Italy and of that country's place in the world. It can be argued that at present the left-wing parties cannot offer the peasantry the economic inducements that would be necessary to win them away from the church's political control and that the eventual showdown is best postponed. By voting for the Lateran treaty, the Communists may also have hoped to prevent Italy from falling under the influence of the United States during the present crusade against communism. The view is not without a degree of realism, for had the Communists not broken the anti-clerical front in the Assembly it is possible that the De Gasperi Cabinet would have fallen, to be followed by one from which the left parties would have been excluded. If these were Signor Togliatti's reasons, the most that can be said for them is that they are plausible. The damaging sacrifice of principle was unnecessary, for since the right-wing parties do not wish at present to force a division of Italy into two clear-cut factions, the debate might have been indefinitely postponed with no danger to Italy's independence. The important fact is that having gained one of their most dearly prized objectives the Italian right has been strengthened, while a new source of confusion has been introduced into the left.

THE APPOINTMENT OF JERRY VOORHIS AS executive secretary of the Cooperative League places a good man in a good job. The former California Congressman had already rendered service to farm cooperatives during his term on the House Committee on Agriculture. Now he will fight in the front office, as he once fought in committee chambers, for the interests of the two and a half million families who have linked efforts in the cooperative supplying of foodstuffs, petroleum products, insurance, housing, and medical facilities. And the interests of co-op members are the interests of all of us—peace, welfare, security. Pointing to the astonishing achievements of cooperatives in their newest and most exciting venture, the production and international distribution of cooperative oil, Voorhis told a Canadian audience last week that oil might some day "become a river of peace instead of a sleek road to war." It is not too far-fetched an aspiration, and Voorhis is the proper person to voice it. Twice voted by Washington correspondents as the most sincere and one of the most useful members of Congress, he will, happily, be no less useful now that he has lost his legislative seat.

Best Foot Forward

IT IS fairly apparent that the Truman Doctrine is about to be put into practice. The new Mediterranean outposts of American security are to be manned by American dollars and Greek and Turkish mercenaries. The United States is taking over England's time-honored role of trying to keep Russia away from the Dardanelles; and $400,000,000 is the down payment on an incalculable bill the American taxpayer, for years to come, will be asked to foot.

America has entered the school of imperialism and is showing remarkable aptitude in its early lessons. As a first recitation it was required to restate an imperial purpose in terms of a world mission. This, Senator Austin managed to do with great aplomb and even erudition at the United Nations Security Council last Friday. Of an action that quite evidently had bypassed the United Nations, the Senator was able to say with impressive conviction, "The United States is giving momentum to the United Nations by its present policy and welcomes corresponding interest and support from other members of the United Nations." Sir Alexander Cadogan was observed to give an envious side glance at the Senator at this point of his presentation.

United States intervention in Greece and Turkey with the activities of the United Nations commission now investigating the unpleasantness on Greece's northern borders. "Neither action would be of much effect if taken without the other, for these are complementary, not conflicting proposals—one to watch areas where actual disturbances occur—the other to strengthen Greece sufficiently to maintain internal order, and to restore to her people hope and confidence in their future as a free people." The United Nations was not equipped for emergency measures: hence the United States had to act quickly on Greece's cry for help. But the United Nations was well-suited for programs with long-term objectives—FAO, Economic Commission for Europe, etc.—and in carrying out these could, of course, count on the full support of the United States. (Members were expected to forget that the United States had jettisoned UNRRA almost single-handed, sabotaged the food program of FAO, delayed the World Bank, blown hot and cold on the International Refugee Organization, and was still undecided at the Congressional level whether to go back to Hoover tariffs or on to the World Trade Organization!)

Turkey was awkwardly dragged in as just another fine upstanding young country, badly in need of a helping hand. No mention was made of military assistance, no reference to the strategic core of the project, and only an echo of President Truman's heroic challenge that in "the present moment of world history nearly every nation must choose between alternative ways of life," the "free peoples" on one side, the "totalitarian regimes" on the other.

Now, it is worth while considering what the United Nations could have done to help Greece in its present extremity. Could it have given emergency aid? Here it should be noted that the "emergency" is not something that had suddenly been brought to the notice of the United States on March 3. It was reported by UNRRA representatives, by the FAO investigators, and by the subcommissions of the Economic and Social Council while preparing the data for their reports recommending an Economic Commission for Europe as long ago as last September. The situation is worse now. But it is worse because we refused to lift a hand to provide for the continuation of the work of international relief after the date UNRRA was scheduled to terminate. We had the facts, we had the personnel available. What we lacked was the will to put an emergency program into action. Why? The answer is plainly that the Administration was intimidated by the fear of rising Congressional reaction, and lacked international imagination. It would not risk its political neck by giving world leadership to a plan of international economic rehabilitation which, had Roosevelt lived, would certainly have been carried out. Even at this late date it is possible for the American government to bring its entire emergency program of relief—economic, advisory, and technical—under the direct supervision of United Nations agencies and special missions. And we hope that in next Monday's debate Senator Austin's colleagues on the Security Council will press for just this course of action.

In the second place, could the United Nations carry out a long-term program of economic rehabilitation that would help Greece onto its feet and put a floor under those of her citizens working for the rebuilding of Greece's democracy? The answer is plain: the plans for such programs are already made. But more than Senator Austin's glib assurances are needed to persuade us they will be put into effect. Some of those plans called for emergency efforts which will now be carried out independently by the United States. Nor are we quite satisfied with the Senator's statement that the present United States' measures are of an "emergency and temporary character." Unless we've entirely misjudged the scope of the new American foreign policy, the United States will find it increasingly difficult to extricate itself and the United Nations will find it increasingly difficult to "muscle in." And we've set a precedent for "emergency action" of which other nations have, no doubt, taken full note.

Finally, we may ask, could the United Nations have acted to guard Greece's national integrity against outside aggression and internal subversion? To the first part of the question, yes, it is already acting. The Security Council's commission is now on Greece's northern borders. It will soon be presenting its report—or reports. Senator Austin has kindly pointed out to them that they might propose "a system of border control regulations and a continuing commission made up of representatives of the Security Council." Russia might veto such a proposal but, in so doing, would clearly put itself in the wrong. Had we rested our case firmly on the Security Council decision, in terms of the Charter, we should have been in a vastly stronger moral position to take any independent action should the occasion arise at a later date.

One of the tragic results of our action has been that we have lost the respect of many nations who know their whole security rests on the strengthening of the United Nations. We have weakened the United Nations. And we have weakened the cause of European democracy to which we have been giving such voluble lip service. In supporting the reaction regimes of Greece and Turkey, we have brought those regimes a temporary stability, perhaps, but have made more inevitable the final struggle between those extremes of right and left with which American democracy has nothing in common. But American democracy has much in common with the struggle of the common people of Europe, whether in Greece or Yugoslavia, to lead a secure and free life. To those aims, the United Nations is committed, and if they are not realized we, more than any single nation, will be to blame.

Liberals Beware!

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

IN THESE days people who have lived long enough feel as if they had suddenly been transported back to 1919 and 1920 when A. Mitchell Palmer was protecting American institutions from the aggressions of the reds. The period after World War I was marked by hysteria, repression, and the start of a federal police system which has survived to this hour in the shape of J. Edgar Hoover's FBI. Before the fever dropped, along in the early twenties, the country was subjected to a legal reign of terror that broke the strength of the progressive forces for a grim ten-year stretch. It was not until economic collapse had discredited the Republican Party even in the eyes of its own followers that the people gained enough courage and cohesion to reassert their political will.

One week soon, The Nation is going to publish a brief history of that historic red-hunt. It is important to recall at this critical time the ugly weapons which American reaction turned against all groups that advocated a decent peace in Europe and a better life over here. Today, two years after the end of World War II, the hunt is on again, and the prospect of an early return to sanity is poor. Not only are the Republicans, in control of Congress, set for a quick kill, but Democratic members of all shades seem eager only to beat their opponents to the draw. And whereas in the early twenties right-wing panic was generated by a new-born revolution struggling to establish itself in a vast and turbulent country, today our statesmen, peering out from under their roll-top desks, see communism full-grown, armed to the teeth, and making unfriendly gestures and clanking noises.

Still worse, the liberal and progressive forces in 1947 are badly demoralized. Fear of Russia has become an obsession in groups which a generation ago had a more solid faith in the country's capacity to remain both democratic and free. The liberals of the post-Wilson era fought well against nationalistic panic and reactionary fury; they lost, but at least they resisted. Today an alarming percentage of liberals are either taking to cover or digging up reasons to believe that the Truman purge order, the inquisition now going on in the House Committee on Un-American Activities, and the rash of repressive legislation before Congress, are merely signs of a healthy resistance to communism.

The threat of communism in this country is insignificant; while the threat of reaction is explicit in the Washington red-hunt and implicit in Mr. Truman's new foreign policy. However provocative Russia may be, however infuriating the obstructive maneuvers of the American Communists, liberals know, or should know, that it is only in countries sunk in economic misery, like Greece, where hunger and idleness conspire with injustice, that communism wins the support of the democratic masses. Instead of obliging the reactionaries by focusing their chief attention on the remote possibility of Communist control in America, our liberals would do better to consider the present fact of a repressive drive which may indeed force Communist activities underground but will certainly strangle the progressive movements that operate in the open.

Let liberals review the record of 1919-1922 before they join the hunt. Let them read Professor Commager's acute and ironic comments in this issue on the logical implications of Mr. Truman's executive order. Let them consider the injustices already perpetrated against their ideological blood-brothers: against Warren of the Labor Department and Menefee of the International Labor Organization and many others. Not to mention the infamous attacks, not yet ended, on David Lilienthal. And then let them pluck up their courage and show that liberals know the value of liberty. The hour calls for protest and political action, not for ingenious rationalizing.

And this leads me to a few somewhat relevant remarks about an article appearing in this issue of The Nation. Since James Burnham's "The Struggle for the World" is clearly destined to become the bible of the Bomb Russia

First boys, I was rather surprised by Arthur Schlesinger's review of the book (page 398). Without fully accepting the Burnham thesis, Mr. Schlesinger does not conceal his admiration for the bold strokes with which the author slices through our remaining national hesitations and scruples. In a conservative, this susceptibility would be easy to understand. But our reviewer is not a conservative, much less a near- or neo-fascist. His own writings attest to his liberalism. And it is this fact that makes the obvious enthusiasm lurking behind his disagreement—he is glad Mr. Burnham is not Secretary of State—a disturbing phenomenon. In other countries, when fear of Russia sent liberals scurrying toward the campfires of the militant right, the final result was something worse than communism. I hope Mr. Schlesinger's review is an individual impulse, not a symptom. But whatever it is, I think he should have risen superior to such dubious devices as to tell the audience (page 399) that "the Progressive Citizens of America and the Chicago Tribune have now clasped hands" in an "interesting joint effort" to prevent any "interference with the Communists." It would be as apt and as accurate to retort that the "Americans for Democratic Action and Bill Bullitt have clasped hands in an interesting joint effort to launch an immediate atomic war against Russia." In other words, it would be silly and inaccurate. These days, the bedfellow argument has at least two sharp edges.

Washington Witch-hunt

BY HENRY STEELE COMMAGER

IT IS not improbable that President Truman's executive order on disloyalty in the executive branch was designed to steal the thunder of the Thomas committee or head off such extreme bills as that proposed by Representative Rankin—that it was intended, in short, to furnish some protection to persons in government employment wrongfully accused of disloyalty. If so, it is a pity that it was not more carefully drawn, that it does not more scrupulously observe legal and constitutional proprieties. For as it stands it is an invitation to precisely that kind of witch-hunting which is repugnant to our constitutional system. And as it stands, it should be added, it is liable to instigate persecution not only of radicals by red-baiters but of reactionaries by radicals.

The crucial clauses are in Part V: Standards, and these merit close attention. Most striking is the looseness, the almost unbelievable looseness, with which standards are fixed. Here are the "activities and associations" of an employee which are to be considered as a test of loyalty:

Membership in, affiliation with, or sympathetic association with any foreign or domestic organization, association, movement, group or combination of persons, designated by the Attorney General as totalitarian, fascist, Communist, or subversive, or as having adopted a policy of advocating or approving the commission of acts of force or violence to deny other persons their rights under the Constitution of the United States, or as seeking to alter the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means.

Note first how all-embracing these terms are. It is not only membership in or affiliation with subversive organizations that is proscribed, but "sympathetic association" with them. What is sympathetic association, and how is it to be distinguished from unsympathetic association? Is a member of the Democratic Party in New York sympathetically or unsympathetically associated with the Democratic Party of Mississippi, which denies Negroes their rights under the Constitution of the United States? Note, too, the connection—it is difficult to use a more precise word—that is made suspect. It is not only membership and so forth in actual organizations but membership in and sympathetic association with a "movement" or a "group or combination of persons." What is a movement? Is the Wave of the Future a movement? Is anti-Semitism a movement? Is hostility to organized labor a movement?

Here is the doctrine of guilt by association with a vengeance. For almost a hundred and fifty years American law labored under the handicap of being unable to prove guilt by association. The Alien Registration Act of 1940, directed against aliens and enacted under pressure of war, for the first time wrote that odious doctrine into American law. Now, apparently, it is here to stay. Guilt is no longer to be personal, no longer to depend upon overt acts. It is an infectious thing, to be achieved by mere "sympathetic association" with others presumed to be guilty, or even with "movements" presumed to be subversive.

Nor is consolation to be found in the designation of the Attorney General as the person to classify organizations and movements as subversive. An intelligent Attorney General, an open-minded and tolerant one, would doubtless use this broad power with discretion. But how would it be used by a Stanton, who double-crossed his President; how would it be used by a Richard Olney, who smashed the Pullman strike; how would it be used by an A. Mitchell Palmer, who rounded up the "reds"; how would it be used by a Daugherty, who broke the railway strike of 1922? What guaranty is there that J. Edgar Hoover may not some day be Attorney General, Hoover who recently asserted that "'so-called progressives and phony liberals" are little better than Communists?

The same pervasive and pernicious looseness of phrasing characterizes another of the standards set up in this section. For one of the tests of loyalty is "performing or attempting to perform his duties, or otherwise acting, so as to serve the interests of another government in preference to the interests of the United States." What is "otherwise acting" so as to serve the interests of some government other than the United States—and who is to decide? It is worth noting, in passing, that much this same test was enacted once before, in the Logan act of 1798—and failed. Did Walter Hines Page act so as to serve the interests of Britain rather than the United States? Many contemporaries and some later historians have thought so, and we may well believe that the right kind of Attorney General—Henry Cabot Lodge, let us say—might have agreed with them. If this principle were applied to Congress, as it might logically be, would it result in wholesale decapitations? Anyone who reads faithfully the Congressional Record knows how many Congressmen plead the cause of Lithuania, or of the former Polish government in London, or of Eire—at the cost of a good many thousand dollars to the American taxpayer. What government's interests are being served when Mr. de Valera's St. Patrick's Day address is reprinted in the Congressional Record?

But let us turn to some of the possible applications of this extraordinary order. What organizations, associations, movements, or groups, after all, may be said to be embraced in the esoteric phrases of Part V? Communist and fascist are, perhaps, obvious enough, though "totalitarian" takes a bit of defining. But what of others that "advocate or approve" the commission of acts of force to deny persons their rights under the Constitution or to alter the form of government? The Ku Klux Klan is obviously one of these, and we may confidently expect that it will be so designated by the Attorney General and that all its members in government service will be promptly charged with disloyalty.

What shall we say, what may we expect, for other organizations? Is membership in the Democratic Party, or "sympathetic association" with it, an indication of disloyalty? Assuredly, that party countenances the use of force to deprive Southern Negroes of their rights under the Constitution. What of membership in labor unions? Several of them have, notoriously, denied to non-members or to the public their constitutional rights. What shall we say of membership in or association with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, which—we follow the Supreme Court here—denied Negro firemen their constitutional rights? Nor should we forget that numerous Congressmen have again and again asserted that various unions were Communist-dominated. Clearly they must know what they are talking about, and clearly all who associate with or sympathize with these unions are guilty through association.

A number of organizations, membership in which must create at least a suspicion of disloyalty, come to mind: whether these organizations are subversive or not will depend upon the interpretation given that slippery word "force," and force, it must be remembered, does not necessarily require violence. Does the American Bar Association come under the Presidential ban? Its committee counseled disobedience to the National Labor Relations Act. Does the American Medical Association come under the ban? It was found guilty of denying members of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia their constitutional rights. Will association with the Associated Press be evidence of disloyalty? According to Associated Press v. United States, it too was guilty of denying to outsiders rights which they could exercise under the Constitution. What of "sympathetic association" with railroad corporations which persist in denying to Negroes the constitutional right not to be segregated? May stockholders be presumed to be "sympathetic" associates, or is there a presumption of non-sympathy? Or, to turn to government employees, is service with the FBI to be an indication of disloyalty if that agency attempts, as it clearly wishes, to deny Communists their constitutional right of freedom of speech and of assembly?

Fortunately for those who tremble for the safety of the Republic, the dragnet is to be spread widely enough to catch even those whose sympathetic association with subversive groups or movements is not clear. For all those who seek "to alter the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means" are equally subject to the Attorney General's disapproval. What are "unconstitutional means"? It is a bit difficult to know what may be considered unconstitutional in the future, but perhaps recourse to the past will clarify the issue. Clearly, all those who carried out the Congressional mandate, in 1862, to abolish slavery in the territories were guilty of this crime, for under the Dred Scott decision the act of 1862 was unconstitutional. Even more clearly, all officers, who executed the First Reconstruction Act, and its amendments, were equally guilty, for these acts were palpably unconstitutional, and, no less palpably, they altered the American form of government.

An application of Mr. Truman's executive order to the past would, indeed, greatly have simplified our history. An order of this kind would have disposed of that dangerous radical Andrew Jackson, who not once but twice flouted the Supreme Court, and of Jackson's Attorney General, Taney, later Chief Justice, who aided and abetted him, and of his Postmaster General who unlawfully withheld funds which Congress and the Court said must be paid. It would have embarrassed that subversive executive Abraham Lincoln, who illegally, according to Chief Justice Taney, suspended the writ of habeas corpus, thus denying to John Merryman rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution. It might have put that dangerous agitator Theodore Roosevelt in his place—Roosevelt who, according to President Taft, illegally withdrew public lands from entry, thus denying persons their constitutional right to homesteads. And, whatever we may think of more recent situations, such an order—had it but been effective in time—would inevitably have disposed of Mr. Truman's trouble-making predecessor, Thomas Jefferson. For Jefferson "sympathetically associated" with Jacobin clubs, Jefferson "sympathetically" joined combinations to nullify Congressional acts, Jefferson was affiliated with a party which worked a "revolution" in 1800, and—worst of all—Jefferson openly announced that "the tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and martyrs."

Vatican Versus Left in Italy

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Milan, March 20

THROUGHOUT the war I kept hoping to wake up one morning and find the Vatican transferred to Montevideo, or Rio de Janeiro, or some other distant place. If that had happened, Hitler would have performed one good deed in his life, for it would have meant the salvation of Italy. Today we would have our own domestic and foreign policy. We would feel free." This was said not by a Communist but by a liberal Italian politician whose identity, were I at liberty to reveal it, would astonish Americans. It is common talk these days in Rome that the Vatican rules Italy in the person of Premier de Gasperi, leader of the Christian Democrats. However, my liberal friend believes that to concentrate the attack on De Gasperi as former librarian of the Vatican and its faithful servant is to miss the crux of the problem. Actually the Italian Premier has done his best as head of a coalition government composed of mutually antagonistic forces, and his last speech in the Assembly, which I heard the other day, sounded like a sincere profession of faith in the republic. De Gasperi, my friend maintains, was a political accident; the real, continuing problem is the Vatican.

No Italian anti-Fascist can forget that during twenty years Mussolini's infamous regime enjoyed the backing of the Holy See. February 11, 1929, marked the signing of the Lateran Agreement which healed the breach between political Rome and Vatican Rome dating from 1870 and, incidentally, solved most of the latter's financial problems. "From that day on," wrote Anton Zischka, one of the dictator's enthusiastic biographers, "the Duce could count on the support, direct or indirect, of 336,000,000 Catholics throughout the world. By this move . . . clever Mussolini immensely strengthened his position both inside and outside Italy. Henceforth his policy would be defended by 320,000 priests, 265,000 monks, 400,000 nuns, and 35,000 missionaries scattered from Greenland to the Malayas, from Japan to North Africa; by 1,578 bishops, 245 archbishops, and 55 cardinals; by the papal nuncios in the various capitals, who . . . are agents of inestimable importance." Pope Pius's numerous army is not likely to prove as loyal a defender of the Italian Republic!

In the light of its record, we might logically have expected to see the Vatican isolated at least for the next few decades. But logic was not one of the victors in the late war. The Vatican has emerged more powerful than ever, as a rallying point for the forces of world reaction. The voice of the Pope is heard at every critical moment: on the eve of the Italian referendum on the monarchy; on the eve of the French elections; on the eve of the Moscow conference. In fact, the Vatican has completely recovered from the temporary decline in moral prestige it suffered as a result of its identification with fascism. Italian leaders, asked to explain the rapid resurgence of Catholic political power, invariably answer, "the United States."

By a series of unprecedented acts as inspired as Mussolini's, Pope Pius has altered the traditional course of the church. For centuries Vatican policy has been oriented toward the Catholic countries of Europe; now the hierarchy's main efforts are concentrated on America. His Holiness sees that predominantly Protestant country as the Vatican's chief future ally—and source of funds. The trend became very apparent last February in the selection of the new cardinals: for the first time the Pope skipped over Italian candidates to elevate fourteen prelates of North and South America. Since then he has named American Catholic dignitaries as his special envoys to Yugoslavia, Rumania, and Germany, though in the past such delicate missions have traditionally been intrusted to the Italian members of the Sacred College. These appointments were intended not only to flatter American Catholics but to create the impression that the Vatican's policy is linked with that of the United States; the envoys speak as representatives of the church and as citizens of the strongest country in the world.

Anti-clerical leaders have denounced the use of American prelates for diplomatic missions as "subservience . . . to the Anglo-American powers." But this subservience has been amply rewarded: evidence of American diplomatic backing for the Vatican; of close relations between Myron S. Taylor, special emissary to the Vatican, and Republican leaders in the Senate; and of the almost magical influence wielded by the Pope's good friend, Cardinal Spellman, have persuaded many Italians that opposition to the church would mean the end of American economic assistance to Italy.

One of the principal factors in the new orientation of the church is the Pope's personal conviction that only the United States is strong enough to halt the political advance of the Soviet Union. Mindful that 80,000,000 Catholics live in countries now within the Russian sphere of influence, the Vatican has drawn upon the experience of twenty centuries in its effort to follow a militantly anti-Communist policy and yet conciliate Russia's neighbors. On the surface the result appears to be a curious zigzag strategy, but examination reveals a fixed central objective—a Western Christian coalition against godless Russia. Few Italians, however, want to become involved in bloc politics. For years their country has been a satellite of the big nations. Now they want a strong, independent Italy that will never again be used as a pawn in the game of power politics.

In the face of a two-pronged offensive by foreign capitalism and native clerical reaction, Italy must depend upon the strength of its working class to bring about a long-needed economic and social transformation. In the vanguard of the large but still inchoate left movement are the two parties that formed the backbone of the Resistance—the Socialists and the Communists.

THE SOCIALISTS

The old Socialist Party is headed by Pietro Nenni. Since his recent resignation from the government he has devoted all his time to party activity, speaking up and down the country and making frequent visits to Milan, the real center of the Italian labor movement. He is a brilliant orator and, above all, a courageous leader. At the height of the crisis precipitated by the announcement of the Italian peace terms, when the right was eagerly preparing to make capital of the government's dilemma, Nenni asked for the post of Foreign Minister, a thankless job coveted by nobody under the circumstances. His first official action was to clear out the appeasers and pro-Fascists from his ministry.

Though Nenni held the foreign-affairs portfolio for only a brief period, his prestige increased steadily. In Rome they tell of the day he summoned a suspect functionary in charge of the personnel division. "By tomorrow," he told him, "I want a list of the Fascists still in the department." Next day the functionary appeared with a list of seventeen names. Nenni pulled a scrap of paper out of his vest pocket, glanced at it, and remarked calmly, "I said all of them—all thirty-nine." The functionary departed and returned a few minutes later. "Here's the complete list, Your Excellency," he announced with a smile. "Yes," Nenni retorted, "after we have added your name." Another story describes Nenni's reaction to an effusive telegram of congratulations he received from an Italian diplomat abroad, one of those "flexible" career men who get along equally well with monarchists, republicans, fascists, and democrats. Nenni replied: "Received your cable. Have charged it to your personal account. Will charge this acknowledgment to my own." Nenni initiated a progressive foreign-policy that rejected Italian participation in blocs, east or west, while at the same time proclaiming Italy's willingness to cooperate with all nations.

With the aid of other Socialist leaders—including Basso, the secretary of the party, Cabinet Ministers Morandi, Romita, and Cacciatore, and Vechietti, head of the foreign-affairs section—Nenni is now trying to repair the damage caused last January when a small right-wing faction headed by Saragat broke away from the party congress over the issue of relations with the Communists and formed the "Italian Socialist Workers Party." This split weakened the left and made it possible for De Gasperi to set up a new Cabinet along more conservative lines.

Of course foreign interests have also played a part in determining the character of the De Gasperi government; dollars flowing into Italy by various channels have a questionable effect. At times American financial influence takes the form of public loans, as in the case of the $100,000,000 which the Italian Premier brought back from the United States in the hope of restoring his party's waning strength in the next elections. Or it may be disguised under the euphemism of "international union solidarity." In this connection I need only quote a section of a letter sent by the Italian Socialist Party to the other European parties explaining the congress split: "Saragat and his scissionists were inspired by the Italian American Luigi Antonini, president of the Italian American Labor Council and a member of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. . . . He financed and is still financing anti-Communist movements of every description as the attached documents show. Antonini favored the secession of the Saragat group, both directly and indirectly through his agents in Italy and Switzerland."

At the January party congress Nenni delivered an extraordinary speech lasting three and a half hours in which he pointed out that collaboration with the Communists was neither a whim nor a concept peculiar to his followers but rather the logical by-product of the agreement on united action unanimously adopted by the old executive committee of which Saragat was a member. In the first days of the liberation Nenni may have been somewhat carried away by the hope of a single working-class party, but his insistence at least on unity of action between Socialists and Communists was vindicated by the victory of the two left parties in the June elections. And it is an ironic fact that Saragat, now faced with the responsibilities of leadership in his own new party, has been forced to denounce publicly the anti-Communist obsession of some of his followers and to call for closer relations with the other left forces.

While the split has undoubtedly harmed the left as a whole, it may in the long run prove beneficial to the Socialist Party. "You know," Nenni told me, "I could have, and by rights should have, expelled Saragat and his clique in 1945 when they were still a mere handful. Instead, I tried to delay the break as long as possible; in times like these every man counts, and I did not want to deprive the left of a single 'active.' But now that it has come, I must say we are all breathing easier. It was an impossible situation. Our energies were being dissipated in the effort to maintain a fiction of unity."

Developments in the last two months have justified Nenni's optimism about the future. Although Saragat's party has won over a large number of deputies, it is unlikely that his bloc will maintain its present strength in the next Assembly. "When we go to the polls in October," Nenni said to me, "we will be voting on the present, not the past. In the first elections many of the scissionists won seats merely because the rank and file remembered their names from the pre-Fascist era—they were old veterans, so to speak. This time people will vote not for names but for programs—for concepts like agrarian reform, national reconstruction, labor's rights, and consolidation of the republic." The Saragat faction unquestionably includes a number of capable and sincere men, notably Faravelli, Treves, and Calosso. Some genuine Socialists, even from the left, joined in protest against the domineering attitude of the Communists. But the membership is predominantly middle class, and its program can be summed up as a kind of Italian "new deal." Perhaps if the party stopped dressing its reformist goals in Marxist language, stopped using the hammer-and-sickle emblem, and came out frankly as a liberal bourgeois party, it might even accomplish some good.

Taking a cue from the political line laid down at the congress, the Socialist press has intensified its polemics against the reactionaries. Nor do the Socialists spare the church; their attitude on the relations of church and state under the new constitution is strongly anti-clerical. Similarly, in an editorial entitled The Shadow of the Vatican over Our Foreign Policy, Avanti recently took the offensive on an issue which it had avoided for several months so as not to embarrass a coalition government in which Catholics were the majority. The Vatican retaliated the same afternoon with an editorial in the Osservatore Romano. Incidentally it honored me with an equally prompt reply to an interview I had given Avanti, in which I had merely stated what is common knowledge—that the Catholic hierarchy in Spain continues to support Franco.

COMMUNIST TACTICS

The Communists, paradoxically, are hampered in the fight against Vatican power by their present strength. At the moment of the liberation they were in a leading position; since then they have experienced a series of ups and down responding to internal and international events. Since the last municipal elections, however, opinion polls show them to be again on the way up. It is difficult to make predictions about the October elections, but most observers in Rome believe that the Communists will win additional seats in the Assembly, probably at the expense of the Christian Democrats. And it is precisely for this reason they do not want to frighten the middle class and encourage opposition parties to form a united front against them. Moreover, the Communists have won a large following in the rural districts and are anxious to avoid alienating the Catholic farmers.

A strategy as intricate as this requires a leader of unusual political experience. The Italian Communist Party has such a man in Palmiro Togliatti. His fame has spread beyond left circles; people who are hostile to everything he stands for recognize his ability and remarkable intelligence. I had not seen him since the final tragic days of the Spanish war. This time as always it was a pleasure to talk to him, for unlike many Communist leaders Togliatti rarely bores his listener with hackneyed party slogans; he knows how to size up the person with whom he is speaking and does not counter serious arguments with shallow propaganda. Nor has Togliatti's extraordinary devotion to his party dulled his critical faculties. To describe him—as many do—as a new Machiavelli is absurd. Though he is certainly one of Italy's shrewdest political leaders, one cannot picture him as an intriguer for intrigue's sake. Togliatti's training as a lawyer—he holds a doctorate of law from the University of Turin—has served him in good stead in his current debate with the enfant terrible of post-war Italy, Giannini of the l'Uomo Qualunque Party. He has succeeded in splitting that dangerous semi-fascist movement by forcing Giannini to dissociate himself publicly from Emilio Patrissi and the extreme anti-Communist cabal who were his most active supporters.

The Communist leader's stiffest ordeal was Trieste. But even here he succeeded in holding to his conviction that the issue should be settled by direct negotiation between Yugoslavia and Italy without antagonizing his sensitive countrymen. The right, which had hoped to use Trieste to finish him off, was disappointed.

The real test between left and right will come in the course of the debate on the new Italian constitution. In the opening skirmish last week the Christian Democrats, Liberals, and Common-Man Front mustered a slim majority of twelve votes to knock out a Communist amendment to Article I by which the opening sentence would have read, "Italy is a democratic republic of workers." In its place the Constituent Assembly adopted a compromise wording proposed by the Christian Democrats to the effect that "Italy is a democratic republic founded on labor." Another battle will no doubt be fought over the law on the Defense of the Republic—drafted by Togliatti and approved by the Council of Ministers—which provides sanctions, including the death sentence, against Fascists and monarchists who conspire against the state.

The Vatican is concentrating its main effort on that section of the constitution which controls its relations with the state. A recent editorial in the Osservatore Romano—the second in three days—has already demanded the inclusion of the Lateran Agreement as an integral part of the Italian constitution. This issue is likely to find Communists and Socialists on opposite sides.

Voices Without Smiles

BY HEINZ EULAU

Washington, March 30

UNLESS a last-minute settlement breaks the impasse in the negotiations between the National Federation of Telephone Workers and the Bell Telephone System, the nation's telephone network will be shut down on April 7 by the first really country-wide, effectively coordinated strike in the industry's history. Thirty-nine unions, with jurisdiction over some 287,000 telephone workers, will participate in the walkout. They will be joined by another 55,000 workers belonging to small, independent unions.

In deciding to strike, the N. F. T. W. dares to move where much stronger C. I. O. or A. F. of L. unions fear to tread. Paralysis of the country's telephone system might hasten restrictive legislation by a hostile Congress. An inconvenient public might be bamboozled by the Bell System's well-oiled publicity machine. Defeat might wreck the plan for a compact national union. Above all, a strike is a bottomless barrel, a belt-tightening business—especially as it will be a fight against one of the most powerful monopoly corporations in America.

The huge Bell Telephone System is controlled by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, which owns more than nine-tenths of the voting stock of twenty-one subsidiaries. It also owns nearly all the stock of the Western Electric Company, which manufactures over 90 per cent of Bell telephone supplies and equipment. A. T. and T. directly owns and controls about 98 per cent of all United States long-distance telephone lines.

A strike against this public-utility colossus takes courage, particularly as the N. F. T. W. in no way matches the Bell System in integration and cohesiveness. The N. F. T. W. is only a loosely federated organization of forty-nine member unions, which, according to its constitution, "shall remain forever autonomous and be free from interference in the conduct of their internal affairs." Though it has organized about 75 per cent of all workers in its jurisdiction, its resources are small.

The N. F. T. W. is convinced that in the many weeks of negotiations the Bell companies have not shown good faith in collective bargaining, but have been stalling. The union demands included, in addition to a general $12 increase, a more rational system of area and town wage differentials, shortening of job-progression schedules from eight to five years, a better pension plan, improved vacations, and the union shop. The Bell System's answer to all of these demands was thumbs down. Indeed, the N. F. T. W. president, Joseph A. Beirne, charges that the Bell companies "are trying to move backward in contract matters and seek to return to conditions as they existed ten years ago." According to the union, the Bell System seeks to discard seniority provisions, leave promotions and transfers to the discretion of the company, reduce the number of paid holidays, and weaken sickness provisions and the grievance procedure.

The Bell System has neither confirmed nor denied these charges. With regard to the $12 demand, the Bell System contends that there "is no justification at this time for a general wage increase," and that as a public utility it should not "lead the parade" in a second round of wage raises. The union answers that it is not a matter of "leading" but of catching up with the higher wages paid in other industries. As of September, 1946, the $44 weekly average gross wage paid in the telephone industry compared unfavorably with the $49 paid in steel or the $52 paid in electric light and power.

There are fourteen different wage schedules for long-distance telephone operators alone. New York's top minimum after eight years is $44; in Memphis, Tennessee, it is only $39. Town differentials of local operators are even greater. A local operator in Detroit, Michigan, can make $45 after eight years, while in Iron River, Michigan, a small town, the top rate after seven years is only $33. In small Southern towns, like LaFollette, Alabama, the starting wage is $25, the maximum after six years $31. The national average operator's wage is $34. By contrast, most federal-government operators throughout the nation now start at about $37 a week and after eight and a half years can reach about $50.

Differentials among telephone craftsmen are equally great. While a New York long-distance technician can progress from $29 to $80 after eight years, in Denver, Colorado, the starting wage for skilled workers is $27 and the top rate after eight years is only $66. The Bell System defends area and town differentials on the theory of "prevailing rates" paid in the community.

A direct outcome of the low wages paid in the telephone industry is the enormous labor turnover among operators. A recent poll conducted by the N. F. T. W. revealed that of 73,000 operators queried, 40.7 per cent had been employed for less than one year, 15 per cent for one to two years, and so on. Only 24.1 per cent had been employed for more than five years. Last year alone the Bell System set out to hire a quarter of a million women as operators and clerks.

The Bell System seems to oversell the attractiveness of the jobs it advertises. "Featured in all types of publicity," a Bell publication states, "are those things which young women want in a job which the telephone company has to offer. Included, in addition to good pay, are convenient places of employment, interesting work, competent and friendly supervision, congenial associates . . . opportunities to get ahead, and job stability."

Once on the job, however, the young lady will learn otherwise. Instead of a convenient place of employment, she is perched on a small stool in a long line of stools, always in the same position; instead of interesting work, the job is routine and her's must be "a voice with a smile"; instead of friendly supervision, she is under constant pressure of speed, for her function is timed, analyzed, and reported. When she falls below the desired average of performance, a speed-up campaign is put on. Work is exacting and nerve-racking. And pay is low. It is not surprising that so many girls readily leave the switchboard for greener pastures.

Older telephone workers are particularly concerned with the Bell System's pension policy. Present pensions depend on the worker's years of service with the company and his average annual pay for the last ten years of employment. The minimum pension is $50 a month, and the company deducts one-half of the worker's social-security benefits. The union contends that this practice is outmoded and that the minimum should be shoved up to $100.

Continuance of the pension scheme is at the discretion of the company. This discretionary power is part of the tradition of paternalism to which the Bell companies were committed and Bell employees were accustomed for many years, and which retarded collective bargaining in the telephone industry. Company unionism long prevented an effective national labor organization which could balance the power of the Bell System. It was not until June, 1939, that the N. F. T. W. was founded.

And only last year, for the first time in the industry's history, a general increase of 18.3 cents an hour was agreed on directly between A. T. and T. and the N. F. T. W., just twenty-five minutes before the strike deadline set for March 7. When other Bell companies soon made similar settlements, it was clear that all Bell labor policy was coordinated from A. T. and T. headquarters at 165 Broadway in New York. "This concentration of authority on the company side of the bargaining table," the union stated, "should be matched by an equal degree of concentration of authority at a central point on the union side of the table."

Half a year later, therefore, N. F. T. W. delegates meeting in Denver hammered out a constitution for a strong, centralized union, the "Communications Workers of America" (C. W. A.). The old autonomy clause was eliminated. The present N. F. T. W. affiliates will become integral divisions of the new union. Then the organization of forty to fifty smaller unions outside the N. F. T. W.—some really independent, some under a company's skirts—may become possible. A first convention of the C. W. A. will be held in June. But affiliation with either the C. I. O. or the A. F. of L. is not contemplated. The spirit of independence which has long kept telephone unions apart from each other is also responsible for their independence from the Big Two.

A strong telephone union is necessary, union leaders say, because the Bell System has consistently put the interests of its stockholders over those of its employees. During the depression A. T. and T. continued to pay its $9 dividend though net income per share fell as low as $6.52 in 1934. The working force decreased by 185,000 between 1929 and 1935. Curtailed employment and reduced wages saved the Bell companies $139,000,000 in wages in 1935 as compared with 1929. The depression shook the confidence of telephone workers in the beneficence of the Bell System.

But today telephone workers fear the future in another respect. Mechanization hangs over the telephone industry like the sword of Damocles. A. T. and T. recently issued $343,000,000 of convertible debentures and plans to sell 2,800,000 shares of stock to its employees—on an instalment plan—for the purpose of financing a huge mechanization program. It is estimated that the program may eventually displace two-thirds of the present operators' force and severely curtail job opportunities for plant-maintenance men. Only a strong union can succeed in gaining a voice in the mechanization program. A shorter work day with construction spread over a period of fifteen years could avoid unnecessary hardship. It would also allow integration of the new investment into the Bell System's indebtedness as well as continuance of the $9 dividend, and it might prevent overexpansion in case of depression.

As this article goes to press, the N. F. T. W. has invited A. T. and T. to enter into company-wide negotiations. But the Bell mother company turned this offer down on the ground that the subsidiaries are the sole bargaining agents of the system. Yet about this same time Bell companies in various parts of the country made to N. F. T. W. affiliates almost identical offers to arbitrate wages alone. It was additional proof that while Bell decisions are made by A. T. and T., the system prefers to deal with the local unions, because their strength is dispersed.

In this critical situation any sign of weakness on the N. F. T. W.'s part would also be a sign of its relative immaturity. The union knows that it has much to lose in case of defeat, but even more to gain in case of victory. Strike is a chance which every union has to take when all other means of winning its demands are exhausted—even in the case of a privately owned public utility.

Mountbatten's Task in India

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, March 17

BY THE end of this week Lord Mountbatten will have taken charge of the Indian administration. As though to remind him of the spacious setting of India's problem, the Asian-relations conference will begin its proceedings simultaneously with his assumption of the viceroyalty. From Egypt, Iran, and the Arab countries of the Middle East, from Burma, Malaya, and the Philippines, from China and Mongolia, from five Soviet republics—from all countries of Asia barring Japan—representatives will attend.

This conference, conceived by Nehru before he became the head of the Indian government and sponsored by the non-official Indian Council of World Affairs, is the biggest event in Asia since the end of the war. It will foster cultural and economic ties between the different countries of Asia and facilitate a common approach to many of their problems—scientific and agricultural research, health, nutrition, women's problems, labor, and so on. It will remind the Viceroy of Attlee's historic phrase used last year that politically India could be the Light of Asia.

Many internal problems will demand Mountbatten's immediate and anxious attention. Writing three weeks ago, I told The Nation's readers that the Punjab had escaped so far the horrors and large-scale riots which had disgraced the neighboring provinces, but that none could tell how long this immunity would last. Within a few days of the publication of this dispatch the Punjab was plunged into terrible civil strife. There have been mass murder, arson, and destruction of property on a colossal scale. The worst phase of the mob fury is probably over, but it will take a long time to restore normal conditions and mutual confidence.

What was the cause of this terrible outburst? Partly, it was the spirit of retaliation for tragic events elsewhere. In Behar, predominantly a Hindu province, the Moslems had suffered heavy casualties during the riots of last fall. The Punjab has a population that is 54 per cent Moslem, the rest being Hindus and Sikhs. It is a rich province with a prosperous peasantry, and until recently it enjoyed a virtual monopoly of the recruitment for the Indian army, which meant that large sums out of the central government's defense budget were spent there for roads, railways, pay and pensions for soldiers, and the like.

Demobilization hit the province hard, and the unemployment problem became acute. Private armies consisting of demobilized soldiers grew up under the guise of volunteer movements. Politically the Moslem League has been nursing a sense of grievance and frustration. With only 80 members in the provisional legislature out of a total of 175, it could not form a ministry last year. The Punjab is the region in Northwest India vital for Jinnah's conception of Pakistan, and tactically it was becoming increasingly necessary for the Moslem League to capture its administration. Since the lack of a majority prevented the overthrow of the ministry by parliamentary methods, the league's leader decided to attempt a coup d'état. A direct-action campaign demoralized the ministry, paralyzed the administration for thirty-three days, and forced the Congress Party out of office.

Then, on February 20, came the Labor Cabinet's dramatic declaration that Britain would withdraw from India by June, 1948. Vitally important for the Moslem League was the proviso that in the absence of a single central government at that stage Britain would consider whether the central power should be distributed among the provinces or areas not acknowledging New Delhi's present authority.

There has been some extremely rapid thinking on all sides as a consequence of the British declaration. The Moslem League considers it essential to maintain control over Bengal and Sind, where it is in power, and is consolidating its strength in the Punjab and the Northwest Frontier Province—in the latter the same technique is now being employed to defeat the Congress ministry that proved successful last month in the Punjab. When the fateful hour of British withdrawal arrives, Pakistan, under this plan, would be ready to receive its share of the central authority. The Hindus and Sikhs argue differently. West Bengal, including Calcutta, is predominately Hindu. The East Punjab, with the Ravi River cutting the province as a dividing line, has a combined Hindu and Sikh majority. Congress leaders have urged, therefore, the partition of Bengal and the Punjab as an immediate solution. But the Moslem League fears partition as a first step in the detachment of West Bengal and East Punjab next year, leaving a truncated Pakistan.

Mountbatten's arrival will revive questions which have temporarily receded into the background as a consequence of Wavell's enforced retirement. First, will the Moslem League remain inside the interim government and continue to boycott the Constitutional Assembly? Second, will the interim government have all the powers and status of a dominion during the next fourteen months? Third, assuming that the Moslem League refuses to enter the Constitutional Assembly, need the Congress leaders strictly adhere to the British plan—especially the limited union center? Fourth, can the princes go ahead in supporting the Constitutional Assembly without the Moslem League?

These questions Mountbatten must tackle without delay. If he keeps steadily before him Attlee's vision of India as the political light of Asia, he can hew a way for himself through the complexities and seeming contradictions of Indian politics. Anxious weeks lie ahead while he is evolving his line of action. The Moslem League and those princes who have not yet taken a final decision regarding the Constitutional Assembly will want to see whether he wholeheartedly accepts the policy of the Labor government. If he does, many British reactionaries now busy fighting rearguard actions will disappear rapidly from the Indian scene. That alone will greatly simplify the Indian problem.

The question of supreme importance is no longer whether Britain will quit India. The date having been set, it is for Mountbatten to decide whether India will assume control of its destiny after a smooth and cooperative transition, as Nehru hopes, or only after continued bloodshed and civil strife. India and all Asia also wait to see whether Mountbatten will encourage the establishment of social democracy by refusing to take cognizance of vested interests—be they princes or landlords or big business.

Land Without Conflict

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

THE Governor of the Virgin Islands is William H. Hastie, former federal judge, at one time civilian adviser to Secretary Forrester, educated at Amherst and Harvard, and colored. The acting governor, Morris F. de Castro, who has been connected with the administration of the islands for more than twenty-five years, is a member of a Sephardic Jewish family which has lived in St. Thomas for several hundred years. The official driver of the governor's car for thirty years has been Ludwig Heidmann, of German and Danish descent. There could be no better men for any of these jobs. Nobody on the islands would dream of making an issue of their racial or national background.

The great discovery of a trip to the Virgin Islands is that here is a part of America without racial strife—here is no anti-Semitism, no discrimination against the colored, or the white. To be sure, the son of a rich Pittsburgh family has organized his hotel as a sort of club in order to keep Negroes out, but this solecism is graciously ignored.

On the terrace of Bluebeard's Castle, a government-owned modern hotel built around an ancient pirate's stronghold, a steel executive from a Southern state confided to me: "If anybody had told me I would ever call a nigger Mister, I'd have said he was crazy." My companion was puzzled but obviously somewhat pleased by his unexpected tolerance. This is what the air of St. Thomas does to one. At dinner time, Americans of all breeds and colors and several prominent local people, colored men of dignity and culture, come together, without any signs of social uneasiness, to enjoy the beautiful view of the azure Caribbean, the red and green roofs of the town, the multi-colored hills.

St. Thomas was once a shipping center for the Hamburg-American line—the entrance to the courthouse still bears the emblems of HAPAG. Indeed, German sympathies among the natives remained strong until World War II when the ship "Horst Wessel," manned by young Nazis, appeared in port and it was announced that any German sailor caught talking to a black man would go to jail. That was the end of Hitler in St. Thomas.

Of course, the islands have their problems. The public treasury has a deficit. Housing is inadequate. There is unemployment. But the atmosphere—to the visitor—seems radically different from Puerto Rico, only a few air minutes away. Hopelessness is in the air there. The Spanish and Anglo-Saxon elements are incompatible.

On the Virgin Islands everybody speaks English—though the street signs are still in Danish; everybody is friendly, relaxed, and serene. Walking, driving, working are done in slow motion without anybody's growing impatient. The visitor is soon affected by a sweet laziness. For this reason the Virgin Islands are an ideal place for rest. The landscape is one of the most beautiful ever seen; the climate is nearly perfect all the year round. Beaches are dreamlike—snow-white sand, crystal-clear water, a fringe of coconut palms and sea grapes.

The war-time rum boom is over. If the United States were to refund the import duties on rum—as was done in Puerto Rico—the local administration would have more than enough money to undertake the necessary program of rehabilitation and construction which has been planned for many years. The Virgin Islands are waiting for ten million dollars which Congress has appropriated but not yet sent.

Rumors of prejudice against the colored governor seem to be without foundation. Governor Hastie has just come back from Washington, where he was received by the Republican leaders in an encouraging manner.

It is obvious that the Virgin Islands have a future as one of the most enchanting resort places of this earth. Army and navy officers, including an admiral, have settled here since the war. A New York physician has bought an island. There is a real-estate boom, and prices for lots already are on a Westchester scale. Just now the limited facilities for travelers are frightfully overtaxed. But one hears about great undertakings, and much as one may regret an invasion of tourists, the development of St. Thomas into a Caribbean Capri seems inevitable.

A health resort must be healthful, and the health situation on the islands deserves first priority. When I left St. Thomas a few weeks ago, pipes for a new covered sewage system were piling up by the roadside. Its construction would give employment and at the same time eliminate one of the greatest health hazards. St. Thomas has only a small hospital, more than a hundred years old and inadequate in almost every respect. X-ray therapy is not available, and much other essential equipment is lacking. The Commissioner of Health is an old gentleman of Danish descent, Dr. Knud Knud-Hansen, who arrived in the islands in 1908. He has the authority and wisdom of an experienced general practitioner, and his associates are well-trained, intelligent, able colored physicians. But they cannot work efficiently without tools. Recently the United States Children's Bureau has lent its aid in alleviating distress among the native children. This work is supported half by United States money and half by local assessments. The psychopathic ward in the St. Thomas hospital is a scandal; however, that can also be said of big cities in the United States. The tuberculosis wards are not much better.

A visit to St. Croix, the largest of the islands, is a real adventure. The plane lands on an airfield in the middle of the island, and the visitor suddenly finds himself in a quaint rococo setting. There are two small towns, Fredrikstad and Christianstad, where life has been completely at a standstill for 150 years. This island should be able to supply vegetables, grain, and cattle to all the Virgin Islands, but at present it is far from doing so. Private capital has completely retired, and the government has had to take over the extensive sugar plantations. St. Croix operates at a substantial loss and each year has to beg Congress to make up a deficit. There is a small hospital headed by an able American doctor.

One is not surprised to find the world's oldest scourge in this hideout—leprosy. Forty-five patients are interned in the leper colony, and an equal number live on probation with their families. About twenty cases are now being treated with promizol, a new sulfa compound. But $3,000 annually is needed for the drug and funds are inadequate. All the patients are natives, quite a dangerously high number. According to the last reports from the National Leprosarium in Carville, Louisiana, leprosy can now be arrested, and the necessary measures should be taken in St. Croix without delay. A still worse situation is that some 17 per cent of the inhabitants of St. Croix suffer from filariasis. This serious endemic condition, most difficult to treat, requires an extensive war of prevention against the insects which transmit it.

The history of this Caribbean paradise is one of cruel suffering, bound up, quite innocently, with events in Europe. The gigantic slave trade had its center here, and the soil is drenched with the blood of slave rebellions. A pleasanter incident to recall is the visit of President Roosevelt in 1934. In the memory of the islanders this visit is as vivid as if it had taken place yesterday. Roosevelt did more than sightsee. He visited the sore spots; he talked to the leprosy patients. His presence marked the beginning of progress and social improvement.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

KEITH HUTCHISON

Undistributed Profits

SINCE corporations are the source of a great deal of taxable income, an efficient income-tax law must provide safeguards against evasion through corporation hoarding of profits. One means to that end was blocked when the undistributed-profits tax was repealed in 1938, but in the same year Section 102 of the Internal Revenue Code, which imposes a heavy surtax on "unreasonable accumulations" of surplus profits, was amended so as to shift the burden of proof from the Treasury to the corporation. During the war this section was not rigorously enforced: from the point of view of inflation control it was undesirable to encourage larger dividend payments. But in recent months the Internal Revenue Bureau has been reminding corporations that the law stands and instructing those that retain more than 30 per cent of their profits to explain why that is necessary.

The Treasury's interest in the disbursement of a goodly proportion of corporate earnings is obvious. Corporate profits, whether distributed or not, are subject to a 38 per cent income-tax rate. Whatever is paid out in dividends is assessed for personal income tax at whatever rate is appropriate to the receiver. In the case of stockholders in the higher brackets this means that 50 per cent and upward of their income from investments must be handed over to the government; so that they naturally prefer to have a considerable part of their share of corporation earnings "saved" for them by additions to surplus. Eventually, if tax rates are lowered, such a surplus could provide a welcome "melon"; alternatively, a corporation's mounting surplus may be reflected in its Stock Exchange quotation, making possible capital gains on which the tax, for those in the higher brackets, is much lower than on ordinary income.

In the bountiful twenties, when Andrew Mellon reigned over the Treasury, little was done to discourage tax-dodging by this device, and no one bothered very much about the legal restraints on "unreasonable accumulation." But now that Internal Revenue indicates that the law will be enforced, corporate interests are beginning to call indignantly for its repeal. The Journal of Commerce, for instance, has been carrying on a steady campaign against what it calls "an obsolete penalty tax." Section 102, it has charged, serves to discourage many corporations from the reinvestment of their earnings in the modernization and expansion of their plants. It forces them to pay out in dividends greater sums than are justified by business conditions, particularly in times like these when swollen inventories call for large cash reserves.

A favorite argument is that the penalty tax is a particular burden on small corporations, which cannot easily secure additional capital from investors and hence can only expand by plowing back profits. There is no reason to suppose, however, that Internal Revenue, or the Tax Court to which appeal can be made, will interpret Section 102 in such a way as to mulct small concerns which can show good cause for the retention of profits. The tax collectors are after such quarries as the closely held corporation which, instead of paying dividends, makes "loans" to its stockholders or uses its earnings for investments quite extraneous to its proper business. They are also, I hope, after the really large corporations which grudgingly dole out dividends and use the greater part of their profits for "empire-building."

There is, in fact, good reason to suspect that much of this concern for the little fellows is camouflage for the big boys. In this particular battle the giants must try to hide behind the pigmies, since they cannot very well employ their usual tactics of pushing the small shareholder out in front. For in the matter of dividend disbursements the interest of the small shareholder differs from that of his big brother and parallels to some extent that of the Treasury.

Naturally, Mr. Doe who owns ten shares in National Gadgets does not enjoy paying a tax on the dividends he receives, but he probably enjoys still less the fact that the management of the company only lets him have $2 per share to be taxed when it is earning $10 a share and, with a strong liquid position, could easily disburse $7. He has good reason, therefore, to cheer the Treasury's efforts to discourage unnecessary additions to the company's surplus. As a writer in Barron's of June 17, 1946, put it, "Forced payment of dividends may be a handicap to some companies which want to expand but haven't blueprinted that growth. The alternative is for them to market new securities to raise additional capital. In that case the stockholder has the opportunity to make the decision on whether or not to put in his share of the new capital, whereas retention of earnings deprives him of that decision."

A study of corporation reports for 1946 suggests that a great many large concerns have either ignored the Treasury's warnings or feel that they have convincing reasons for retaining more than 30 per cent of their earnings. The accounts of fourteen leading companies, selected more or less at random from my files, show an aggregate profit of $519,910,000, of which 55.5 per cent was distributed to shareholders. But this proportion is swollen by the inclusion of two super-corporations, du Pont and United States Steel, which accounted for nearly two-fifths of the profits and paid out 75.8 and 67.6 per cent respectively. The other twelve collectively allowed stockholders only 45 per cent of net earnings, with the proportions ranging from 31.1 per cent in the case of Goodyear Tire and Rubber to 59 per cent for National Biscuit.

I should like to suggest that stockholders who attend company meetings—all too small a band—should exercise their rights and ask the chairman for an explanation if the company has retained more than 30 per cent of its 1946 earnings. They should inquire what reasons have been supplied to Internal Revenue and whether management has risked the imposition of a penalty surtax which will be paid, of course, out of their funds. And they should not permit themselves to be fobbed off by vague talk about the importance of expansion. Constant growth is not necessarily a sign of corporate health, and expansion is sometimes motivated not by sound economics but by managerial paranoia.

World War III

THE STRUGGLE FOR THE WORLD.

By James Burnham. The John Day Company. $3.

JAMES BURNHAM has written a vigorous pamphlet setting forth the inevitability of war against the Soviet Union. Hostilities, indeed, began in April, 1944, when the mutiny of the Greek sailors at Alexandria first disclosed the Soviet decision to wage covert war against the West; and total war "may begin at any moment, today, tomorrow; it may have begun before these sentences are published."

The inevitability of war, Burnham argues, is rooted in the oneness of one world. Western civilization has reached the point where conditions demand the establishment of a "universal empire." (The book is saturated with Toynbee.) Only two power centers are adequate to meet this challenge. Their simultaneous existence, by leaving little room for an old-style balance-of-power settlement, introduces an intolerable disequilibrium into world politics; and the discovery of atomic weapons makes the race for supremacy all the more urgent. Communism, with its Russian base, has begun its well-organized and ruthless drive to conquer world power, while the United States flounders, irresolute and confused, unwilling to grasp world leadership.

The Soviet challenge is unlimited and irrevocable. Accordingly, Burnham goes on, the United States must meet that challenge by every means at its disposal. It must outlaw the Communist Party wherever it can, oppose Communists wherever they appear, support all elements fighting communism, whether Attlee, Chiang Kai-shek, or Franco. It must deliberately undertake a policy of building up what Burnham calls variously an American Empire or a democratic world order by political and economic pressure always backed by a readiness to use force. For practical reasons Burnham excludes a preventive war, though he writes wistfully, "Smaller, shorter, and easier wars are, as a rule, better than bigger, longer, and more difficult wars. And if by 'winning a war' we mean the outcome more favorable to what we believe in, it seems better to win a war than to lose it."

Even for a writer with Burnham's talent for the apocalyptic, "The Struggle for the World" is quite a mouthful. It is a superb job of pamphleteering—clear, fast, vivid, arrogant, making its points with the implacable certainty of a trip-hammer. The present copyright owners would no doubt reject a comparison with Tom Paine, but ground for the comparison is certainly there. Because it is a pamphlet, it contains little that is new in the way of fact or insight; because it is a pamphlet, one need not pause to quarrel with its exaggerations, its oversimplifications, its dogmatisms, and its inaccuracies. The fact remains that Burnham has presented in systematic and passionate form a perfectly serious case.

One can hardly deny, in the first place, that Burnham has given an accurate statement of the maximum Communist position. No serious Communist would deny communism's global aspirations, though he would describe the end-product in more optimistic language. The basic question is whether the maximum position is inevitable in Soviet policy, or whether there is also a minimum position to which the Soviet Union may be held down by proper United States policy. Burnham would answer no; but writers can afford an irresponsibility in these matters not available to statesmen. In the nature of democratic politics, in the light of his own sense of responsibility, Secretary Marshall cannot assume that the maximum position is inevitable until the evidence for this assumption is overwhelming—until, as Burnham would doubtless say, it is too late.

Marshall must thus undertake to surround Russia by a complex of pressures which will constrain it to a minimum position. The Washington theory of containment—despite the Communist claims to the contrary—has tended toward what is known as the policy of supporting the non-Communist left, on the ground that the Chiang Kai-sheks are not only nasty people but also bad practical investments. In theory Burnham might agree. "The United States will not win the peoples [of the world] to her side," he writes, "... unless her leadership is anti-totalitarian, unless she can make herself the instrument of the hope, not the fear, of mankind." But in practice he feels so close to Armageddon that he solicits all allies: we must fight first and reconstruct afterward.

These are judgments of timing and history on which wide difference of opinion is possible. It is conceivable, for example, that commitments to groups whose only virtue is anti-communism may encourage such groups to precipitate a conflict while they see a chance to involve the United States on their side. It is conceivable that a positive pro-democratic, non-Communist left policy might by itself check Soviet expansionism long enough for the tempo to change and the missionary zeal to die down. So long as these things are conceivable—and doubtless long after given democratic inertia, liberal confusion, and bourgeois cowardice—we will reject Burnham's crusade.

This Burnham fully recognizes. He intelligently divides his analysis into what ought to be done—the renunciation of power; what could be done—the policy of the democratic world order; and what will be done—the policy of vacillation. "The usual American conception of foreign policy," as he admirably puts it, "is an uneasy combination of abstract moral sentiment with short-term selfish interests, both projected without any reference to world political facts." You may expect, Burnham prophesies, that Communists and isolationists alike will unite to block a positive American policy. Though events have disappointed Burnham's anticipation that war might come before his book was published, they have been kind to this last prediction. The debate over Greece has already revived the old 1940 alliance world of darkness ("Lenin on a bench beside a lake disturbed/The swans. He was not the man for swans") which the Stevens of "Harmonium" would have excluded as unpoetic. His language is simpler and more mature. But structural differences makes all that has been gained precarious. Nothing like the dense, large-scale organization of his Sunday Morning, or even the small perfection of his Peter Quince at the Clavier, is attempted. The philosophy is not exhaustive and marshaled as in Lucretius; and it is seldom human and dramatic as in Donne. When one first reads this poetry that juggles its terminology with such lightness and subtlety, one is delighted; but as one rereads, it too often appears muddled, thin, and repetitious. How willingly one would exchange much of it for the concrete, gaudy wit of "Harmonium."

The points that I have been making are probably overstated, and they are necessarily simplified. But few poets of Stevens's stature have tossed off so many half-unfinished improvisations. Underneath their intellectual obscurity and whimsey, their loose structures, their rhetorical and imagistic mannerisms, and their tenuous subject matter, there seems to be something in the poet that protects itself by asserting that it is not making too great an effort.

The best poems in "Transport to Summer" are as good as anyone is writing in English. Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction, the longest poem in the book, is a sequence in three parts, entitled: It Must Be Abstract, It Must Change, and It Must Give Pleasure. Each part has ten sections consisting of twenty-one blank-verse lines arranged in groups of three. In spite of a few beautiful sections—particularly Begin, ephebe, by perceiving; The first idea was not our own; Not to be realized; It feels good as it is; The great statue; and A lasting visage—and many fine moments, the whole seems to me to be unsuccessful. Its structure is sloppy, idiosyncratic, and repetitious. It rambles and rambles without gathering volume, and many of the sections are padded to fill out their twenty-one lines. Much of the rhetoric is extremely mannered. Certain details, such as Canon Asperin, and Nanzia Nunzio Confronting Ozymandias, seem written for Stevens's private amusement. Of the shorter poems, I magnificence of its rhetoric and resonance. A few lines are slightly mannered, and there is something a little long, formless, and vague about its development. But it is a very large undertaking wonderfully executed.

Esthétique du Mal is a sequence in fifteen blank-verse sections. It is about as good and important a poem as T. S. Eliot's Four Quartets or Ash Wednesday. Its subject is: How shall the imagination act when confronted with pain and evil? The structure is not very tight, two or three sections are not particularly good, and several others have a great number of bad or over-written lines. The good parts can be detached, but they lose some of their momentum. But Esthétique du Mal is more in the grand manner than any poetry since Yeats'; and it reminds one of parts of "Cymbeline" and "The Winter's Tale"—slow and rapid, joining the gorgeous with the very simple, wise, elaborate, open, tolerant without apathy, understanding with the understanding of having lived long.

The death of Satan was a tragedy
For the imagination. A capital
Negation destroyed him in his tenement
And, with him, many blue phenomena.
It was not the end he had foreseen.

He knew

That his revenge created filial
Revenge. And negation was eccentric.
It had nothing of the Julian thundercloud:

The assassin flash and rumble. . . . He was denied.

Phantoms, what have you left? What underground?

What place in which to be is not enough To be? You go, poor phantoms, without place

Like silver in the sheathing of the sight
When the eye closes. . . .

THE ANGELIC AVENGERS. By Pierre Andrezel. Random House. $3.

OF Isak Dinesen's earlier work I have read only enough to have a great appetite for more, and to feel that a serious appraisal of it is in order, for it is surely a very long time since any foreigner writing in English has made so striking an asset of the fact; and it will probably be longer before aristocratic prejudice is turned again so beautifully to the uses of moral irony. Unfortunately I am unable to judge how far this novel, which is said to have appeared first in Denmark and to have been written under a second pseudonym for reasons of war-time security, departs from the author's previous standards. For skill she could hardly have done better; but the moral substance of the book gives an impression that the weight of events has pushed her this time into a sphere in which her best talents are not in play. The upper reaches of her irony are missing, and though the restraint and the delicate acid touch that are among her gifts are there, they cannot, of course, provide final conviction for so bold a tale of good and evil, or save it as a horror story from the literalness that James warned himself against in connection with "The Turn of the Screw." It is therefore something of a wonder, a wonder of pure narrative skill, that until near the end the story is as breath-taking as it is.

The angelic avengers in question are two innocent young English girls who in the year 1840, through a rather bizarre set of circumstances, find themselves taken in as wards by a literally diabolical English pastor and his wife. These two, it turns out, have for some years been using their French farmhouse as a base of operations in the white-slave traffic. But the real story is in the effects of the knowledge of evil on an innocent mind, and its turning-point comes not with the full revelation of horror, but with the girls' decision to fight it, helpless as they are, rather than escape; and the final drama concerns their triumph not over the outside evil but over their own sense of contamination from it. These are such depths as Hawthorne moved in—one thinks especially of Hilda in "The Marble Faun"—but here the tale is brought to a happy ending of Jane Austen proportions that does little justice to what has preceded, and even less to the great political parallels that the reader is always conscious of, as the author too must have been. The trouble is that evil here is too literally theological, and therefore dates, as James's horror does not, and calls up questions that it ought to be protected against. What the story is designed to say is that good can triumph in the world, but this book will not convince the Jews of it. The blue-blood angle is also a little embarrassing in this context; which only drives one back with more impatience, if one has not finished them, and perhaps if one has, to the pure, if elaborate, delights of the "Seven Gothic Tales." Africa

THE WORLD AND AFRICA. By W.
E. Burghardt DuBois. The Viking
Press. $3.

THE trouble with the world," remarked old Artemus Ward, "ain't that people don't know, but that they know what ain't so." A sad experience like this must have prompted the Director of Special Research for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to write what amounts to a comprehensive story of the Africans' contributions to world civilization, and of the white peoples' deliberate attempts to ignore or efface these achievements. The late German explorer, Frobenius, insisted that the idea of the "barbarous" Negro was a European invention. Actually, the various Negro and Negroid peoples in Africa, including Egyptians, Ethiopians, and Nubians, had had a decisive influence upon the development of culture among the Israelites, Persians, Greeks, Romans, and other ancient nations. West African Negroes knew the art of smelting iron long before the Europeans. Three early popes were of African birth. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the cultural level of Africa was equal or superior to that of large parts of Europe.

The Negro's moral and intellectual deterioration coincided with the introduction of slavery by the white man. Dr. DuBois narrates bitterly the story of the shameful exploitation of the colored races by the various white powers: "The colonial system caused ten times more deaths than actual war." A disgusting by-product of this system was the theory of racially superior and inferior peoples, intended to furnish the slaveholders with a moral justification of their crimes. There were countless, often gigantic revolts of slaves; when, finally, the slave trade was abolished, it was not so much for humanitarian as for economic reasons.

Dr. DuBois places before the reader numerous little-known facts concerning the population of a continent four times the size of the United States, and he emphasizes to what a large extent Europe and America were built on the sweat and blood of African laborers.

A Small Thing

POEMS, 1938-1945. By Robert Graves.
Creative Age Press. $2.

HE WRITES exceedingly well on all the forty small pages. Every word is pulling its weight; there is lyrical and rhetorical power always within hail of a reasonable and balanced irony; it is all genuine and warm and dry; it is based on earth and conscious of history. One reads it with continual pleasure and liking and admiration. And yet, after all, what a slight volume it is; how little there is in the world, the feeling seems to be, worth writing about.

There is one story and one story only That will prove worth your telling Whether as learned bard or gifted child.

MISS TALLULAH BANKHEAD is one of the few American actresses whose devotees are as loyal—sometimes as uncritical—as a movie star's fans. Not all of them stuck with her through her misadventure in "Anthony and Cleopatra," but there were enough on hand during at least the early performances of "The Eagle Has Two Heads" to make the rafters of the Plymouth Theater ring with their enthusiasm. The supposedly omnipotent critics had already pronounced it the most pretentious piece of absurdity seen here in years, but the fact that Miss Bankhead was playing it for all it was not worth was apparently enough.

Perhaps the author, Jean Cocteau, intended some kind of burlesque, though I do not see how it could be a very funny one. Perhaps "The Eagle Has Two Heads" is sur-dadaism or the first example of post-existentialist drama! But played straight, as Miss Bankhead and her company are playing it here, it is simply an incredible farago of all the romantic clichés anyone could possibly think of if he started off with the figure of a beautiful and be-reaved Hapsburg queen who is in love, first with the ghost of her dead husband, and then with a would-be assassin who miraculously turns out to be the spittin' image of the defunct king. At the end, this new lover, who has just taken poison, shoots the queen in the back—this being exactly what she has always wanted him to do, for reasons which are too complicated to explain and not very convincing at best. But that is not all. The moment he has chosen to do the deed is just before the moment when the queen is supposed to appear at a balcony window and, for the first time in many years, show her face to her loving people. As the fatal bullet finds its mark, the band outside strikes up the national anthem of Graustark; Miss Bankhead heroically thrusts aside the curtain which covers the window; and then, tearing away the drapery as she falls, tumbles with it head-first down the stairs. Personally I do not remember such a death scene since "Fra Diavolo," and while the faithful thundered approval the judicious looked at one another in a wild surmise as they asked themselves, "Can such things be?"

Now I would be the last to deny that there is something to be said for innocent hokum. I do not, however, know what excuse can be made for hokum combined, as here it is, with chichi; for simple theatrical nonsense which has been slowed down by the dead weight of interminable pseudo-poetic tirades, often delivered as though they were trying to reach blank verse but could not quite make it.

What is really painful about "The Eagle Has Two Heads" is not merely the theatrical claptrap but the leaden march of bad poetic prose, the thin whine of inflated pensées as they go flat, and the dull thud of epigrams falling dismally on their faces. What are we to think of a poet who offers us "you were fleeing like a hunted beast" as though it were a striking metaphor?

Of an epigrammatist who can make his royal heroine explain her lack of fear of lightning by declaring that "it sometimes strikes trees but not family trees," or can allow his Machiavellian statesman to rebuke a political poet with the pronouncement that "it is one thing to split an infinitive, but it is quite another to divide a state"? What are we to think of a philosopher whose pensées run to things like "Happiness is misery if it is only the absence of unhappiness," or "All love is a little death but a great love is suicide"? I assure my readers that these quotations were taken down verbatim on the margins of my program just as they fell dead from the lips of the speakers, and though I am well aware that one can always imagine the translation to be bad I cannot easily believe that any possible original of these sentiments would be very impressive. Perhaps M. Cocteau has succeeded in demonstrating, once and for all, that the only thing which lies beyond sense is non-sense and that the sur always turns out to be the infra. Thanks to the theory of relativity, it is now popularly believed that if you go far enough into the future you come to the past. Perhaps the most advanced of the advance guard are discovering that if you push on far enough ahead you will rediscover the démôde.

As for Miss Bankhead's performance, there are, as I have already indicated, two opinions. She is on the stage nearly all the time and she speaks most of the lines, sometimes talking for five or ten minutes at a stretch without so much as a monosyllabic interruption. Obviously she is having quite as good a time as her fans are, and there can be no doubt that her interpretation is unique—alternating as it does a hauteur that is as queenly as all get out with sudden, apparently involuntary lapses into that rowdy bonhomie which is her natural manner. Unlike Oscar Wilde I do not profess to know how a duke (or a queen) behaves when he is by himself, and so, for all I can prove to the contrary, Miss Bankhead's conception may be the right one. Its effect is, indeed, a good deal like the one achieved by her delightful interpretation of her role in "The Skin of Our Teeth," where she was supposed to be alternately Lilith and a servant girl on the make. But it did seem more appropriate in that play.

Perhaps I had better add the information that "The Eagle Has Two Heads" is said to be now enjoying a successful run in London. I do not know why.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

AS USUAL the water-color, gouache, drawing—and sculpture—installation of this year's Whitney Annual (through April 17) reaches a securer level of quality than the oils. The reason is still the same. Water color is a more intimate medium than oil, and art tends to be rather a private affair in this country; hence the American artist becomes more direct and less ill at ease and pretentious when working in water color or gouache. At the same time he has behind him the Anglo-Saxon tradition of water color.

The greater success of American water color is particularly evident where one would least expect it—in the more or less abstract sections at the Whitney. Also evident is how increasingly irrelevant the other art is becoming—that which stopped short of cubism. Even so, advanced American art is still too unenterprising and narrow; our temperaments still seem to fit too easily into the canonical modes already laid down by the School of Paris, Kandinsky, and Klee. The successes are pleasing rather than moving or upsetting. This goes for the best water colors and gouaches at the present show: those by Byron Browne—who is improving rapidly—Perle Fine, Chet La More, Jacob Lawrence, Ezio Martinelli, Hans Moller, Ad Reinhardt, and Louis Schanker.

The sculpture section is quite a different matter. It shows a lot of the worst that American art is capable of, and yet at the same time three or four things in it demonstrate better than does oil or even water-color painting the very best we can do at the present moment. Theodore Roszak's steel "Raven" is, despite its bad tripod base, one of the strongest works of art I have ever seen turned out in this country; while Seymour Lipton's lead "Famine" and David Hare's sienaplaster "Red Knight" are almost in the same class. All three of these works are more pictorial than sculptural; the spectacular polychromatic-cement "Fallen Angel" by the always surprising Trajan seems a combination of both. Somewhat academic plaster and terra cotta pieces by Arline Wingate and Hannah Small deserve mention, if only for the success with which they accomplish what they most modestly set out to do. David Smith, whom I think already the greatest sculptor this country has produced, is represented by a weak piece in fabricated bronze; Smith is strictly a pictorial sculptor, and his ventures into monolithic usually result in a loss.

Here, as in France, according to all the evidence I have seen, the future seems to belong to sculpture much more than to painting. The amount of new and potent talent that has sprung up in sculpture and construction within the last ten years—talent of a positiveness relatively rare in painting today—would indicate that the possibilities of post-cubist sculpture have actually become richer than those of post-cubist painting.

Museum of Modern Art (through April 6) confirm the fact that he has remained a great artist in black and white, whatever the vicissitudes of his painting in the last twenty years. During this time one frequently saw preliminary sketches whose effect was far superior to their final versions on canvas—and this was true even in the case of some of Picasso's most ambitious oils. The present lithographs, especially the series with the bull and that with the two nudes, and the cow in the miscellaneous group, have much greater unity, style, and invention than any of his post-1939 oils seen over here so far. Let the spectator who wants to see Picasso "explained" linger over the bull series and notice what changes the bull's anatomy goes through. Here the artist solves with astounding success, in four or five progressively more abstract versions of the same theme—all almost equally good—the problem that has obsessed him since cubism: how to compress the infinity or variety of visual detail offered by any given segment of nature in a set of linear abbreviations that, under the pressure of the unity and economy dictated by the plane surface, would constitute a memorandum to the imagination. These lithographs should be published cheaply in book form to enlighten the public as to what modern art is about.

The unusual photographs of the French artist, Henri Cartier-Bresson, also at the Museum of Modern Art (through April 6), provide an object lesson too—in how photography can assimilate the discoveries of modern painting to itself without sacrificing its own essential virtues. One thing that painting since Manet has emphasized is that a picture has to have a "back." It cannot simply fade off in depth into nothingness; every square millimeter of picture space, even if it represents only the empty sky, must play a positive role. This, Cartier-Bresson, like his fellow-photographer Walker Evans, has learned preeminently. At the same time, unlike Edward Weston and the later Stieglitz, he has not forgotten that photography's great asset is its capacity to represent depth and volume, and that this capacity's primary function is to describe, convey, and make vivid the emotional "use-value" of beings and objects. It is to anecdotal content that Cartier-Bresson, rightly, subordinates design and technical finish. I am told that he does not trim his prints, and it is obvious that he takes his shots under circumstances that make it difficult to calculate focus and exposure with any great exactness. This procedure testifies, even if the results did not, to his overriding concern with subject matter rather than with the medium—which comes into its own only in so far as it becomes transparent.

Not all of Cartier-Bresson's photographs are of equal merit. Certain of them are tinged with that artiness which, whether plastic or anecdotal, has so far haunted almost all ambitious photography in the twentieth century. Perhaps it is because photography still feels it has to fight for recognition as an art. For artiness arises usually—as we can see, I believe, in the example of American art in general—when the place of free or high art as opposed to applied, commercial, or past art is overlooked by society at large. Then the artist tends to retaliate both by overemphasizing the nature of art as art and by exaggerating the differences between it and everything else. This would seem to explain Pre-Raphaelitism and British aestheticism in the 1890's, as well as the artiness of Stefan George's and Rilke's milieu in Germany before 1914. Today it handicaps American art, and photography here and everywhere else.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

A FEW weeks ago Victor announced that with the return of Lotte Lehmann to its list of artists it had resumed production of her previous recordings of songs and operas. And now it has announced resumption of domestic production of the Glyndebourne Festival recording of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." I suspect this is the result of Columbia's announcement of its intention to record the Metropolitan Opera production of "Figaro"; and if I am right it would be one of the rare instances in which the competition of the two companies has benefited the minority public that is interested in Mozart rather than the mass public that is interested in things like the monstrosities played by Isaac Stern and Oscar Levant in the film "Humoresque" (Columbia Set 657; $5).

The first thought that occurred to me when Columbia announced its contract for recordings of the Metropolitan's performances was that these performances were not all worthy of being given permanence on records. The second thought was that the Metropolitan "Figaro" was even finer than the Glyndebourne and therefore eminently worthy of recording; but that although Columbia had contracts with most of its principals—with Sayao, Stevens, Pinza, Baccaloni, and with Bruno Walter who conducted it so beautifully the first years and might be brought back to conduct it for the recording—Victor had the contract with Steber, whose Countess has been one of the production's glories. Just whom Columbia could use in her place I don't know; but it would be someone who had not sung in the performances at the Metropolitan; and I can only hope Columbia will not solve this problem as it did a similar problem recently, when, recording the love music from Act 2 of "Tristan und Isolde" with Traubel and Ralf, it had the long, luscious phrases of Brangäne's Warning, which call for the utmost in vocal opulence, sung by Herta Glaz, whose voice is unpleasant in timbre and tremolo-ridden (one could question the suitability of Traubel's voice in its present condition for the sensuous music of the duet; but she is the Metropolitan's Isolde). This impossibility of recording the Metropolitan "Figaro" with Steber illustrates the way the commercially competitive set-up of recording interferes with its use for artistically desirable ends—just as the similar set-up of American radio prevented the broadcasting of the performance of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" by NBC's Toscanini and CBS's New York Philharmonic in 1942.

The newspaper reports on Miss Margaret Truman's radio appearance with the Detroit Symphony ought to be excellent material for one of A. J. Liebling's "Wayward Press" articles in the New Yorker. He could point out that it was, astonishingly, a reviewer in a Detroit paper, Harvey Taylor in the Detroit Times, who wrote: "She sings as any talented but fairly inexperienced pupil would sing at her first important public appearance"—which was an accurate characterization of those spiritless sequences of undifferentiated notes, some of them badly off pitch. And on the other hand that it was a New York critic, Noel Straus, sent all the way to Detroit by the New York Times, who managed to hear "a sensitive feeling for melodic outline in 'Ciel to Lindo' that also marked Miss Truman's singing in her other numbers," the "spirit, refinement, and sensitivity of feeling" in the songs, and in the aria Charmant oiseau "the flexibility of the voice . . . her prowess in high staccato notes, in rapid scales, and other technical feats." But for full appreciation of Straus's report one would have had to observe his hatchet-work on really distinguished musical performances by less exalted personages.

Letters to the Editors

Niemöller—Not a Nazi

Dear Sirs: Your editorial note on Pastor Niemöller seems to me very ill advised and to be based upon misinformation. I make no defense for the curious kind of political ethic which Niemöller symbolizes, and which was one of the tragic aspects of the German situation. Niemöller, however, was never a Nazi, and certainly has not expressed himself in favor of totalitarianism since his release. On my recent visit to Germany I had the opportunity of speaking to him about religious and political affairs very fully, and I found him wise in his political judgments and undoubtedly matured by his experience.

I think it is difficult for American secular democrats to understand the rather odd political and almost purely religious motivation of a man like Niemöller, but I should think that one ought to have a certain degree of respect for the courage which brought on seven years of imprisonment. I respect no one in this country more than Mrs. Roosevelt, but I think her judgments are as misinformed as yours in regard to Niemöller.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

New York, March 10

In Rhee's Defense

Dear Sirs: I read Will Hamlin's Korea: An American Tragedy in your issue of March 1 with extraordinary interest. It is a combination of fact and fancy that will both inform and misinform its readers. Mr. Hamlin's main point is that the Korean people are distinctly restive under the dictatorial rule of the American Military Government. They have been promised independence but instead have received division, censorship, economic strangulation, and after eighteen months they still are not allowed a government of their own. A strong current of rebellion against these conditions is rapidly rising in Korea. With this picture I must heartily agree. The only contrary voices are those of the rulers of Korea, who naturally defend their own rule.

The principal distortion in Mr. Hamlin's article is his violent and untruthful attack upon Dr. Syngman Rhee. I am proud to be a friend of Dr. Rhee's. My testimony in his behalf may be discounted for that reason, but at least I know the facts about him, while Mr. Hamlin obviously does not.

Mr. Hamlin calls Dr. Rhee "wealthy" and says, "Rhee has $300,000 in his pocket, and probably millions more available from business friends in the United States. . . ." Someone has been pulling Mr. Hamlin's leg. Dr. Rhee has almost no money at all. From his youth he was engaged in revolutionary activities—first against the corrupt Yi dynasty, then against the Japanese rulers of his country. He came to the United States and worked his way through college. For the past thirty-five years he has devoted all his time and energy to the fight for Korean independence. He has been in no position to acquire wealth. As a perpetual rebel against our State Department policies, he has made few wealthy friends, and those he has made have not given him money. His sole means of support has been the "voluntary taxes" voted to keep up his work for Korean independence, contributed by the Korean Americans in this country and Hawaii.

Mr. Hamlin's second charge against Dr. Rhee is that he is the leader of a wealthy, reactionary, and pro-Japanese Korean rightist clique that is trying to seize power at the expense of the Korean people. This is just as false as the first. Anyone who knows anything at all about Dr. Rhee knows that he fought the Japanese control of Korea by every means in his power.

There are many political leaders in Korea, just as there are in the United States. Most of the non-Communist leaders are loosely organized in the Korean Democratic Unity Federation, under Dr. Rhee's chairmanship, just as Republicans in Congress are loosely organized under the leadership of Senator Taft. But Dr. Rhee's political strength does not come from the support of these political leaders. It comes from the devotion of the great masses of the Korean people. I spent two and a half months in Korea last summer, not as an employee of the Military Government, but as a guest lecturer at the University of Korea. I traveled through South Korea and made every effort to learn what the people want. Dr. Rhee is their hero to an extent comparable to the feeling of Americans for President Roosevelt, back in 1933.

However, it is evident that Dr.

Rhee was suffering some loss of prestige among the people. The reason was that he had urged them to support the American Military Government and to give General John R. Hodge every opportunity to keep the promises of independence that had been made to Korea. Hot-heads among Korean youth naturally wanted to demonstrate against American delays. When Dr. Rhee told them this was unwise, it was inevitable that his popularity suffered.

Finally, in November, an election was held to choose forty-five members for an Interim Legislature. Eighty-five per cent of those elected were followers of Dr. Rhee. Then General John R. Hodge appointed forty-five more legislators, most of them from among Dr. Rhee's opponents. Since then he has removed six members and replaced them with six more of his appointees. Now General Hodge is blaming that hand-picked and controlled legislature for not giving him even closer cooperation.

When Dr. Rhee saw that every possible obstruction was to be placed in the way of an orderly expression by the Korean people of their own desires, he told General Hodge he could support him no longer. He came back to the United States to make his protest to the State Department and to the American people. The State Department refused to hear him. Lack of funds has seriously handicapped his efforts to inform the American public of what is going on. Korea is 8,000 miles away and has no bloc of votes in this country; so Congress has not been interested. Even Dr. Rhee's communications with his people back in Korea have been heavily censored. And a far-reaching "smear campaign" against him has been spread through some of the American press.

Now Dr. Rhee is returning to Korea. He returns to seek a free election based upon universal suffrage. He returns to fight by every means in his power for democracy and independence. He has no ambitions other than these. Dr. Rhee has repeatedly offered to withdraw wholly from politics if that would expedite the granting of freedom to his people. But the simple fact is that he is the chief unifying force in Korea, and that if he were to retire, his people would disintegrate into innumerable divergent groups.

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

April 12, 1945

The work, my friends, is peace, more than an end of the war—an end to the beginning of all wars, yes, an end, forever, to this impractical, unrealistic settlement of the differences between governments by the mass killing of peoples.

Today as we move against the terrible scourge of war—as we go forward toward the greatest contribution that any generation of human beings can make in this world—the contribution of lasting peace, I ask you to keep up your faith. I measure the sound, solid achievement that can be made at this time by the straight-edge of your own confidence and your resolve. And to you, and to all Americans who dedicate themselves with us to the making of an abiding peace, I say:

The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today. Let us move forward with strong and active faith.

Notes on Power Politics

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

THE cynical ease with which the Soviet Union and the United States by-pass the United Nations whenever its operations promise to interfere with immediate national interests must dishearten even the most trustful believer in collective security. In terms of vetoes and flat refusals to cooperate, the Soviet score is far ahead of ours. In terms of getting what we unilaterally want while preserving an outward show of loyalty to the U. N., this country is miles in the lead.

Why was it necessary for Russia to veto the mild and diluted resolution in the Security Council declaring that the mine-field off the Albanian coast could not have been laid "without the knowledge of the Albanian authorities"? Certainly the presumption of such knowledge was overwhelmingly strong; if Mr. Gromyko believed it had not been established by positive evidence, he could reasonably have abstained from voting and urged that the case be submitted to the International Court of Justice. His veto plainly indicated that the Russian position was taken on strict political grounds. He voted to support his "side," not to remedy a just grievance. By doing so, he reduced still further the capacity of the Council to act as an effective instrument for the settlement of international disputes.

Exactly the same must be said of the behavior of the United States in the matter of its claim for absolute trusteeship over the former Japanese mandated islands, and the waters between and around them. The fact that

Mr. Austin bullied a unanimous vote out of the Council makes no more than a formal difference; in fact, his elaborate "correctness" enveloped an essentially unilateral action in an aura of hypocritical piety that more than one nation must have found hard to take. With a great show of virtue, Mr. Austin said he would not use the veto to win his case; he would only withdraw the trusteeship offer altogether! In other words, the Council would either accept the American terms to the letter or we wouldn't play.

Two moderate changes proposed by Britain and Russia—the first forbidding the United States to give preferential treatment to American commercial interests in the islands; the second permitting the Security Council to alter or terminate the trusteeship agreement, a purely theoretical right in view of the veto—were peremptorily rejected by Mr. Austin. As a result, the United States has achieved total and permanent control under cover of trusteeship; and has done so by applying a concealed veto which will no doubt be studied with sympathetic interest by nations dominating other areas of strategic importance.

A COMPARABLE device to save the appearance of collective action while maintaining the reality of national power, has been thought up by Senator Vandenberg and attached as an amendment to the Administration's bill to provide "aid" to Greece and Turkey.

alone in those countries because the United Nations was not strong enough to take on the job, he too applied a veto, in fact if not in form, to possible United Nations action. Public and Congressional criticism of his plan has centered largely on this cool by-passing of the U. N., with all the implications of power politics and imperialist commitments the move entails. The publication of the remarkable F. A. O. report on Greek economic needs and the steps required to meet them under the U. N. left the Truman position even less defensible and the power aspect of the new doctrine embarrassingly exposed.

Obviously, Mr. Vandenberg's object was to drape the nakedness of American intentions with a few rags of United Nations authority. But the unreality of his amendment, even as further amended by the State Department, is likely to defeat its purpose, even though it is included in the measure which the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has unanimously reported. Having usurped prerogatives rightfully belonging to the United Nations, we now magnanimously propose to permit the United Nations, after the fact, to put a stop to our actions in Greece and Turkey if it decides they are "unnecessary or undesirable"—and if it is prepared to carry them on itself.

How odd a procedure! If we are really so concerned with the opinion and authority of the U. N. that we give it the power to order us out of Greece and Turkey, why did we not at least consult it before deciding to go in? (Indeed, we might even consult it now before Congress votes on the bill.) Or, conversely, if unilateral action was dictated by the urgent necessities of the situation, how can we safely allow the U. N. to decide, by majority vote, when that necessity has come to an end? Mr. Reston, writing in the New York Times, has pointed out a number of legal difficulties in the amended amendment, which will no doubt be overcome by further editing before the bill is passed upon. But no rewriting will obliterate the falsity of a formula which rests on our certain knowledge that the Security Council will never muster a majority against a crucial policy supported by the United States and Great Britain. We are risking nothing by the Vandenberg amendment, and so we shall win nothing either—except further suspicion of our motives at home and abroad.

JOHN L. LEWIS HAS SCORED HEAVILY IN THE latest rounds of his fast and furious political battle with the Administration. He has shown that the blow struck him by the Supreme Court—a blow he considers definitely below the belt—did not knock him out but merely made him more angry and more dangerous. Ad-ways the astute strategist, he seized on the Centralia disaster as a means of shutting down the industry in defiance of the injunction against a strike on April 1, and got away with it. Secretary of the Interior Krug countered by attempting to put more responsibility for safety on the United Mine Workers. He ordered 518 mines closed until the local unions declared them to be safe. Lewis came back with a demand that all mines be closed until certified as safe by federal inspectors. This demand has been rejected as unreasonable, but union committees throughout the country are likely to take it as a hint to appeal to their contract clause allowing them to withdraw from any pit where conditions appear to offer "imminent danger." We seem, therefore, to be in for a prolonged stoppage designed to prove that come hell, high water, or the Supreme Court, John L. Lewis is still the Big Boss. The price the miners will pay in the form of lost wages for this demonstration may be a large one and the cost to the country's economy will be heavy. We can only hope that some gain will be achieved in the form of better safety provisions. The present system, with responsibility divided between the federal government and the states, is most unsatisfactory. At Centralia, the federal men reported unsafe conditions months ago, but the Illinois Department of Mines was too busy shaking down operators for contributions to Republican funds to take any action.

AT A PRESS CONFERENCE ON MARCH 26, THE President urged business men to note the handwriting on the wall and cut prices before it was too late. The fact that, by and large, industrial profit margins provide ample scope for such cuts will not be news to Nation readers who recall the articles by Simon Lesser and Keith Hutchison in our January 18 and March 15 issues. What is news is that the views of these writers are now being echoed in unexpected places. We have, for instance, so conservative a columnist as Mark Sullivan of the New York Herald Tribune pointing to the abnormal level of companies' earnings and asserting that "in the light of profits already made, and before more are made, the sound course for the country's economic health is to reduce prices." We have Edwin Feldman, a director of the National Association of House Dress Manufacturers, telling a gathering of business men that in his opinion the swollen profits of the textile industry indicated that recent price increases in textiles were wholly unwarranted. And a writer in the Journal of Commerce points out that in the first quarter of this year production has been running far ahead of national income. In order to take the whole current output off the market, he concludes, it would be necessary for prices to fall on the average by 21 per cent. There are many straws to indicate that the kind of wind that blew our economy inside-out in 1920 is again gathering force. Department-store sales are lagging; inventories are mounting, and so is the volume of outstanding bank credit; business failures are tending upward; unemployment is increasing. But aggregate profits for the first quarter of this year will probably hang up an all-time record. That points to a dangerous unbalance which, if uncorrected by voluntary price reductions, may lead in short order to a business landslide.

HERE ARE TWO PIECES OF GOOD NEWS, BOTH concerning justice. The twenty-two conscientious objectors Henry Geiger wrote about on March 22 in The Nation have received suspended sentences and paroles from Judge Charles J. Cavanaugh in Los Angeles. These men, readers will remember, were being tried for their post-war strike in the Glendora, California, civilian-public-service camp against conditions of forced labor without compensation. That they are men of worth and integrity is proved not only by Judge Cavanaugh's action but by the fact that the paroled strikers are now appealing to a higher court for a reversal of their suspended sentences, at much cost to themselves in both time and cash. . . . And from Washington comes the news that Lieutenant Colonel James A. Killian's name has been stricken by President Truman from the list of nominees for the rank of full colonel. Killian, of course, ought never to have been on the list submitted by the War Department, since his conduct in command of the disciplinary barracks at Lichfield, England, was not only unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, but unbecoming any balanced, decent human being. Under the law, his recommendation for promotion was automatic, due to seniority. Secretary of War Patterson has urged Congress to permit army promotion by merit rather than by seniority, and that too is good news.

IN THE OLD DAYS, WHEN MURDER ON THE most modest scale was good for a front-page spread, no one but a raving maniac would have dreamed that in 1947 a man would stand in a court of law and hear himself convicted of four million killings. Still less could one have imagined that the defendant would plead guilty but insist that he had murdered "only two million"—or that the verdict would rate no more than a stick of type on page eleven of the New York Times. Yet this is a precise summary of the case of Rudolf Hoess, who has just been sentenced to hang for having wiped out a population greater than Chicago in the gas chambers of the Oswiecim horror camp. Orders are orders, said Hoess. "If I had been told to gas and burn my wife and children, I would have done it, of course." Let those who would let bygones be bygones, who would ease up on denazification for the sake of "efficiency," think occasionally of Herr Hoess and his four million murders, and of the insanely diseased state in whose name he acted.

The Masks Are Off

AFTER ten weeks of abuse, ranging from cloudy innuendo to character assassination in the first degree, it is reasonably certain that by the time this issue reaches our readers David E. Lilienthal will have been confirmed by the United States Senate. If so, the country can take comfort that a majority of the Senate has not seen fit to reject as chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission an honest man, magnificently and peculiarly equipped for the post. But heartening as this may be, Lilienthal's appointment itself has for some time been a subordinate issue in the Lilienthal affair. What started out as Senator McKellar's private spite campaign against the man who denied him TVA patronage, became in time a free-for-all in which masks were ripped off and Senators stood revealed on the most burning issues of the day.

In the early stages of the Senate fight, there was at least a pretense that the issue was Lilienthal's alleged radicalism. No one took seriously the senile bleating of McKellar, but there is no doubt that Taft, Wherry, White, and lesser Republicans of the extreme right hoped, though they hardly expected, to make New Dealism a bar to high public office. To the lasting credit of such Republicans as Vandenberg, Knowland, and Hick-enlooper, who led the fight within the G. O. P., this dangerous doctrine was denied a birth.

It became apparent soon enough that to a sizeable group of Senators the heart of the battle was not Lilienthal's personal philosophy at all but the old clash between public power and private utilities. By discrediting Lilienthal—and TVA—men like Bridges of New Hampshire hoped at least to slip a foot in the doorway behind which lies the whole vast world of atomic power with untold millions in potential profit.

The third major issue that emerged in the heat of battle on the Senate floor was the question of military versus civilian control over atomic energy—an issue that the Senate itself had supposedly settled in the 79th Congress. Hints that the military clique had not yet surrendered were dropped even during the Senate committee hearings, when General Groves's name cropped up repeatedly and Bernard Baruch expressed open regret that the Senate had excluded the military from the commission. But it remained for Senator Taft to come out bluntly and repudiate his own earlier vote. Pressed by Senator McMahon, he admitted that he would favor returning control of atomic energy to a military commission. At this point in the discussion, Capehart of Indiana introduced the question of the Truman policy in Greece and asked in seeming innocence why, in view of the world situation, it would not be "a sensible program . . . to return atomic energy to the military forces, where it belongs."

Having pushed their anti-Lilienthal arguments to such unplanned lengths, it was inevitable that the Taft crowd should go the rest of the way and repudiate the entire American position on atomic energy as put forth in the United Nations. It was all a terrible blunder, said Taft. On the international body that would control American atomic plants, "the great bulk of the personnel would be foreigners"—a bad feature of all those international arrangements. Sovereignty would be killed. Gromyko was right. Thus faded the bi-partisan foreign policy—and with it the neat but artificial division in the G. O. P., whereby Vandenberg was to guide it in the field of foreign affairs and Taft in matters domestic.

It is clear that the implications of the Lilienthal fight will only now begin to be felt. The commission itself will have to draw its every breath with care. But if its life is to be precariously lived, so is that of the Republican Party, which has recklessly exposed its deep divisions, its lack of program, and its general incompetence.

America and the I.T.O.

ON APRIL 8, representatives of eighteen leading trading nations gathered at Geneva, Switzerland, to participate in the second preparatory conference of the International Trade Organization and to begin negotiations for the reciprocal reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers. These two tasks are intimately connected. The draft charter of the I. T. O., which is to be reviewed by the conference, provides for a code of international economic behavior which, if generally adopted, would tend to prevent economic warfare and to promote international cooperation in the achievement of an expanding world economy. The reciprocal negotiations will serve as a kind of advance test of the principles of the charter. If they succeed, the prospects of putting the I. T. O. on a firm foundation will be immeasurably increased; if they fail, the I. T. O. may prove an empty dream.

The heaviest responsibility for success or failure falls on the United States. It is in this country that the techniques of reciprocal trade agreements have been developed and the I. T. O. is basically an American conception. Moreover, we have preached for years to the world about the varied sins of restrictionism—sometimes forgetting that we indulge in most of them ourselves. And we have used economic pressure to obtain support for our program; for instance, by making acceptance of the I. T. O. in principle a precondition of the British and French loans. Yet, despite this record of leadership, other nations represented at Geneva are wondering whether they can trust us to stand by our own child.

Ever since the G. O. P. victory last November, the protectionist forces in this country have been working to undermine the international economic policies of the government. Thanks to Senators Vandenberg and Millikin, Congressional attempts to make a direct assault on the I. T. O. and to obtain an indefinite postponement of the reciprocal-trade negotiations have been frustrated. Nevertheless, the Administration has been placed on the defensive and has been forced to promise the inclusion of "escape clauses" in all agreements. In addition, it has been driven to give the impression that no tariff changes that threaten serious injury to any industry will be made.

Literally interpreted, that undertaking would serve to vitiate the whole campaign for freer trade. The truth is—and the American people deserve to have this made clear to them—that most drastic downward revisions in the United States tariff are required if American foreign trade is to be placed on a sound basis. We are at present selling abroad some $10 billion worth of goods annually. If we want to continue to do this—and the pressure to export will increase as wartime domestic deficiencies are made up—we shall have to buy foreign goods and services to the same amount and, if foreign loans are to be repaid, we shall have to import more than we export. That means at least doubling the present volume of imports, a feat which is not going to be accomplished by swapping minor concessions with other countries. It will require, rather, the wide opening of doors to goods that can be more cheaply produced abroad and, undoubtedly, the immediate result will be most unpleasant for those industries which for years have enjoyed a parasitic growth behind tariff walls. The least efficient units in such industries will be likely to fall by the wayside and there will be a forced shift of capital and labor to other fields.

Such economic readjustments are always extremely painful but let no one suppose they can be avoided by leaving the tariff unchanged. For in that case we could continue to sell goods abroad on the present scale only so long as we were prepared to finance the excess of exports by foreign loans. When we got tired of this business of inviting defaults—the loans could only be repaid in goods—we would experience a tremendous slump in exports. That would mean the severe shrinkage of agricultural production, with the ruin of thousands of farmers, and curtailed output for our most efficient industries which are the ones most interested in export markets.

There is another point. Failure to achieve a better balance in world trade through the I. T. O. must lead to other countries depending more and more on bilateral exchanges of goods on the basis of deals between governments. Nations with planned and semi-socialized economies are much better equipped to use such methods than the United States, which relies on private enterprise to carry on its foreign commerce. If, at Geneva, plans to provide a sturdy framework for a system of multilateral trade are defeated, we are likely to find the United States government forced into the export-import business.

Is this what the G. O. P. wants? Obviously not and, dubious as we ourselves are about many of the "blessings" of private enterprise, we do not want to see socialism smuggled in by this back door. The price at which it would be secured would be much too high. It would include a loss of most of the advantages of the international division of labor, the reduction of international trade to a minimum, chronic economic warfare, and, in the not very long run, a new shooting war. We hope, therefore, that our representatives at Geneva will reassert American leadership boldly.

The Clash at Moscow

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, April 7

TODAY, at the beginning of the fifth week of the Foreign Ministers' conference, there is a disgruntled and even disgusted look on many faces—at the Moskva Hotel, at the Russian Foreign Office, at the British, American, and French embassies. But let us not say, as others are saying, "The conference has failed." There was no question of its "succeeding" in the sense that it could have produced a complete draft treaty "with" or "on" Germany. There was probably only one remark by Marshall throughout the conference with which Molotov cordially agreed: "It is more important to build solidly than to build fast." And Bevin, for his part, always took the view that treaty-making with Germany was a long process unlike any other treaty-making. He thought there would be a succession of Foreign Ministers' meetings, each of which would produce a new set of instructions for the Control Council and finally, after perhaps two years, the peace treaty itself would in fact simply "register" a certain status quo.

This is indeed unlike any other peace treaty. In the German problem, everything, or very nearly everything, is closely interrelated and interdependent. Political structure, demilitarization, economic unity, reparations, industry level, are closely linked. No agreement can be reached on a single issue without at the same time coming to a clear decision on all the rest. One might think of these five fundamental questions (there are others, but they matter less) as five horses on a race track whose task it is to arrive simultaneously at the finish. But when horse "Political Structure" has run halfway to the finish, and three others are only a few yards from the start, while "Reparations" is limping miserably even further behind, the prospect of the simultaneous arrival of all five at the finishing post is still in the dim future. Or to use a less elaborate simile: the problems of the German peace treaty are like ships in a convoy where the whole convoy's speed is determined by its slowest ship.

Industry level and reparations were the subject of a closed session of the Foreign Ministers' conference last Tuesday, and it was then that things went seriously wrong. After a three-and-a-half hours' meeting, the laconic announcement was made that "no decisions have been taken." And after that, for the rest of what had promised to be the most important week of the conference, the meeting with press officers Bohlen, Rudsale, and Offroy on today's developments resembled a chorus of loud yawns; nobody could get excited about whether Bevin's proposal concerning the representation of the länder in the Advisory Council had been accepted or Molotov's proposal on the right of zonal commanders to veto certain decisions of the central German agencies had been rejected.

As I wrote in my last article, some agreement on reparations was the key to progress. The main facts about this problem are well known. The Russians have been taking reparations from the Soviet zone, both in equipment and in current production. No figure has been given so far, though Molotov declared he would state in due course "up to the last kopek" what had been taken out. But the Russians deny that it amounts to very much. The Russians claim that they must have ten billion dollars of reparations—"only a small fraction of the damage caused to the Soviet Union by Germany" (which, of course, is perfectly true). They keep producing a secret Yalta agreement signed by Stalin and Roosevelt (though not by Churchill—and Bevin explained why Churchill didn't sign it, saying that the British government, including Bevin, kicked hard at the very suggestion). The British and Americans argue that Potsdam superseded this "tentative" Yalta agreement. Whereupon Pravda protests violently: "It was a soldiers' oath, not a tentative agreement." The British emphasize that no situation can be allowed in which Britain and America will be paying Russian reparations; Allied advances to Germany and the occupation costs must be paid first, and if the industry level is to be raised it is in order to put Germany on a sound economic basis and not primarily, as the Russians imagine, to pay reparations. The most the British will admit—though not yet officially—is that once the Anglo-American advances have been repaid by Germany and Germany is a going concern and there is an import-export surplus—then the Russians may get some reparations. Perhaps in five years, perhaps in ten years. Marshall, however, wouldn't accept even this principle of "deferred reparations" and has produced a tentative proposal about "compensating" Russia for the plants which they would not receive under the Potsdam agreement, owing to raising the industry level, by the equivalent in value of the deliveries from current production. Now the Russians have been extremely persistent in saying that western Germany has about three-fourths of the German industrial potential. It is now proposed to step up the industry level very considerably. What does this mean in practice? The Marshall proposal is surrounded by such a mass of conditions and provisos that it may add up to nothing in terms of tangible reparations. At best it means this: since the industry level is to be increased and the 15 percent of dismantled plants in western Germany will represent something exceedingly small from the standpoint of Russian reparations, a little extra to make up for the difference, a few odds and ends from current production, may be given to the Russians to shut them up.

The whole idea is presented to the Russians in a rather lordly manner as a gift from Uncle Sam. The reaction in the British delegation is significant: "Gosh, even we could do better than that. The Americans really are childish sometimes. To the Russians, reparations are a material issue, but above all they are a great moral issue—you have only to see the devastation in their country. Our American friends do have this charming but sometimes irritating habit of producing some adolescent brainwave and dressing it up as an act of statesmanship. This Marshall proposal is either that or simply a gratuitous insult. Anyway, it's about time a serious proposal were made. But this sort of thing won't get us anywhere."

The French, who are not "adolescent," have certainly produced a much more reasonable proposal—to set up a committee of inquiry to estimate how many years it would take with a higher industry level for Germany to balance her payments and pay off the British and American advances (since they insist these must have priority) and how soon a surplus will be left for reparations. The French think it will take two to three years, the Americans five years, the British ten years; but nobody knows exactly. All the more reason, say the French, why such an inquiry commission is desirable. In this there is a possibility for compromise and agreement, but meantime the deadlock is almost complete. The Russians are reluctant to abandon what they think is a modest claim of ten billion dollars ("only a little more than twice the American loan to Britain—and look at our devastation!"). But they would certainly consider some long-term scheme if it were offered them, provided it solved their reparations problem.

What naturally complicates matters is that the Russians so far have not produced any facts or figures about what they have taken from the eastern zone. But since they are not sure they are wanted to share in the control of the western zones, they are in no hurry to reveal anything beyond saying: "The Allies took out much more from Germany than we"—a charge against which Marshall has already violently protested.

Meanwhile, the Russians, for their part, are obviously in no hurry to conclude a peace treaty with Austria, and the British are saying that General Mark Clark and Gusev, who are deputies on the committee for the Austrian treaty, have developed such a personal hatred for each other that work has become practically impossible.

Nor have the talks on the Anglo-Soviet alliance made much progress so far. There is a strong impression that neither the Americans nor the Russians are in a hurry with this conference and both think—though for different reasons—that time is on their side—the Americans because they think the Russians will get into worse and worse economic difficulties in the Soviet zone and six months hence will be in a more reasonable mood to eat out of Uncle Sam's hand; the Russians, on the contrary, because they are now at the lowest post-war economic ebb, and six months hence, with a good harvest, will be in a less unfavorable position to be squeezed. Also they believe the anti-Red phobia in the United States may blow over by then.

As for the externals of the conference, as I already reported a month ago, there is nothing even remotely reminiscent of Congress of Vienna gaiety. These four men don't speak like wartime allies. The Americans especially speak to the Russians as they would speak to potential or probable enemies. Molotov is fairly calm; Bevin makes cracks tempered by touches of good-natured leg pulling; but Vishinsky goes off into public-prosecutor harangues on the German deputies' committee. The ordinary amenities of diplomatic decorum are hardly being observed by anybody—not even by the French who say, "Coal or nothing," which produces a growl from Bevin, "Are you trying to blackmail me?"

Britain Without Empire: II

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, March 28

INDIA AND BURMA

NO ONE can deny to Mr. Attlee and his colleagues both courage and imagination in their handling of India and Burma. They have acted as good Socialists in taking risks for freedom. They have given the Indian and Burmese peoples the power to share their own futures. This is a turning point in the history of Empire. If there is a more remarkable example of the renunciation of its authority by a great power, I do not know of it.

No doubt that decision creates profound difficulties in the case of India, which may be driven toward the tragedy of civil war by the aggressive refusal of the Moslem leaders to cooperate unless they are given their fantastic demand for the unreal and unworkable Pakistan. It is the Socialist view that the British government cannot be blackmailed by Mr. Jinnah and his followers into maintaining control over an India which resents its suzerainty to a point where it could only be maintained by force. If Mr. Churchill shows that he has learned nothing from the American Revolution, nothing even from that Irish Revolution he saw at first hand, a Socialist government cannot allow itself to lose its soul in fighting to maintain the authority of Great Britain as an alien power either in India or in Burma. These countries, having won their national freedom by consent, will be far more ready for friendly relations with Britain than they would be if that freedom were obtained only after bloody conflict.

Generosity paid Great Britain in South Africa; the fulfilment of an honorable pledge has, as the war recently made clear, paid handsome dividends to the United States. I hope strongly that India and Burma will safeguard their new status as independent communities, when their emancipation is effected, by treaties of mutual support, defensive and economic, within the framework of the United Nations. From the angle of trade, in particular, I am confident that the new relationship offers far better commercial prospects to Great Britain than it would enjoy if what capitalist reaction likes to call "a partnership" were reduced to a sullen succession of boycotts, strikes, and rebellions. The decision to quit India and Burma safeguards good-will, preserves British manpower at a time when it is sorely needed for production at home, and economizes upon an expenditure which ever since the time of Clive has brought benefits to a small privileged class but not to the community as a whole.

I believe, therefore, that this step will strengthen, and not weaken, the power of Great Britain. It will lessen its military burden. As India becomes industrialized, a process likely to be rapid, I believe that it will become an important new market, not least for British heavy industries; and I believe that this wise act of renunciation will win good-will for our people all over the Far East. I do not accept the view that Oriental nations only understand government by the "strong hand." That may be largely true of their ruling classes, which, in their feudal despotism, have only fear of freedom. But the ancient East is now in the midst of a vast revolution, itself part of a world revolution, in which those ruling classes will be increasingly compelled to justify and therefore to defend their right to power. They will be ever less able to do so as industrialization in the East moves on relentlessly; indeed, the fact that they are an anachronism will be ever more obvious. By the step the Labor government has taken in this area, it has joined the emerging future, instead of staying, as Mr. Churchill would have it stay, with the decaying past.

HONGKONG AND MALAYA

I regret that the Labor government decided to keep Hongkong and not to announce terms for its return to China. When the lease of Kowloon runs out, Hongkong will be indefensible, and a strong Chinese government is bound to seek for its possession. I should not be willing to see it handed over unconditionally to the present reactionary government of the Generalissimo and his cohorts of bandit generals and rapacious merchants; but its return to a unified China, seeking with all the patient persistence of the Chinese people to apply democratic principles to its own economic development, would be a different matter. Since the growth of Hongkong is almost wholly due to British effort, I think we are entitled to ask reasonable compensation for its return. Yet it is the part of wisdom to be generous and just. We cannot and we shall not want to go to war to keep Hongkong. It seems obvious, therefore, that statesmanship consists in leaving it under circumstances which strengthen every bond of Anglo-Chinese cooperation.

The loss of Singapore in 1942 was one of the most disastrous blows to British prestige that we suffered during the war; in a sense, it was a second, perhaps even more serious, Pearl Harbor. With our return to the Malay States and the building of their new federal relationship, our task there is a dual one. First and foremost, it is to civilize without exploitation; and, second, it is to make available for the world the vital resources of this rich area. There is small reason to suppose that the Malayan Federation will be ripe, at any early stage, for full self-government. But there is good reason for assuming that we could do in Malaya a great work patterned upon the remarkable achievements of Soviet Russia with its national minorities, notably with the Tartar Republic. I should like to see Great Britain buy out all private non-Malay owners in this area and seek to manage their mines and plantations under a system of public corporations directed by specialists engaged for that purpose, who would also have the task of developing increasing Malayan association in this enterprise. I do not doubt that this would be difficult, but, again, I think it would put Great Britain on the side of a future which, however long postponed, is nevertheless—if there be no Third World War—the inevitable shape of things to come.

AFRICA

The British problem in Africa is important, but it is not grave. No one seriously supposes that any one of our African colonies is ripe for self-government, or can be permitted to embark upon it. The real problem is how to get such a combination of imaginative insight and courage into the Colonial Office as will accomplish two things—one negative, and one positive. The negative thing is a stern and unbending refusal to give white settlers any final right to determine policy in our African colonies or to expropriate any more land or mineral rights, together with a prohibition of segregation and of compulsory labor for any but public purposes. The other, the positive thing, is rapid and audacious experimentation in the field of native education and in that of the cooperative marketing of native-produced crops under government supervision. The one issue upon which all our African policy turns is whether we are going to prepare for equality or to insist upon subordination.

I welcome the real but small effort the Colonial Office is making to increase the area of education in Africa; but it is not enough, not nearly enough. And we can too easily become so complacent about it—and about the new work of agricultural and labor advisers in this region—as to make our effort that homage of hypocrisy that vice, as La Rochefoucauld said, is wont to offer to virtue. There is little that can be defended in the parasitic record of white settlers in our African colonies; they live by a peonage at which I think even the citizens of Mississippi or Georgia would blush. Even less is to be said for the powerful absentee companies which own the great copper interests in Rhodesia; their fantastic dividends have been built upon indefensible African wage rates and have been made even more scandalous by the stolid refusal of their white employees to allow even a narrow gate of opportunity to be opened to African labor.

In short, the problem confronting Great Britain in Africa is the same in kind, if more complex and intense, as that so superbly described by Professor Myrdal in his "American Dilemma." And the answer is the same. We in Britain have everything to gain and nothing to lose by assisting the African to advance his standard of life, to get education, to develop the capacity to stand on his own feet, as he is drawn ever deeper into the consequences of industrialism. The greater his effective wants, the more advantageous are our mutual relations. The present situation merely benefits a small number of British settlers and British shareholders at the expense of the whole tax-paying community of this country. The fact that it provides employment for a few thousand civil servants, doctors, agricultural specialists, engineers, teachers, accountants, and so on is of quite minor importance when compared to the immense advantages we should gain from an educated Africa, using the latest agricultural methods, increasing the product per acre of its soil, developing its herds of cattle so that they become significant in the world market, mining its own ores, able, as it becomes the real master of its own resources, to become responsible proportionately for its own administration.

THE WEST INDIES

We are pledged to a great scheme of development for the West Indies. We have to change these "slums of Empire" into communities where economic adequacy makes self-government effective. Of the quality of the people there is no doubt. One of the ablest of my own colleagues is a West Indian Negro from Saint Lucia, who is not only one of the most promising of the younger economists in Great Britain but also, as he proved during the recent war in the Colonial Office, an administrator of exceptional talent. Responsible and representative government is already going through its inevitable growing pains in the West Indies; there will be no going back upon its implications. What the islands need, apart from political federation, is more education, more cheap capital, less economic dependence upon absentee ownership, and, above all, a plan to make them less tied to their staple industries, with more effective stabilization of prices, a better system of cooperative marketing, and a more determined attack on the evils of poor housing and bad health. There is real evidence that the report of the Royal Commission on the West Indies, completed as war broke out, awakened the Colonial Office to the need for action. But what is required is not very likely to be provided if, as during the war, when the possibilities of economic planning need to be surveyed the Colonial Office intrusts the task to an economist who starts from the postulate that a planned society is bound to fail.

There is slow but steady improvement in the colonial empire. It is not dramatic. It is not even always imaginative. And it is, as in Kenya and Rhodesia especially, far too tender of the vested interests of white settlers and of absentee economic control. But it does move: and in Mr. A. Creech Jones there is at last a colonial secretary who wants it to move. His problem is partly the need for imagination and audacity among his permanent officials in London, and partly the shortage of competent advisors, especially economists, who can be sent abroad. If we can get there, a new epoch may open in the development of the colonial peoples. But there must be a willingness in London to experiment quickly and widely with the institutions of self-government. Paternalism, however well meaning, is no substitute for freedom. And planning for democratic freedom will not come from men half of whose official lives has been passed in devotion to laissez-faire. Given ten years of positive experiment on the grand scale, we might well see a colonial revolution. But the supreme condition of its achievement will depend on the realization that the presence of raw materials in any territory is a reason for keeping out the white investor and not offering him a new field for exploitation. We are beginning a new chapter in the record. We are not writing annotations upon an old and outmoded text.

Monument to Hitler

BY KAY BOYLE

Offenbach, Germany, March

FIVE days ago I was riding through German country in a jeep, and the highways were black with ice, and gusts of snow as fine and dry as sand blew sharply across them. The side roads were three inches deep with a fresh, untouched fall of snow. The driver of the jeep was a tall colored man from Georgia who wore a fur cap on his head, and he'd been three years in Europe. He said this cold was as bad as any he'd yet seen. Driving out from Frankfurt toward Hanau, there had been the scattered areas of destruction—halted, suspended destruction, it had seemed, with the houses and factories ready to crumble and yet not crumbling, as if waiting still for the final bomb to fall. But out in the country the forests were thick and unbroken, and a transparent film of ice lay like a frozen veil across the summits of the trees. The hamlets we passed through were shockingly whole, as if they had refused their part in the annihilation of a continent. We were looking for a displaced persons' camp in the hills, but the name of the village where it lay did not appear on any map. It took us six hours to find it, and there I learned why the name had never been written down.

The D. P. camp had once been one of the largest S. S. training camps, and the fine, strong buildings which now housed fifteen thousand Poles had once been barracks for Hitler's élite troops. Here, inside the great gates, on the gradient of the hill, had been the officers' villas, their individual garages, their flower gardens, greenhouses, and strawberry beds. The enlisted men's blockhouses, kitchens, hospitals, canteens, and athletic fields stood higher, in the tall, meticulously pruned pines. The jeep driver from Georgia said, "Ma'am, I think you and I are going to end right up there in that cloud," as we climbed; and I thought maybe ten years ago, on a day as cold as this one, Hitler may have stood here, a foolish, skipping, well-larded little man in a military redingote, and said, with his finger on his lips, "Hush. Let the trees hide them a little longer. Let the name not be written. No one need speculate on the intention yet."

KAY BOYLE, the well-known novelist and short-story writer, lived in France for many years before the war. She is now revisiting Europe and writing stories for The Nation based on her current experiences.

Little enough is left of the trees, or the intention, now, for since the end of the war seventy-five thousand D. P.'s have passed through the camp, and the stumps which thrust through the snow between the blockhouses testify that the winters were hard. One German nurse in the camp hospital may have spoken for the people of Germany when she said, "Hitler and the others wouldn't recognize their beautiful place now." Hitler and the others were still singularly alive in Germany five days ago. They were not nearly so close to death as the children who lay in the D. P. camp infirmary beds. In the village below the camp, the townspeople have declared that they will hang every German who has worked for the Americans just as soon as the American military forces pull out. Hitler and the others were legendary men who made great promises to the little people, and now in the cold and the privation, and in the bitterness of defeat, the promises and the legend are all that is left, and they shine in the darkness like a Holy Grail.

"When I first came here, nearly two years ago," said the head nurse, a handsome Belgian girl in American uniform, "I couldn't speak with civility to the nurses and doctors—German P. W.'s the army handed us. After six months, I knew it couldn't go on like that. We had to work with a German staff, probably a 100 per cent Nazi staff, but we wanted to save all the lives we could. It took me six months to convince myself that medicine, like art, is international. But now I'm absolutely convinced. You have to accept it like that, or else you can't go on."

We were on the threshold of the babies' ward. There had been an epidemic of measles, and an aftermath of middle-ear trouble, the head nurse said as she opened the door. There were eight cribs in the room, four on each side, with their heads against the wall. The wood of them, like the wood of the floor, and the coarse sheets, and the indelibly stained aprons the doctors and nurses wore, were scrubbed fiercely, savagely clean. The room was warm with the heat from the great tile stoves, which were fed with logs through the doors into the corridor. Only one child of eight was crying, making a small undemanding, fretful noise, as it lay tied with a strip of white linen in its bed. It turned its head from side to side on the lifted pillow, and its right ear was as scarlet as a flower. The others were silent, but they were not sleeping; they were watching as young, wild, maimed birds and animals which can no longer flee will crouch in the underbrush and watch, fearful that a whisper will betray them. The one in the corner was no more than a slight rise in the neatly folded covers, and when you came close you saw that he lay on his side, his eyes open, fixed not on outer life but on some indescribable inner vista of terror and pain. He was two weeks old, the chart said, and his hands, like the claws of a cat, were tightly closed beneath his chin. The hairless skull was fragile as an eggshell, and the blue veins that threaded it jerked feebly with life. The shrunken yellow face under the bulging brow was that of an old man who had in his interminable lifetime experienced only disappointment, neglect, disease, disgrace, and who had come now, without an instant of compensation, to the consummate agony of the end.

"Abscesses," the head nurse said. "They brought him in three days ago. No response to penicillin."

There were two babies on the other side who lay facing each other from their separate cribs. Each had been born in the camp twenty-one days before, of Polish, unmarried mothers, and each was clinging hard to what flesh and blood and bone had been allowed him at the start. They drew the air in through their open mouths, as do the starving, as if the lungs themselves demanded in desperation that this be food and drink. Each had weighed nearly five kilos at birth, the charts showed, and after three weeks of life they weighed two kilos each.

"Starvation," the Belgian nurse said. "They had blood transfusions last night." There they lay, akin to nothing but those mummified, miniature beasts—bird, cat, or dog—which are found, dark-scaled and limbless, in Egyptian tombs. "The mother of this one was selling her milk on the black market," the nurse said. "But they've started gaining in the twenty-four hours we've had them. We'll bring them through."

In the crib near the door lay the beautiful, Slavice-faced boy, his dark hair cropped close as a prisoner's, his broad, flat-boned face placid with generations of pastoral content. He was a year or a year and a half old maybe, and at the sight of talking, animate people he dropped his black silky lashes on his smooth red cheeks and smiled. "His mother was trying to poison him," the head-nurse said, and there was no further explanation.

As we went out the door, we saw the little coffin coming toward us down the hall. It was made of fresh, unstained wood, with a peaked roof like that of a bird-house, and scarcely larger than one, and it was fitted with barrow-like handles at each end. The raw, ungloved hands of the mother and father carried it by these handles down the corridor, and on the bench outside the babies' ward they set it down. They raised their heads and looked at the head nurse as she passed, but they did not speak, they did not put the question to her. They took their places beside the coffin on the bench, and they folded their hands and waited. The head nurse opened the second door and we went in.

Inside the second room there was warmth again, and a three-year-old girl was propped up against the pillows, her thin, pale hair brushed out like winter sunlight, and two white pads laid on her eyes. She wore a tight little yellow sweater, shrunk short in the sleeves and tied with a red ribbon at the neck, and her small hands lay quiet on the thick, folded sheet. Her mouth was part scab, part running sore.

"I found her yesterday afternoon in one of the block-house attics," the head nurse said, her voice impatient, unsparing, grim. "They'd hidden her under a pile of rags. They don't trust what we do to sick children here. Tubercular infection. Her mother said her eyes were like that from a cold in the head, and didn't want me to take her off. That's another thing I've made up my mind about," the nurse said in her quick, hard French. "I don't care any more what adults do to adults; it's what they manage to do to children." There was nothing as weak as emotion in her voice. "Hitler said, 'Give me four years, just four years!' Well, he had his four years, he had them," she said.

The next day I went back to Offenbach in a Cadillac a German general had left behind—as he had left his great coat hanging on the door—and my driver was a Polish D. P. He was a young man, not more than thirty, and he had not seen Poland since the German invasion. He and his wife had been deported with the thousands of others to Berlin, and there he had worked five years, servicing German army vehicles. He had worked with the Nazis and for the Nazis, learned the language we now spoke together, read the German newspapers, heard their speeches, been bombed by day by the American Air Force, and when darkness fell by the Royal Air Force. He had been eighteen months in the D. P. camp, and had filed his papers with an American immigration organization. He wanted no more of Europe. He wanted to be an automobile mechanic in America. "Kein mehr Politiik," he said. "In America my wife and I can have a home, save money, begin life over again."

I told him he might find quite a lot of political talk in America. "There are even people who talk about another war," I said. The D. P. slowed down the Cadillac at a turn, and he glanced at me in surprise. "But of course. That is understandable. When we are all strong enough, we'll have to stop what is going on over there," he said. He motioned with his head toward the east. "Russland," he said. We drove on through the cold, bleak country which war had seemingly wiped clean of every living thing. "There is only one bridge left across the river this side of Frankfurt," he said, "so I have to watch out for the turning. With all these ruins you never know where you are."

I looked out of the car at the rubble. In the marshaling yards, the blasted trains, brought to a violent halt two years ago and lying in rigor mortis still, were piled in an endless chaos of twisted iron and rusted wire. The shell craters were still unfilled.

"Do you believe that in defeating Germany we wiped out Nazism?" I said as we rocked across the broken railway tracks, and the young man looked at me gently, patiently, as if half-amused.

"You do not seem to understand the situation," he said. "For Americans it is not easy to understand the situation over here. Nazism has not been destroyed; it is as strong in the people's hearts now as it ever was, and there is a very good reason why. You see," he went on, speaking with kindness and patience to me, "Germany is a small country, and it is an over-populated country. It must have space—it has always needed space. Hitler saw this, and even if he did some foolish things, he united the people of Germany in that great idea. The stronger countries came along, and they killed a great many Germans and destroyed a great many German cities, but whatever they have done, the situation has not been changed. Germany is still a small country, too small to support its population."

Through Hanau to Offenbach there is much destruction. At one corner where a house stands wide open to the sky, long, tough sections of plaster and wiring swing in the upper story like hung men in the wind. And as the homeless, the penniless, the lost young D. P. drove the Cadillac down the cobbled street, he went on saying: "They must have space. You Americans who are so far away cannot understand that the Germans must have space and the freedom to expand. Das ist Logik now to expand toward the east, free Poland, and finish with the Russian question. Das ist Logik. It has to be."

The signs, in both English and German, said that vehicles should drive slowly across the bridge, and it trembled now beneath the weight of the car. It was the coldest day of all, and under the bridge great, static blocks of ice marked where the river lay, and seagulls, bleak and mute, with their wings folded close, had gathered on them. The bridge was old, and they had put new boards across as if to save it, but it could not last another war.

The Farmer Pays His Debts

BY JAMES HEARST

Cedar Falls, Iowa, April 4

THEY say that the farmer is getting rich. If he is, I think the public is entitled to know something about it, to know how rich he is and what he is doing with his money. The public has a right to know these things because in part it was the public's money which helped rehabilitate the farmer back in the 1930's. In those days the farmer was a poor but honest free enterpriser who was bankrupt and didn't know it. In struggling to pay off his obligations he was sliding deeper and deeper into debt because through no fault of his own the price level had sunk from under him. Even the cold eye of the United States Department of Agriculture viewed his efforts with sympathy, and these words were spoken in his behalf: "Bankruptcy . . . is used relatively infrequently by farmers as a method for dealing with an untenable debt situation." Of course today, if the farmer is getting rich, he has no need of such character references, and all talk of bankruptcy should be forgotten. The trouble is that the farmer's memories are beginning to haunt him, and signs of his apprehension are as thick as falling leaves in a cold October rain.

The city consumer, the farmer's best customer, occasionally reads a statement about farm income released by the Department of Agriculture. He may have read that for the year 1945 farm income was twenty-one billion and some odd dollars. It probably seemed like a lot of money. It seemed that way to the farmer, too. It is enough to make anyone wonder what the farmer is worrying about.

One thing that worries him is that the twenty-one-billion-dollar income was not what it seemed. To the farmer, it is misrepresentation to give these reports in terms of gross income. Anyone who has been in business knows that it is possible to have a whale of a gross income and still end the fiscal year with a net loss.

Let us examine the books of the average farmer. Take a young fellow in Iowa operating a quarter-section, 160 acres, of fairly good land. Let's say that he has a wife and a couple of youngsters. As he is the average young farmer, he either rents the land or has borrowed the money with which to buy it. Now along comes a Department of Agriculture statistician and says that the average Iowa farmer's income in 1946 was $7,000.

Let us draw up a financial statement for him as of January 1, first showing what his capitalization would be. Conservative estimates on a good farm of that size, not the best but a good farm with modern buildings, would price it at about $200 an acre. So we have:

Land	$24,000
Buildings	8,000
Livestock
2 horses	$ 150
20 cows	4,000
30 brood sows	1,800
300 chickens	450
Machinery (including tractor).....	5,000
Feed
corn	3,000
oats	1,500
hay	400
straw	100
ensilage	320
	$48,720

To amortize this capitalization at 4 per cent would add an interest charge of $1,948.80 to his expenses. Now let us estimate the expense column of his operating statement and see what his net income really is:

Labor (three-fourths of the year)	$1,000
Taxes (property)	240
Taxes (income)	74
Insurance (buildings)	120
Repairs (buildings, fences, and machinery).....	500
Gasoline and oil	320
Machine hire (threshing, baling, grinding).....	500
Interest	1,948
Depreciation	600

$5,302

JAMES HEARST of Maplehears Farm, Cedar Falls, Iowa, has contributed articles to The Nation and other magazines presenting a reflective farmer's views on problems close to his work and life.

These are the obvious expenses. There would be some others for tools and such supplies as twine, sacks, seeds, and nursery stock. On the other hand, our average farmer would not pay out any actual money for depreciation. I think we might fairly settle on a net income, in round figures, of $2,000. This is the money with which he feeds and clothes his family, pays his doctor and dentist, buys personal insurance, pays for his automobile. It doesn't seem a large sum to me, not when I consider the risk he takes.

But at least our average farmer is in the clear. The road ahead seems straight, level, and wide. Farm production is still rising. Prices are high, and Congress has promised, through the Steagall amendment, that they shall be maintained at 90 per cent of parity until the end of 1948. If they are, what has the farmer to fear? Why is he nervous?

The older farmers remember the storms of the 1920's and the ruin that followed in their wake. The younger men see the repeated warnings in the farm papers: "Post-war depressions likely to occur first in agriculture"; "The depression for agriculture may be more prolonged than the industrial depression." Moreover, the farmers, with native skepticism, put little faith in the Steagall amendment. There is no machinery designed to restore prices to the promised level. Congress often fails to bolster its good intentions with technical competence. Farm prices depend for their stability upon the nation's purchasing power, and according to the economists of a Midwest college, "Whether purchasing power will be strong enough in the latter half of 1947 is doubtful—1948 is very doubtful." Senator George D. Aiken, second in command on the Senate Agricultural Committee, frankly told the dairy-plant operators of Vermont, "In the years ahead the greatest single problem confronting American agriculture will be to find markets for all that our nation's farmers will produce."

Already bankers are being advised to tighten the credit lines extended to less efficient farmers and those on less productive land.

The well-known and respected farm economists Frank Pearson and William Meyers, of Cornell University, make this significant statement: "The post-war collapse in 1920-21 occurred despite the general belief that there . . . was a shortage of anything that could be named. Then as now everyone was worrying about inflation, but deflation was the real threat and may again be the real problem."

Words like these produce a ringing in the farmer's ears. The continued silence on the part of Secretary Anderson and the cloudy proposals of the G. O. P.-dominated Congress concerning food exports seem to make audible the sound of buck-passing. The savage attack on the reciprocal-trade treaties by nearsighted Senators destroys more of the farmer's confidence. He feels that the old isolationist gang expect to break the farmer's back again with surpluses while the hungry world wails at the tariff wall. A shiver has passed through the price structure and he has felt it.

For the most part, the average farmer is a conservative person who moves rather slowly into social action. But this conservatism does not prevent him from doing what he can, now, to build up his defenses against economic perils. Here in Iowa, where we all really live off the farmer's labor, agriculture is beginning to rouse itself. Some years ago the farmers in this state became intensely interested in our tax structure. It had, like the tariff system, promised them much and gouged them plenty. After considerable study, we farmers in 1934 persuaded the state legislature to pass what was called the "three-point" tax system. One of these three points was a state income tax. This system gave the farmer a chance, for once in his life, to stand up under the burden of the property tax and take a deep breath.

But as time went on a balance began to appear in the various state tax treasuries, and, in spite of the scandalous conditions existing in our state institutions, the legislature passed a law "forgiving" half of the income tax. The law expires this year and people with large incomes, the ones best able to pay, are fighting tooth and nail to have it reenacted.

The Iowa Farm Bureau Federation has made a study of the situation and come to these conclusions: Property taxes are quietly rising again; for school purposes alone property taxes have increased nine million dollars in the last two years. Instead of being equalized, taxes are being shifted from the rich to the poor; the state is losing revenue which is badly needed for education, for mental hospitals, for institutions of corrective training. The Iowa Farm Bureau explains that every county farm bureau in the state has asked for full collection of the income tax. Pointing its finger straight at the target, it says, "It's the Iowa Taxpayers' Association, the Republican Central Committee, and the Iowa Manufacturers' Association that don't wish to pay income taxes." Against the pressures these groups bring to bear in the state legislature, the farmers have gathered their forces.

One thing the average farmer is doing with his $2,000 income is paying off his debts. In 1923 the nation's farm-mortgage debt amounted to $10,785,621,000; in 1946 it was only $5,080,717,000. Many economists think that the reduction may be the means of saving agriculture from a depression.

This sounds like a good thing for farmers, but other readers of The Nation may ask, what about the rest of us. I assure you that it is good news for you too. Just as surely as the farmer is dependent upon labor and capital for the support of his price level, so capital and labor rely directly on farm purchasing power for their own production and wages. It is a sad paradox that when food prices are lowest, bread lines are longest. The phenomenon arises, I believe, from the economic fact that industry cannot adjust itself easily to a falling price level. When farm prices begin to fall and farmers cease to buy, industry must close up shop and put its workers out on the street until there is a return of purchasing power or until the price level becomes more stable. The farm-machinery manufacturers learned long ago that ten-cent corn will not buy an $800 tractor.

Notes on Jamaica

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

Ocho Rios, Jamaica

I AM returning from my leave of absence by way of Jamaica, having taken a detour around what seems to have been the winter to end winters, at home and abroad. It wasn't possible to by-pass Miami which looks more than ever like a fake country town with a fake country fair in progress. Flying away from it was a pleasure, even to a scared amateur flyer, and the trip to Kingston was so smooth and quiet that I wasn't even bothered when the pilot came in and sat with the passengers during most of the journey. We stopped only once, in Camaguey, Cuba. In the little station there a sign was posted advising passengers to buy liquor at the bar and not from unauthorized solicitors. The proprietor of the bar, said the Spanish, was "co-operating with the employees of this company." The English translation gave a quite different impression. It said that the proprietor was "helping against the employees of this company." This little study in Hispano-American relations, con and contra, was somehow capped when an American business man, reading the English, which was good enough for him, murmured knowingly to his wife, "Hm, seem to be havin' labor trouble here."

The first thing I discovered in Kingston was that world prices had preceded me by several flights, and that my countrymen on vacation, determined as they always are to pretend that nothing can feaze them, had made the island practically uninhabitable for people in the modest brackets. American tourists and the peoples they visit seem to bring out the worst in each other—overspending on the one side and gouging on the other. It is an exchange which corrupts the atmosphere, and the process has gone pretty far in this island paradise. I crossed the island by rail—tourists usually go by car—and I think I was the only white person on the train. Most of the time I was the sole occupant of the first-class compartment—a rather battered wooden observation car at the end of a battered train. It was a long slow trip, but the landscape, the altitude, the vegetation, the weather, and our speed changed so frequently that it was far from monotonous. Plains, hills, mountains. Plantations of cane, cocoanuts, bananas. Ranch lands with Indian cattle grazing. Cactus and poinsettias, hibiscus, bougainvillea. Glimpses of blue sea now and then. Sultry blue skies and massed clouds, black or white, and always a breeze—it's called "the doctor."

Toward the end of the day the hardworking engine pulled us slowly up into the Cockpit Mountains—wonderfully named. We careened down, around curves, through tunnels, through alternate rain and shine, playing crack the whip over the high broken landscape.

Occasionally a few Jamaicans joined me in my first-class loneliness—among them a family of Chinese, mother, father, and two small boys, who looked as if they had just stepped out of a handbox instead of a remote mountain village. At intervals a very pleasant young colored man came in for a chat—a government employee who travels about the island. He was well-informed and patient with questions. We discussed politics and economics, exports and imports, education and the native language. He told me at one point that 75 per cent of Jamaicans have an inferiority complex, and the old phrase reverberated curiously as I looked out at coconut palms and women carrying baskets on their heads.

The pirates are back in Jamaica running hotels in Montego Bay. Not so bold as those in Miami or Palm Beach, but bold enough. Food prices have gone up, though forty cents a pound is the top price for beef and the prices of pork, goat's flesh, and mutton stand at twenty, twenty-five, and thirty cents respectively. But labor is still cheap, and considering that most hotel employees get no more than ten or twelve shillings a week (the shilling is worth about twenty cents) and must feed themselves, the proprietor of a third-rate hotel who gets fourteen dollars a day, per person, for a small double room isn't doing so badly. Jamaicans who are not hotel-keepers are uneasy about it and predict the death of the goose that lays the golden egg. They have reason. In a year or so it will probably cost no more to visit Europe.

If you have a cottage of your own, it is still possible to live rather grandly for relatively little. Consider this advertisement for help—most of the ads are those of Domestic Workers Wanting Positions:

HELP: An Experienced Woman as general domestic. Only hard worker need apply. Wages twenty-eight shillings monthly with meals.

Twenty-eight shillings are approximately $5.60. But you would probably have to pay as much as fifteen shillings a week for a cook or a houseboy. Old settlers pay ten or less. A very good laundress or cleaner can be had for two and a half shillings a day. Even cooks, however, are in most cases supposed to feed themselves.

The ads of Domestic Workers Wanting Positions are rather intriguing. "A Decent Young Girl from the country seeks position. . . ." That is the usual wording. The other day, for a change, I noted that "A Big Woman seeks position cooking, washing, or cleaning."

It isn't polite to wonder out loud how the natives live on ten shillings—or less—a week. (The stock remark is that they can pick breadfruit off the trees and that they like raw fish.) I go on wondering, nevertheless. And apparently the natives think about it a good deal, for Jamaica has been having a strike wave for some time now. The most belligerent and picturesque leader of labor is W. A. Bustamante, head of the Bustamante Industrial Workers' Union—that's its name. He also heads the Labor Party, which is the majority party. Mr. Bustamante is Minister for Communications—and de facto Prime Minister—in the present government; and he communicates steadily in extremely violent language which is all duly reported in the Daily Gleaner. He has been calling strikes on the sugar plantations, and the port workers in Kingston were out not long ago. The workers in Montego Bay, according to Bustamante, are a backward lot, and he recently delivered a blistering attack on them for scabbing. But he reserves most of his attacks for employers. Everyone admits that he has done a good deal for labor—and there is plenty to do. Everyone deplores his methods. Where have we heard that before? He talks openly, for instance, about the color question. He's always "stirring these people up," and that of course is considered most unfortunate. It's difficult to say whether or not Bustamante is a "good" labor leader but he certainly has a wide streak of the demagogue in his makeup. "My" and "I" loom large in his vocabulary, and he likes the sound of his own voice. He speaks often of his close relations with God and of the sacrifices he has made to help "my people." At the same time, he boasts of being rich. A man who knew him even before he began his career as a labor leader says that he has a genuine interest in labor's problems, but that he also is ambitious and conceited. Bustamante is a Jamaican, a colored man. His real name is Clarke. He spent some time in Spain, where he picked up his present name. When he came back to Jamaica he set himself up as a usurer but had no success. Soon afterward he emerged as a labor leader. To show Bustamante's sympathy for labor, my informant recalled an incident in which Bustamante refused to eat with an employer, who happened also to be a relative, because he had just heard that one of this relative's employees who got seven shillings a week had been fined four of these shillings for some offense or other and had three shillings left with which to feed his family.

Many people predict Bustamante's early eclipse, but he has an unlimited supply of underpaid workers for whom to make demands. Moreover, his histrionic ways are designed to appeal to the illiterate poor and under the present universal suffrage law no literacy test is required. Reading his speeches—they are often quite amusing—one is reminded of both John L. Lewis and Huey Long, and given the human, economic, and political situation here, that combination, on a small scale, is just about what one might expect in a labor leader in Jamaica in 1947.

Caricature by Seligson
W. A. Bustamante

The situation is not pretty. In New York, Jamaican colored people are looked upon, even by American Negroes, as superior in status and in education. Just before I came away I spoke to a colored maid who, I had heard, was a Jamaican. "No," she said laughing, "I'm not from Jamaica. I'm just one of the uneducated ones." Many colored people here are educated, but the "uneducated ones" are much in evidence. They seem a kindly, carefree lot and have nice voices. They are also poor, backward, and superstitious. The population is increasing rapidly, and even now there are not enough jobs to go around. I have no less an authority than the Bishop of the Windward Isles—what a lovely title—for the statement that 50 per cent of the children here don't go to school. He also quoted Lloyd George's description of the West Indies as the slums of the empire. Setting them to rights will not be an easy task—and, after all, Jamaica is only one of the minor messes which the Labor government has inherited.

A Democratic Assembly

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE Americans for Democratic Action got themselves organized in a businesslike session in Washington on the weekend of March 29-30. About 300 citizens convened at 10 a.m. Saturday on the top floor of the Hotel Washington and dispersed to their homes at 3 p.m. Sunday, having got through an agenda which the most hopeful would have judged hopelessly crowded before Wilson Wyatt's opening gavel fell.

A sense of urgency seemed to underline the debate on foreign policy, domestic policy, and organizing plans; so that views were stated and votes taken which combined the efforts of Mr. Wyatt, Leon Henderson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., David Dubinsky, Mayor Hubert H. Humphrey of Minneapolis, Lillian Smith, Marquis Childs, Mrs. Gifford Pinchot, Thomas K. Finletter, Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., Alfred Baker Lewis, and many others including a Student Federalist from Yale, a Farmer-Laborite from Wisconsin, a budding politico from Kansas City, an American Veterans Committee chairman from Baltimore, a Cleveland lawyer, an American Farm-Labor Union organizer from Memphis, and a professor from the New School in New York.

From such disparateness came unity: the sort of unity which allows for diversity as to details. A.D.A.'s unity seemed genuine, not verbal, because there was agreement on objectives ("a society in which each individual enjoys the highest degree of personal liberty compatible with liberty, justice, and economic security for his fellows"); and on tactics ("a faith in human reason and the power of free inquiry," a devotion to the town meeting rather than to the mass meeting).

One question had better be faced at once. "Isn't A.D.A. obsessively anti-Communist?" Answer: No. Explicitly non-Communist would be more accurate. Near the end of its statement on general objectives, A.D.A. says that the democratic spirit is direly threatened by "the wealth and power of the organized forces of reaction . . . [i.e.] fascism." Then: "In our time the democratic idea is also threatened by the Communist forces that reject democratic values of truth, justice, and freedom, in the interests of a police state." The Communist issue cropped up only two or three times in the two days' discussion. The group seemed politically mature; its members accepted one another as lower-case democrats and set about the serious task of devising a program of action which might enlist the support of many other lower-case democrats.

The program, to be sure, will not have a high Hooper rating this spring while most of America talks about cutting taxes, balancing budgets, policing the world, and pursuing private lives, all at the same time. The machines —of all makes—will not like it. The meeting was thin on Republicans, thin on farmers, and terribly thin on those in governmental, economic, and political power. It was top-heavy with old New Dealers. The program adopted is an extension of the New Deal program.

Yet there was a special spark struck: Hubert Humphrey twice enkindled the assembly with talk of practical political action. The young mayor of Minneapolis, who combines the best features of a native American radical, a Billy Sunday revival meeting, and a perpetual-motion machine, gave the delegates some home truths about American politics. After speakers, including Mrs. Roosevelt, had described in large terms the dream of A.D.A., he said, "Okay, you can relax now. I'm the tap-dancer who entertains between the acts." Then, belying his words, he told how to live-the dream in the practice of party caucuses, wards, precincts, getting out the vote, telling the story in their own language to the farmers and workers of his country.

Paul Porter spoke on Saturday morning about the Truman Doctrine; a majority of the delegates attended the open hearing of the foreign policy commission from 8 p.m. until midnight; the commission redrafted its resolutions until 4 in the morning; the plenary session hammered out the final draft from noon until 3 on Sunday. In large, the result was a hopeful progressive document, which called unequivocally for strengthening the United Nations into a limited world government, and which on many specific points of world conflict declared that the only way to eventual solution was through granting the U.N. adequate material, legal, and economic powers. In the face of this, a majority of the delegates supported military as well as economic aid to Greece and Turkey.

Was this a by-product of the A. D. A.'s "anti-communism"? After serious consideration (and after opposing and voting against the policy), I am sure it was not. Rather, I believe it was a vestigial remnant of old-fashioned "practical" thinking on the part of the majority. The argument—chiefly and ably articulated by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., and Marquis Childs—ran like this: the United Nations is the only hope; we must strengthen it; cooperation between the United States and the Soviet Union is the only basis for that strengthening; such cooperation cannot flow from weakness; therefore we must stem Soviet expansion; therefore we must hold our noses and aid Greece and Turkey. The argument overlooks the fact that by pursuing a unilateral policy you inevitably undercut any multilateral policy; yet I believe it was advanced in good faith (which may be the death of us yet). At any rate, there is opposition to it within A.D.A.; and since its members make up their minds on the basis of facts and arguments, not of orders from above, there is a fighting chance for the present minority to convert the majority.

KEITH HUTCHISON

America's World Bank

THIRTEEN months after its formal inauguration at Savannah, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development has yet to make its first loan. This is not due to any lack of demand for its services. Eight member countries have made bids for a total of $2,310 millions and, while some of their applications are in too tentative a form for action, others have been submitted with detailed plans which have been carefully examined by the bank's economic experts.

One reason for delay has been the difficulty in finding and keeping a president for the institution. In theory, this officer is selected by the twelve-man board of executive directors elected by member countries; in practise, there is an unwritten agreement to allow the United States, as the largest investor in the bank, the right of nomination. The president is paid $30,000 tax-free, but despite this attractive remuneration and the dignity and prestige supposedly attached to the position, it proved hard from the first to persuade any qualified person to accept it. At length, after a three-month canvass, Eugene Meyer, eminent publisher of the Washington Post and former chairman of the Federal Reserve System, agreed to undertake the task, amid general applause.

Six months later, Mr. Meyer resigned, giving explanations that satisfied nobody, and the frantic hunt was resumed. For another three months, business was held up while financial circles gossiped about internal difficulties which led one candidate after another to refuse the prize. Finally, John J. McCloy, a corporation lawyer with banking connections and former Assistant Secretary for War, agreed to accept the nomination. He did so on his own terms, one of which was the resignation of the American executive director, Emilio G. Collado, and his replacement by Eugene R. Black, vice-chairman of the Chase National Bank. Simultaneously, Mr. McCloy appointed Robert L. Garner, a director of General Foods and formerly connected with the Guaranty Trust Company, as vice-president.

As a result of these changes, the New York financial community is now strongly represented at International Bank headquarters and its former coldness to the institution has been replaced by a more cooperative attitude. This is important because the bank's dollar resources, which will reach something over $700 million by the end of May, are totally inadequate to meet the demand on it for dollar loans. Consequently, unless its activities are to be severely restricted, it must market its own securities in the United States—an operation that can only be carried out with the blessing of the big financial institutions. That this will probably now be forthcoming is indicated by a bill, authorizing New York savings banks to invest their funds in International Bank debentures, which now awaits Governor Dewey's signature.

For months, this measure had been kicked around at Albany but as soon as McCloy's appointment was confirmed it passed both houses of the state legislature without difficulty.

Prospects for obtaining additional resources in the New York market have, therefore, brightened perceptibly, and a small experimental issue of bank debentures will probably be made in the next few months. But undoubtedly the heads of the dozen or so investment houses and insurance companies which dominate the securities market will keep a sharp eye on the kind of loans the bank makes. They are not likely to look with approval on borrowing by countries that have failed to make what Wall Street considers a satisfactory settlement of private debts, or on those which nationalize industries in which American capital is invested. And if the directors and officers of the International Bank should ignore their frowns, the market for bank debentures will probably become very sticky. That means that Wall Street can pull the new institution up short whenever it sees fit.

The advent of Mr. McCloy did not create this braking power which is implicit in the dependence of the bank on American capital; it merely put into the chauffeur's place a man the private bankers could trust, and so reduced the need for back-seat driving. And the appointment of Mr. Black should also make for smoother riding, since, in this rather complicated financial vehicle, he will operate dual controls on behalf of the American government.

The United States holds 37½ per cent of the voting power in the bank and, in addition, the articles of agreement provide that the bank can only borrow funds with the approval of the member in whose market those funds are raised. So long, therefore, as this is the one large country with surplus capital, it will exercise a practical veto on the bank's operations.

The Bretton Woods Agreements Act, which provided for American participation in both the International Bank and the International Fund, set up a National Advisory Council on International and Monetary Policy. This body, known as the N.A.C., is composed of the Secretaries of the Treasury, State, and War, the chairman of the Federal Reserve System, and the chairman of the Export-Import Bank. Its function is to issue policy directives to the American executive directors of both the International Bank and International Fund, and this means, I am reliably informed, that it debates at length every loan request made to the former. But while the bank and its officers are prohibited from reaching decisions on political grounds, the N.A.C. does not appear to limit itself in the same way.

I am told, for instance, that a request by Poland for a very large loan, part of it earmarked for rehabilitation and expansion of the Polish coal fields, has been held up in the N.A.C. because one member insisted that the Poles were "without integrity." This sweeping indictment of a people, it is to be feared, may bar Europe from supplies of fuel which it desperately needs. I am sure that is bad economics and, in view of the fact that poverty is communism's best ally, short-sighted politics as well. In an even more curious case, objection was raised to the proposed use by Chile of part of an International Bank loan to develop oil lands which, under Chilean constitutional law, cannot be alienated from the state. The encouragement of a socialized oil industry, it was suggested, might have unfortunate repercussions on American oil interests in Latin America. This particular difficulty was overcome, but it is indicative of thinking in Washington which is thoroughly in harmony with Wall Street ideas. Critics who object that it hardly harmonizes with the spirit of internationalism will doubtless be reminded that those who pay the piper call the tune.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

TO COMMERCIAL broadcasters, of which there are now more than 1,100 in the United States, educational programs on both the juvenile and adult level have always been an unadulterated pain in the pocketbook. They required a lot of work, considerable acumen, and more money than most stations were willing to spend on sustaining programs; they rarely produced any appreciable listener reaction; and they were never bait for sponsors.

There were and are exceptions, of course, but commercial radio has always given educational shows a failing grade. Although it has classed educational stations as freaks, however, it never actively fought the educational and non-commercial operators. It had very little reason to fear them. Too many of the educational institutions which had licenses to operate radio stations in the early days let them go by default. Today the only commercially operated stations that come to mind are WWL, New Orleans, owned and operated by Loyola University, and WHCU, Ithaca, the property of Cornell, and Georgia Tech's WGST. Altogether, the educational and municipally owned and operated stations number only thirty.

Recently, though, a bill was introduced in the California legislature calling for $1,700,000 for a non-commercial network of FM stations to be run by the state Department of Education. Back of this is the University of California's desire to carry its extension courses beyond the physical border of its campus.

In itself this is nothing new. The Federal Communications Commission has set aside twenty channels for non-commercial, educational FM stations. The states of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan have educational FM networks either in operation or under construction. There are and have been non-commercial FM stations ever since frequency modulation was started, although they are even fewer than the thirty AM educational stations. Yet suddenly, and for no apparent reason except greed, the commercial broadcasters of California took a stand in opposition to the California educators.

Charles McCarthy, head of the Northern California Broadcasters Association, hurried home from Washington, D. C., to confer with Robert Reynolds, his counterpart in the Southern California Broadcasters Association, and other industry chieftains. Between them, they set out to organize a united front of commercial operators against the plan.

Since McCarthy is general manager of KQW, a network affiliate in San Francisco, and Reynolds is general manager of KMPC in Los Angeles, and their organizations include most, if not all, the commercial operators in California, there was no doubt they could lead a vicious fight. But still the issue was not clear. After all, these were the big commercial-station men, the dollars-and-cents operators in AM, not FM; in what way did they and their interests conflict with the educators' plans for FM? It just didn't make sense.

Then the story broke in the trade press. Variety reported: "Commercial . . . broadcasters want no part of what they feel will be definite competition for audience." And Broadcasting referred significantly to "this threat to freedom of expression" (sic).

That let the cat out of the bag. The self-same broadcasters who have been shouting for freedom of speech and free competition from every and any luncheon lecturer they could get—these same people wanted to bar the educators.

It wasn't because the radio business was doing badly; last year radio sold $325,000,000 worth of time to reach an all-time record and a 7 per cent increase over the previous year. It wasn't because the commercial broadcasters were doing a good educational job. Nor was it because the educators were proposing something illegal.

Federal Communications Commissioner Paul A. Walker said, when queried, "State educational networks offer an effective means of carrying educational programs to schools and communities throughout the states. It has never occurred to us that educational stations could be, in any way, a threat to commercial broadcasting. In fact, it is my personal opinion that such stations would be a tremendous impetus to broadcasting generally and would encourage and assist commercial stations through developing listening habits and greater audiences. To my way of thinking, the opposition to the California Educational Network is exceedingly . . . short-sighted."

It was short-sighted for a number of reasons. First, it pointed up the fact that commercial radio was doing so bad a job as to be afraid of losing some listeners to the educators.

Second, it suggested the possibility that the commercial radio interests were hoping to get hold of the twenty FM channels now set aside for educational use by keeping the educators from using them.

Third, and most important, it spotlighted, once again, the fight between public service and dollar service in radio.

The educators, via their National Association of Educational Broadcasters and the Association for Education by Radio, are fighting back. The Los Angeles Board of Education has allocated funds for an engineering study of its requirements preparatory to filing for an FM frequency to be used by the city and the city educators. This, in effect, puts Los Angeles solidly on the side of the angels.

But a few letters addressed to the Federal Communications Commission and the National Association of Broadcasters, both in Washington, D. C., will do no harm.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Some Reflections on the American Press

A FREE AND RESPONSIBLE PRESS.
University of Chicago Press. $2.

A GROUP of gentlemen operating under the official-sounding title of the Commission on Freedom of the Press has published a slender book called "A Free and Responsible Press" that may be a mild shock to Henry R. Luce, who in 1942 plunked down $200,000 to finance the group's work. The membership of the commission, selected by Robert Maynard Hutchins, includes no types remotely resembling George Seldes or Upton Sinclair, and yet the book, subtitled "A General Report on Mass Communication: Radio, Motion Pictures, Magazines, and Books," has little good to say about the American press of which Mr. Luce's publications form so imposing a segment. Certain of the strictures even seem to have been set down with Time-Life operating procedure particularly in mind.

"Of equal importance with reportorial accuracy are the identification of fact as fact and opinion as opinion, and their separation, so far as possible," the commission says, high on its list of requirements for a free and responsible press. "This is necessary all the way from the reporter's file, up through the copy and makeup desks and the editorial offices, to the final, published product." And again "Sales talk should be plainly labeled as such whether for toothpastes or tariffs, cosmetics or cosmic reforms, devices for reducing waists or raising prices."

Mr. Hutchins as chairman of the commission contributes a foreword in which he tells how the commission came to be, as a result of a brief conversation between Mr. Luce and him at a meeting of the board of William Benton's Encyclopaedia Britannica, Inc.—Old Yales are always up to big things—and how the commission worked, banging out every line of the report after argument, so that it is a collective expression. He says the commission carried out no elaborate "research"—the quotation marks are his, as if he considered the word a neologism—and I was inclined to wonder uncharitably as I read the book what they had spent the $200,000 on: it contains some sound, unoriginal reflections, but nothing worth over one grand even at Ladies Home Journal rates. It does not shed as much light on our journalistic dilemma as Morris Ernst's 1946 book, "The First Freedom," or the even more exciting seventy-two-page pamphlet printed for the Senate Small Businesses Committee—"Survival of a Free, Competitive Press," which you have to write to the committee to get, if there are any copies left.

Nevertheless, the book has importance in the long struggle for a truly free press that is beginning all over again because of technical advances which have wiped out the old freedom of any effective journalist who could hire a handpress to start an effective newspaper. It is important because a group that includes John Dickinson, Professor of Law at the University of Pennsylvania and general counsel for the Pennsylvania Railroad, and Beardsley Ruml, chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, as well as Archibald MacLeish and Arthur M. Schlesinger and William E. Hocking (there are thirteen members of the commission altogether, all with impressive signatures) has publicly recognized that the American press is more or less of a mess. The collective authors refuse to accept the propaganda put out by the officers of press associations and schools of journalism that the press is our national glory, distinguishing us from lesser breeds. They don't even think much of schools of journalism.

Their statement of the technical changes which have threatened a conception of press freedom that was fairly adequate in colonial times is concise and convincing. Their view of the performance of the press in our time is marked by considerable asperity—and a lot of sharp insights which break through at unpredictable places, as if some one member of the commission, with more feeling for newspapering than the others, was talking on a more craftsmanlike level all the time but only occasionally getting his remarks into the record. I liked particularly the commission's recognition of the death of mutual criticism among newspapers, and its almost certainly futile recommendation that it be revived.

"Whatever its shortcomings, the American press is less venal and less subservient to political and economic pressure than that of many other countries," the commission states. It doesn't say that the American press isn't venal or isn't subservient, or even that it is less venal or subservient than that of any other country. "The leading organs of the American press have achieved a standard of excellence unsurpassed anywhere in the world." It doesn't say unequaled, and it doesn't say which the leading organs are or how much of the national circulation they reach.

The book ends with thirteen recommendations for action by government, the press itself, and the public. Mr. Hutchins confesses, "The commission's recommendations are not startling. The most surprising thing about them is that nothing more surprising could be proposed." (An editor I know, reading Mr. Hutchins's copy, would have penciled there, "Who told him?") A sample is, "We recommend that the agencies of mass communication accept the responsibilities of common carriers of information and discussion."

A chief service of the volume is that it makes criticism of the press respectable. Surely no one will accuse the general counsel of the Pennsylvania Railroad of following the Party Line.

A. J. LIEBLING

Maxim Gorki as Artist

BEST SHORT STORIES. By Maxim Gorki. Grayson Press. $2.75.

IN GORKI'S masterwork, "The Lower Depths," his greatest gifts shine most clearly: his immense—but not quite profound—perception, his concern for the wretchedness of people, his almost romantic preoccupation with nature. And here, above all, is a carefully controlled rage at the lot of men and an insistence on their noble destiny.

In so far as one can tell from this translation, however—which, by the way, seems most uneven—he is far from a careful writer and by no means a great one. He is almost always painfully verbose and frequently threatens to degenerate into simple propaganda.

But though this wordiness persists in every story in the book, in such pieces as Creatures That Once Were Men, in Cain and Artyom, and in such shorter pieces as Red, Twenty-Six Men and a Girl, and Chums, the power of Gorki's sympathy almost succeeds in reducing his flaws to unimportance. There is ironic penetration and great tenderness here which none of the contemporary realists whom Gorki helped to father have yet managed to match. But having said that he is tender, ironic, and observant, and that most of his descendants are not, it must also be admitted that he is also quite frequently sentimental—as are his offspring—and that, regardless of how well they succeed as outraged citizens, they are incomplete as artists.

Gorki's range is narrow and in intention and effect alike he can scarcely be called subtle. He reiterates: men can be gods and they live like beasts; this he relates, quite legitimately, indeed necessarily, to a particular and oppressive society. ("And the men, too, the first source of all that uproar, were ludicrous and pitiable: their little figures dusty, tattered, nimble, bent under the weight of goods that lay on their backs, under the weight of cares that drove them hither and thither . . . were so trivial and small in comparison with the colossal iron monsters . . . and all that they had created. Their own creation had enslaved them and taken away their individuality.") This is a disquieting and honest report. Its only limitation, and it is a profound one, is that it remains a report. Gorki does not seem capable of the definitive insight, the shock of identification. Again and again we recognize a type with his human attributes sensitively felt and well reported but never realized. For this reason Gorki's sympathy is often mawkish, his denouements a brutal and self-consciously sardonic trick. He is concerned, not with the human as such, but with the human being as a symbol; and this attitude is basically sentimental, pitying, rather than clear, and therefore—in spite of the boast of realism—quite thoroughly unreal. There can be no catharsis in Gorki, in spite of the wealth of action and his considerable powers of observation; his people inspire pity and sometimes rage but never love or terror. Finally we are divorced from them; we see them in relation to oppression but not in relation to ourselves. In the short story, The Hermit, the lack of psychological acuteness he brings to a story intended to show the power of virtue (Love) and the roads taken to attain it make for a devastating and characteristic failure.

And yet Gorki was possessed by a rare sympathy for people. Such work as Cain and Artyom and even the rather superficial Red and the delightful Going Home would be impossible if this were not so. But his sympathy did not lead him to that peculiar position of being at once identified with and detached from the humans that he studied. He is never criminal, judge, and hangman simultaneously—and yet indubitably Gorki. His failure was that he did not speak as a criminal but spoke for them; and operated, consciously or not, not as an artist and a prophet but as a reporter and a judge.

It seems to me that in Gorki's failure can be found the key to the even more dismal failure of present-day realistic novelists. For as a school they do not even have that sympathy which activated Gorki. They do not ever indicate what Gorki sometimes succeeded in projecting—the unpredictability and the occasional and amazing splendor of the human being. It is a concept which today, and this is understandable, if alarming, is dismissed as mystic or unreal. Without the insight into the main springs of human needs, desperations, and desires, the concern with squalor remains merely squalid and acts to brutalize the reader rather than to purge him. If literature is not to drop completely to the intellectual and moral level of the daily papers we must recognize the need for further and honest exploration of those provinces, the human heart and mind, which have operated, historically and now, as the no man's land between us and our salvation.

JAMES BALDWIN

God's Angry Men

CRITICS AND CRUSADERS. By Charles A. Madison. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

"THE DEEPEST AMERICAN reality is the American dream. America's business is to transcend business." This thought was admirably expressed by Alfonso Reyes in his "Ultima Thule." It is implicit in Charles A. Madison's volume. "Men of substance and standing," "the well-born, the wealthy, and the wise," may attempt to stem the flood, but this country was born in radicalism, our keynoters were Jefferson and Thomas Paine. The protest recorded by Charles Madison is but the eternal vigilance of the prophets, the watch dogs of the Lord, to keep this country true to its earliest tradition.

Every one of the eighteen portraits is a brief but well-rounded study. But the book is no mere collection; it is particularly well-integrated. The critics and crusaders are divided into six groups, and each section is prefaced by a very valuable study of the common background. The table of contents will give an idea of the richness of thought contained in these pages: The Abolitionists—William Lloyd Garrison, John Brown, Wendell Phillips; the Utopians—Margaret Fuller, Albert Brisbane, Edward Bellamy; the Anarchists—Henry David Thoreau, Benjamin R. Tucker, Emma Goldman; the Dissident Economists—Henry George, Brooks Adams, Thorstein Veblen; the Militant Liberals—John Peter Altgeld, Lincoln Steffens, Randolph Bourne; the Socialists—Daniel de Leon, Eugene Victor Debs, John Reed. Some had become a little nebulous—Brisbane, Tucker, Brooks Adams, de Leon, and, until Howard Fast's recent best seller, Altgeld. The classification might be different: Bellamy is a practical Socialist rather than a Utopian; Margaret Fuller and Thoreau might come under the Transcendental movement. But on the whole the scheme is clear, and the work, warm and vivid in its details, is impressive in its total effect.

A comforting book? Hardly. Most of these men ended in failure. On the other hand, many, and some of the boldest, found generous support among the common people. My quarrel with Madison is that in his generosity he sympathizes too heartily with all his heroes. I am a

WHO are the real TERRORISTS?

With rage in their breasts—having failed to provoke Palestine Jewry into a civil war—the British have sent 100,000 troops, armed in full war regalia, to roam the country-side, the cities and villages of the Holy Land. Innocent men, women and children are being beaten up and homes ransacked under the pretext of suppressing violence.

With the help of rigid military censorship in Palestine, American public opinion is being hoodwinked. Acts of desperation by Jewish men and women—provoked by illegal military measures and deportation of Jewish refugees to concentration camps—are magnified. Acts of brutal terrorism by British military are glamorized.

A veritable barrage of photographs is being directed to this country, which depict the "poor British" in Palestine as martyrs. Why are not photographs permitted to reach these shores showing the clubbing of survivors of Nazi massacres, the shooting of a four-year-old Jewish girl and the wounding of her older sister who came to her rescue? Neither have we seen photographs of a cyclist shot to death while riding on a peaceful errand, or of the wanton destruction of Jewish homesteads by military patrols in peaceful settlements.

$400,000,000 has to date been spent on the maintenance of 100,000 troops in Palestine "for the sake"—in the words of Winston Churchill—"of a senseless, squalid war against the Jews."

This money could profitably be used to provide the necessities of life to the British people at home!

The Zionist Organization of America has pledged its continued help to the stream of Jewish immigration into Palestine. It fights on all fronts to secure justice for the Jewish people and safeguard its rights to a Jewish Palestine before the United Nations.

son of Voltaire. Liberty could say, with the Patriarch: "O Lord! Deliver me from my friends. As for my enemies, I can take care of them." And with Voltaire I believe that we should crush "l'Infâme." "L'Infâme" is fanaticism, a diseased hardening of the will linked with a disease of the mind, dogmatism. "God's Angry Man," whatever he may be angry about, is a scourge to his cause. Hitler too was a "critic and crusader." The racial problem would be nearer a solution today if John Brown had never lived; and Daniel de Leon hampered the growth of Social Democracy, which is true economic freedom.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

A Partial Clarification

THE TRADE OF NATIONS. By Michael A. Heilperin. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THIS is an expert and on the whole simple exposition of those mysteries which have such forbidding names as international trade, exchange, investment, balances of payments. The author writes in the light of post-war developments, taking into account the plans for exchange stabilization, the international bank, and the proposed international trade organization.

The bias of the book is strongly toward freedom of trade, based as far as possible on competitive free enterprise within the nations. Few will quarrel with the arguments against protective tariffs, dumping, uneconomic subsidies, and monopoly price control. Yet so wedded is the author to classical theory that he scarcely understands the argument for trade controls which are advocated on more social grounds. The import quotas and exchange restrictions originating in the 1930's, for instance, were not due to plain ignorance and original economic sin but were in part measures adopted in dire necessity, as a defense against the results of the depression in the United States—a depression which was felt by the rest of the world through a sudden cessation of American investments and loans, accompanied by a drastic falling off of American orders for goods.

Regardless of how this depression originated—and Mr. Heilperin dodges that issue by calling it international—its effect was so serious on other nations that many of them have become skittish about tying themselves irrevocably to free enterprise of the American sort. They are afraid such a slump will happen again, and want to safeguard themselves if possible. The author might be on solid ground if he set out to prove that insulation from the United States is impossible in the long run, but he will not find much sympathy abroad for the idea that everybody should abandon planning for full employment and rest secure in the benevolent operation of a "free economy." Indeed, he almost goes so far as to imply that the British would be better off if they should give up their present heroic effort to stimulate their export surplus through import restriction and internal regulations. He seems oblivious to the fact that even in traditional theory the automatic adjustments of trade and currency would work only if populations could freely move about. Britain just does not want to lose half its population—nor do we want to receive it. GEORGE SOULE

Parable for Adults

THE COW-TAIL SWITCH, and Other West African Stories. By Harold Courlander and George Herzog. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

THE West Africans whose folk tales are retold in this book by Courlander and Herzog may have a limited vocabulary for generalized thinking, but the process itself is vigorous and its expression vivid. Ideas are expressed in direct images, in powerful parables. Image and concept coincide so neatly that the meaning of incident is inherent in the incident itself. The "Cow-Tail Switch" stories are noteworthy examples of wisdom, irony, and craftsmanship.

They demonstrate, also, that often the most striking aspect of a "primitive" culture is not its specific difference but its universality, and its parallelisms with attitudes and beliefs we tend to cherish as the sole property of Western civilization. Many of the tenets and taboos of Christian democracy, for example, obtain also in pagan democracy. Moreover, ideas of truth, justice, immortality, of men's obligations to their fellow-men, as these West African tales show, are not exclusively the white man's burden.

The "Cow-Tail Switch," the title story of the collection, is a parable about immortality in which the word itself never occurs. It tells of the hunter Ogaloussa, who died in the forest. His children went to look for him, and when they found him one of his sons gathered his bones together and put each in its place; another covered the skeleton with sinews and flesh; a third son put breath into the body; a fourth gave him back the power of speech. At the feast to celebrate his return, Ogaloussa rewarded the son who had done most to bring him home—the infant born while he was in the forest whose first words were, "Where is my father?" The people knew Ogaloussa was right. "For a man is not really dead until he is forgotten."

Again, although the word itself is never used, justice is the theme of an ironic little episode between Guinea Fowl and Rabbit. Here justice literally turns on a hair in a sophisticated story that could only result from prolonged thought about the subject. Throughout the book the conversation of men and other animals, frequently so embarrassing, is enlightening or diverting, or both. The song of the little tortoise—"It is man who imposes himself upon things, Not things which impose themselves upon man"—is particularly rewarding, especially for those of us aware of the Stone Age attitudes with which twentieth-century man is approaching those things called atoms.

The "Cow-Tail Switch" stories give us valuable insights into the psychology of West Africans by permitting them to speak for themselves, a courtesy rarely extended to "backward" groups, currently being explained almost to extinction by some of their best friends. And West Africans speak eloquently, with a mastery of fable and fiction whose further study might enrich our own.

Since there are so few stories for adults—and I mean adults—on the market, it is unfortunate that "The Cow-Tail Switch" is listed as a children's book. The absence of sex and polysyllables may account for this decision. But humor, metaphysics, and a good tale well told appeal not only to children but to a number of perceptive adults. This is a book for them. Like

"Gulliver's Travels" and "Alice in Wonderland," "The Cow-Tail Switch" should be a pleasure to turn and return to from six to sixty.

Evans Carlson

THE BIG YANKEE. The Life of Carlson of the Raiders. By Michael Blankfort. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

ONE of the extraordinary aspects of American culture is the way in which, for all its latter-day standardization, crassness, and vulgarity, it still manages to produce, from time to time, a man who seems cut from the original pattern, who has about him something of the greatness of a Thoreau, a Lincoln, an Emerson. Such a man is Evans Carlson. And the more one thinks about Carlson, his background and experience, the more difficult it becomes, even with the aid of this excellent biography, to account for his greatness.

His grandfather was a Norwegian forty-niner. His father, Thomas Carlson—really "Thorstein" Carlson—was the "first white child" born in Alpine County, California, then a small mining town in the high Sierras. Growing up on the West Coast, the father studied for the ministry, later graduated from a small theological seminary in New York, and until his retirement in 1944 was a small-town New England minister. About all one learns of the mother, Joetta Evans, is that her lineage may be traced back to one Captain Jack Evans who served on Washington's staff. While Carlson was unquestionably influenced by his father—the only man he ever knew, so he says, who attempted to practice Christianity—the family influence was obviously not decisive. For Carlson, a big gawky youngster none too happy about being a minister's son, ran away from home when he was sixteen and enlisted in the army, giving his age as twenty-two.

With minor interruptions the rest of his career was spent in the armed forces, about the most unlikely background one can think of for the training of a great democrat. After seven years in the army, which he left with the rank of captain, he walked into a Marine Corps recruiting office in 1922 and enlisted as a private. There followed years of routine service at Quantico, in Nicaragua, and in China. On his first assignment in China, Carlson was thirty-one years old, a seasoned officer who believed in the righteousness of his mission and the slogans of dollar diplomacy. After a brief period in the States he was back in China in 1933, and this time his education in things Chinese really began under the tutelage of his new friend, Edgar Snow. After another brief period of service in the States, in command of the Marine guard at Warm Springs, he returned to China, arriving in Shanghai the day the Japanese launched their attack on the city. On this trip he marched

2,000 miles with a detachment of the Chinese Red Army, the first outside military observer to visit the Communist-occupied areas. He was so impressed with what he had seen and with the urgent necessity of terminating the shipments of American materials to Japan that on returning to Hankow he took a long chance and permitted the correspondents to quote him directly in stories which they promptly filed based upon his remarkable experiences. The reaction in Washington was instantaneous: a warning immediately came through that he was not to speak out again. Although a promotion to the rank of major had just arrived, he promptly resigned from the service and returned to the States to warn the American people of the imminence of war with Japan, predicting, in an interview on January 30, 1941, that war would come in ninety days.

Out of this curious experience, mostly acquired outside the United States, Carlson emerged a passionate democrat. When he reentered the Marine Corps in April, 1941, he was determined to develop a military unit based upon what he called "ethical indoctrination," a largely self-disciplined unit which would minimize the differences between officers and enlisted personnel. Somehow managing to get permission to put his ideas into practice, he proceeded to organize the famous Second Raider Battalion of Gung Ho fame, which executed the brilliant and strategically important raid on Makin Island. As might have been expected, the unit was entirely too successful, and in 1943 Carlson was replaced as commander and never again, during the rest of the war, was placed in direct command of men. Called together on April 1, 1943, the men of the battalion, many of whom were crying with rage, heard Lieutenant Colonel Alan Shapley, Carlson's successor, bluntly announce that he didn't think much of this Gung Ho business and that he didn't intend to command "a Boy Scout outfit." Thus ended the experiment with "ethical indoctrination" and "democracy" in the Marine Corps.

Back in the States before he took part in the Tarawa engagement and prepared the brilliant plans for the assault on Saipan and Kwajalein, Carlson was tendered a luncheon by Edward C. Carter of the Institute of Pacific Relations at the Downtown Association. Around the room were executives of such companies as the National City Bank, the Chase National Bank, Standard Oil, the Texas Company—many of the same men that Carlson had personally interviewed prior to Pearl Harbor in an effort to stop the shipment of war materials to Japan. But let Mike Blankfort tell the rest of the story:

Carlson looked around him, and he felt an enormous anger. He thought of those whom he had left behind at Makin and Guadalcanal. He thought of rotting bodies, the drowned men of Makin, the dengue fever, the jungle sores, the vomitous meat.

He moved his hand across the table in front of him and pushed away a dessert dish as if it were poison.

When he looked up again his face was angry.

"I don't know precisely why I am here," he said, "because I stopped talking December 7 largely out of a feeling of frustration occasioned by the fact that I had talked to many of you gentlemen in 1939 and 1940.

"Then I told you of what I was convinced—that the Japanese intended to war on us. And I pleaded with you to stop the stupid practice of arming Japan. You did nothing about it."

He stared back at those staring at him.

"But my friend, Ned Carter, asked me to speak, and I'm glad to accommodate him."

Someone coughed; someone accidentally hit his spoon against a demitasse cup; someone sighed.

"Let me tell you about the return on investments at Makin and Guadalcanal."

And he told them.

Today Carlson is a sick man, living in retirement in a little town on the Oregon coast. On the eve of entering the race for the United States Senate in California, he was stricken with a serious heart ailment and forced to retire. "I've fallen apart like the one-horse shay," he told his friends.

It seems to me that, in telling Carlson's story, Michael Blankfort has written the perfect biography. The story is told with the skill of a brilliant scenarist, as scenes, episodes, and happenings in Carlson's life, beautifully interwoven and put together, are permitted to unfold naturally, as the man might speak. The author, one of Carlson's close personal friends, is surely one of the most inconspicuous of biographers. Throughout the book, one has the feeling that it is Carlson and the Raiders who are telling the story, notably in the remarkable narrative devoted to the raid on Makin Island. However badly Carlson has fared at the hands of the Marine Corps historians—the official history deliberately omits his name from the list of winners of the Legion of Merit—he certainly cannot complain of his present biographer. Carlson, as Rewi Alley has said of him, belongs "to the next age of creative man—man who will master his environment and tear a new furrow into the unknown." The one truly great democrat I have ever known, he is a man in whose presence, in these ragged times, one can still feel some confidence that greatness in human nature is not a myth.

JAMES

"Children of Paradise," which Jacques Prévert wrote and Marcel Carné produced and directed in France during the war, is close to perfection of its kind and I very much like its kind—the highest kind of slum-glamor romanticism about theater people and criminals, done with strong poetic feeling, with rich theatricality, with a great delight and proficiency in style, and with a kind of sophistication which merely cleans and curbs, rather than killing or smirking behind the back of its more powerful and vulgar elements. All the characters are a little larger and a good deal more wonderful than life—a mime of genius, a fine florid actor, an ego-maniacal criminal, a cold great-gentleman, and the hypnotic gutter-beauty whom they all pursue and, after their varying fashions, possess. The story has a similar slightly over-ripe grandiloquence—a many-triangled study of love and love's numerous poor-relations, it works the world-as-stage-and-vice-versa cliché for all-it is worth and does so always with as much elegance and irony as intensity and commitment. The Chaplinesque mime (Jean-Pierre Barrault) is the only depiction of an artist, on the screen, which has fully convinced me of the genius he was supposed to have. Arletty, who plays the female beanbag, is almost as good at making that symbol definitive. The great actor is a little short of size; he is the criminal; so perhaps is the sporting nobleman although he outdid anyone else I have ever seen try it; but on their slightly smaller scale they too are perfect, as is the woman who wrecks the mime's life through her "selfless" love for him—and I suspect that this scaling-down was calculated exactly as it turns out. The miming itself is breath-taking, and there is some flirtatious repartee which delighted me more in its way than anything since the fruitier exchanges in Dumas when I read them at the age of eleven; indeed the whole sexuality of the picture, which assumes that the audience knows all about where babies come from and a good deal about how uniquely dangerous the preliminary activities can be, makes one want to forage through Hollywood and various censors' offices as a sort of improved, not to say dedicated, Jack the Ripper. I do suspect that unless you have a considerable weakness for romanticism, which I assume includes a weakness for the best of its ham, this will seem just a very fancy, skilful movie. But if you have that lucky weakness, I think the picture can be guaranteed to make you very happily drunk.

"The Fabulous Dorseys"—meaning Jimmy and Tommy—is one more musical biography. It has very little to recommend it except that the musicians look and act a little more than usual like musicians.

"The Farmer's Daughter" is a very stale story—the country girl who comes to the metropolis, plants her housemaid's-knee firmly in the sweet-breads of high society, and makes the most of her advantage. This time, however, the bluebloods are also the people who run politics in their state. The story seems surprisingly fresh because everyone involved in making the movie appears to know and care for the sort of people the story is about. Patricians, politicians, even peasants, are portrayed with unusual perception and wit, and Ethel Barrymore, as the head of the house and of her political party, suggests very excitingly what she could do with a similar role written to her size.

"It Happened in Brooklyn" features Frank Sinatra, whom I like, Jimmy Durante, in comparison with whom I would, I am sure, find the millennium a rather chilly formal dance, and a great many affectionate japes about Brooklyn, which I could be much happier without. Aside from Sinatra and Durante the show amounts to practically nothing, but there is a general kindness about it which I also enjoyed.

I will try briefly to discuss Eisenstein's "Ivan the Terrible" in the next installment.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

BY THE time I began to suspect that Victor's March records had gone astray the April records had arrived. They include one of Bach's greatest choral works, the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden," which the Orféo Catalá of Barcelona sang in a recording that has long been out of print, and which now is sung—in German, as it should be—by Robert Shaw's chorus with a small orchestra (Set 1096; $3.75). The performance is good, and seems to have been well-recorded, but comes off the records with disturbing noises and distortions which even a new stylus produces from the poor surfaces, and which even a slightly worn "permanent" stylus aggravates. The German texts are given with English translations.

Another set (1094; $3.85) offers a group of oratorio arias—Why Do the Nations from Handel's "Messiah," Now Heaven in Fullest Glory Shone from Haydn's "Creation," Gibt mir meinen Jesum wieder from Bach's St. Matthew Passion, O God, Have Mercy from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and Lord God of Abraham and It Is Enough from his "Elijah"—all sung in English by Norman Cordon, bass, with an orchestra under Sylvan Levin. Mendelssohn's religious music is something I don't care for; and these particular arias of Bach, Handel and Haydn might be more impressive heard in their contexts. The performances are good (except that Cordon finds some of the florid passages a little difficult) and well-reproduced; surfaces are not as quiet as they should be; and there is some wavering pitch. Only the text of the Handel aria is given.

Then Prokofiev's fine Symphony No. 5, performed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Set 1095; $5.85). The performance is excellent, even with Toussevitzky's characteristically slower tempos in the slow portions which cause me to prefer Rodzinski's performance. The sound of the Boston Symphony is reproduced with warmth and luster that is lacking in the recorded sound of the New York Philharmonic, which however has clarity and distinctness that are lacking in the recorded sound of the Boston Symphony. And the Boston Symphony performance comes off the records with the disturbing noises of very poor surfaces.

And then some of the engaging bits of Handel's music that Beecham has assembled for a projected ballet called "The Great Elopement"—beautifully performed by the London Philharmonic under his direction, but reproduced with insufficient brightness (Set 1093; $3.85).

Rimsky-Korsakov's engaging "Russian Easter" Overture, which most of us know as sensationalized and falsified by Stokowski's performances, has been recorded by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra for Columbia (Set 6-276; $3). The performance is good; the recorded sound only fair: soft passages and those for solo instruments, including the solo violin, are remarkably distinct in space; but the massed violins are barely heard in big sonorities that are spacious but lack the warmth and luster they had in the Academy of Music.

The same orchestra, playing as the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra, is conducted by Mitropoulos from the piano in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3 (Set 667; $4). Hearing the work after a number of years I like it even more than I did; and the performance seems excellent. The orchestra and piano sound good individually—though the one lacks the warmth and luster, and the other the rich resonance it should have; but in concerted passages the orchestra sounds too far back of the piano.

Hearing Sibelius's Fourth Symphony after a number of years recalls to mind the incredible nonsense that was written about those pretentious snorts of the brass, those ominous drum-rolls, those wild cries of the woodwinds, which I find as unconvincing now as I did then. Rodzinski's performance with the New York Philharmonic seems good, and is well recorded—though again without the warmth and luster that it had in Carnegie Hall (Set 665; $5).

I have just had an instructive experience with some second-hand records that I bought from an English dealer who announces his willingness to purchase unwanted records "in fiber-played condition," who lists a "slightly steeled" copy of a recording at half the price of a presumably "fiber-played" copy, who stocks several brands of thorn needles but none of steel, and who in all this illustrates the prevailing English idea that playing records with thorn needles prevents the wear that is caused by use of steel needles. That idea is a delusion which the English—and many Americans—continue to enjoy because the thorn not only destroys the recording but conceals its destruction: its inability to reproduce sounds of high frequencies prevents the frightful noises of filed-down grooves that came from the records when I played them with a wide-range jewel-point Brush pickup or even with a Zenith that cuts off at 4,000 or 5,000 cycles.

And finally I have just received Victor's announcement that it will release next year a recording of Handel's "Messiah" recently made in England by Beecham, which is "the only uncut version . . . ever recorded."

"Write Makes Might"

Dear Sirs: As the Eightieth Congress proceeds, with the reins of leadership in the hands of reactionaries, many liberals are left with a feeling of complete helplessness and confusion.

The Committees of Correspondence offer one easy solution. Named for the committees which, in 1772, proved an effective organ of early American patriots for demanding freedom rather than tyranny, this organization endeavors to bring mass action to the cause of democracy.

Each month the committees send a memo to their 13,000 members, outlining pressing issues which are before Congress and asking that letters and petitions be dispatched. A sample letter is inclosed as an aid to the correspondent, but members are urged to use their own wording in order to insure greater effectiveness.

Use your rights and your voice, and remember the slogan of the Committees of Correspondence—"Write Makes Might."

political purposes by the Soviet Union and its satellites may be less skeptic if they read Moorad's report of what happened to the Red Cross supplies shipped to Poland during the war."

I cannot comment from experience in other countries, nor do I know detail about Red Cross work, but I can comment upon UNRRA's shipment approximately $250,000,000 of relief and rehabilitation supplies to the Ukraine and Byelorussia, almost three quarters of which was American origin. UNRRA has had missions both the Ukraine and Byelorussia for over a year, totaling nearly thirty persons, chiefly American. The members of these missions have traveled up and down western Russia discharging the duties as official observers of the distribution of such relief and have obtained no evidence of any misappropriation. In fact, the distribution was considered to be carefully regulated, swift, and efficient.

Mr. White indicated in his review that his experience was confined to Moscow. In 1946 for several months he had offices in Kiev and Odessa. I also made inspection trips to Kharkov, Dnepropetrovsk, Zaporozhe, Zhitomir, Poltava, Kremenchug, Lwow, and Min. and I made several trips to Moscow. Other members of UNRRA have gone to other parts of western Russia. Furthermore, American correspondents have made two trips through these areas to report on UNRRA activities. I have never seen or heard any claim that there was any misappropriation of any of the thousands of tons of UNRRA goods, chiefly food, which was so desperately needed in that area.

The Shape of Things

WITHOUT LOOKING FOR THE SINISTER, WE find painfully suggestive the apparent attempt of the House Administration Committee to keep from the public a booklet on "Fascism in Action," prepared by the Library of Congress. The printing of nearly half a million copies of a companion volume, "Communism in Action," has been authorized by Congress, but Representative Patman's bill to print the document on fascism was quietly interred in a committee pigeonhole, from which Patman has been vainly trying to extricate it since February 5. The subcommittee charged with consideration of the bill is headed by Representative Corbett, a Pennsylvania Republican who airily dismisses the study as "pretty old stuff." He may be right, but we see no reason why the country should accept, as the last word on the subject, the decision of a single Congressman, particularly one with an ultra-conservative voting record. The four editors of the New York Post's "Washington Memo" have smoked out Patman's introduction to the booklet, and judging from the excerpts printed in that column, we would guess that the study might be something of a bombshell. Certainly it is not "old stuff" for a Texas Democrat to write that "there are dangerous tendencies toward fascism in the U. S." Or that "some of our top political men make statements in thinly veiled terms which would do credit to Rosenberg, Hitler, or Goebbels." We suspect that there is something more in the suppression of this study than Mr. Corbett's casual and high-handed judgment on its freshness, and we mean to keep raising the issue until we find out what that something is.

A POSSIBLE CLUE IN THE MYSTERY OF THE suppressed booklet is the following sentence in Representative Patman's introduction: "One of the great deterrents to fascism is a strong, well-organized labor movement." This is not the sort of sentiment a Republican Congress might care to release, under the sober imprint of its own Library, at the very moment it brings forth a bill to draw and quarter the aforesaid labor movement. Certainly that is the plain intent of the omnibus bill which will in all probability have cleared the House by the time these observations appear. As drawn up by the Labor Committee, the bill would free the courts to hand down anti-labor injunctions, good for seventy-five days, abolish the National Labor Relations Board, and put an end to industry-wide bargaining. It would not only illegalize the closed shop but limit the union shop to plants where the employer, as well as a majority of the employees, consented; and strikes called for the purpose of winning such consent would be prohibited. Strikes in major industries and services would be stopped by government injunction where not only the public health and safety were deemed to be threatened but even the "public welfare," a notoriously elastic phrase. No strike could be called without a thirty-day cooling-off period, unions would be made legally liable for damages, and, finally, no union would be certified as a representative of employees if a single member of its hierarchy might "reasonably be regarded" as a Communist or even a fellow-traveler. We doubt that a single member of the House expects this monstrosity to become law. The Senate may be driven to exert a modifying influence—and if it isn't modifying enough, the President will almost certainly veto the whole measure. That, in fact, appears to be precisely the idea: to give the President a choice of mayhem or nothing.

FACED WITH THESE ALTERNATIVES, FEW doubt that Harry Truman will choose the veto, and accept the political consequences. These should not be anything like as damaging as the consequences of abetting the Congressional assault on labor, but they can hardly be altogether favorable. There are abuses in labor, as there are in business and government—and the public does expect action. The strike of telephone workers has raised once more the acute problem of how far the strike weapon can be used in such vital fields as communications and transportation without paralyzing a whole society in the interests of a single group. It raises, too, the equally acute problem of how workers in key industries and services can be compensated for any modification of the right to strike, and their interests fully safeguarded. If the Republican majority in Congress had an eye for anything but the crassest political advantage, it would have shunned the pathological approach it has taken and considered the sober and genuine proposals that thoughtful men have been evolving. Congress, the Administration, and indeed labor leaders themselves would do well to start with the report just released by the Labor Committee of the Twentieth Century Fund on "Strikes and Democratic Government." They would find here at least the outlines of an intelligent pattern: retention of collective bargaining and the unimpaired right to strike in private industries that do not vitally affect the public health or safety; relinquishment of the strike in other industries in return for carefully specified guaranties and advantages. The committee, headed by William H. Davis, proposes some sensible rules for government seizure when necessary—with limited compensation to the owners rather than continued profits—but its emphasis is on plans for conciliation, arbitration, and other democratic forms of settlement. If President Truman has to veto a bad bill, his action need not be purely negative. An accompanying message along the lines of this report would be good politics—and good statesmanship.

GENERAL DE GAULLE HAS FINALLY MADE his choice—from now on he will be, not above the battle, but in the midst of it. Since the day when the hermit of Colombey emerged from retirement and installed himself in Paris, a feeling of uneasiness has pervaded French political circles. Whatever his intention, the self-styled homme de la tempête cannot possibly return to the political arena without creating a storm. No doubt he would like to exercise the opposite influence, as a kind of sage who alone knows the remedy for France's malheur. But in the present situation there is no place for sideline philosophers; the tension between left and right has already reached such explosive pitch that his veiled attacks on Republican institutions may easily shake the foundations of the state. For precisely this reason, many of De Gaulle's advisers are urging him to exchange the cloth of a French Savonarola for the warrior's armor. In his recent speeches at Bruneval and Strasbourg, the General disclaimed any intention of leading those elements which are ready to unleash a new wave of reaction in France. He was careful, in his references to the Soviet Union, to make no mention of Churchill's proposal for an anti-Russian bloc; the French are much more interested in finding a common policy with Russia on the German issue. And in Paris the other day, he warned that internal political reforms must be effected "within the legal framework." Obviously, De Gaulle is treading warily with an eye to the latest opinion polls, which show that only 28 per cent of the French people would like to see him back in power. But despite his careful language the General evidently failed to reassure Premier Ramadier who, after a long conversation with him, inspired the vigorous attack of the Socialist Party against De Gaulle's policy. For the first time, Léon Blum has openly denounced his attempt "to provoke new divisions under the guise of total unity of the nation" and appealed to the progressive forces "to stand guard over republican institutions and democratic liberties."

Mr. Churchill's War

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

NO ONE would dare say that Winston Churchill is without honor in his own country, but as a prophet his British rating has certainly declined. Not so, apparently, in the United States. His pronunciamiento, If I Were an American, a sequel to the Fulton speech of March 5, 1946, was printed in two issues of the New York Times and in Life magazine. Its total circulation must have come to twenty-odd million.

Such an audience, such an unprecedented build-up, tend to magnify the importance of published words—and even to make them sound true. In this case the illusion is heightened by the magnificent force and style of their presentation. But Americans, reading his self-confident assertions, should not be taken in. Winston Churchill has been repudiated as a leader by the British people. His foreign policy is being abandoned, step by step, by the Labor government. His reconstruction of his record in Greece is bristling with untruths.

It would be impossible to controvert in one short article the misstatements made by Mr. Churchill. But a few of them can be quickly answered.

1. The Greek election. Mr. Churchill refers somewhat complacently to "the custom and method of the English-speaking world" that "the ordinary, humble, common people should put their crosses on the ballot paper in secrecy and without obstruction or intimidation" and asserts that this method was applied last March in Greece. It is a fact that an international supervisory commission reported the Greek election to be "valid and fair." Undoubtedly the actual balloting was peaceful and obvious fraud was absent. But the respected Liberal statesman, Sophoulis, who was Prime Minister at the time, had urged that the elections be postponed because political conditions made a fair vote impossible. And a British Parliamentary committee, visiting Greece in August, quoted Liberal deputies as complaining that owing to "right-wing banditry" they had been unable to reach their constituencies during the campaign. A Liberal Cabinet member testified that he had been afraid to leave Athens before the plebiscite. The British committee reported that extremists on both sides were terrorizing the peaceful "85 per cent of the population"; it retold in circumstantial detail the old story of people arrested without charge and jailed or deported without trial, and of the thousands who had fled to the mountains to escape the terror. Since these conditions prevailed throughout the period of the elections, no balloting, however "fair" in itself, could possibly reflect the will of the "ordinary humble common people" of Greece.

2. "The only free election." According to Mr. Churchill, last spring's vote held "under the shield of Britain" was "probably the only free election that has ever taken place since ancient times in the Balkans." This claim is false and insulting to the Greeks. Has Mr. Churchill forgotten the election of 1920 when Venizelos lost power? The fact is, free elections were the rule throughout the inter-war period until the King came back in 1935 and presently installed the dictatorship of Metaxas with the full support of the British Conservative government.

3. The Monarchy. Said Mr. Churchill: "A Greek government . . . had been brought back to Athens by a few British troops and aircraft and their own scanty Greek forces as the Germans fled. . . . The King of the Hellenes and his brother . . . naturally wished to return at the head of this small expedition. British policy, long declared, had however been to seek a plebiscite on the Monarchist issue; and the King deferred to our wishes and awaited in London the decision of the Greek nation." A beautiful reconstruction! The Churchill policy was exactly the contrary. It was to prevent a plebiscite and bring back the king as quickly as possible. In August, 1943, more than a year before the British landing, a delegation representing every element in the resistance, joined by a representative of all the Greek parties, escaped to Cairo and requested the government in exile, then headed by Tsouderos, to transmit to the King a letter begging him to announce that he would not return to Greece until the people had decided upon the form of government. A special Cabinet meeting unanimously indorsed the demand; so the letter which reached the King had the backing of the Greek parties, the resistance movement and also the conservative government in exile. When he received the demand, King George, ill and indecisive, asked Mr. Churchill what he should do. The Prime Minister told him he should refuse.

It was only after the army mutiny in Cairo in April, 1944, that the King was forced to issue a half-hearted declaration saying that he would not go back if the government thought he should not. No one who looks at the record can possibly doubt that the King would have been put on his throne by the British, without benefit of plebiscite, had it not been for the uprising in Athens later that year.

4. The Rebellion. Mr. Churchill charges that when the British landed in Greece, in October, 1944, "the Communist guerrilla bands, most of whom had done little or nothing against the German invaders . . . descended from the mountains, claiming to be the saviors of Greece, and also its rulers with totalitarian power. They infiltrated and forced their way into Athens . . . and began a violent murderous attack upon the police stations and other establishments of the newly arrived, feeble, distracted, all-party government." And much more. What really happened? Nation reporters on the spot, particularly Constantine Poulos, told the story in these pages. But a couple of facts are worth recalling. First, Mr. Churchill's attempt to write off the services of the guerrillas is beneath contempt. These forces, largely non-Communist, fought the Germans with incredible bravery and great losses, as was attested by American OSS parachutists behind the lines and by many British officers. Second, they made no claim to rule the country. Third, no attacks by any left forces began until after offers of peaceful compromise had been rejected on orders of the British. The guerrillas (E. L. A. S.) had agreed to lay down their arms provided rightist bands, including the royalist Mountain Brigade, trained by the British, and the Security Battalions, trained by the Germans, did the same. This was refused. The E. A. M. called for a mass demonstration in Athens. Permission for the demonstration was granted and then revoked, but the second order came too late. Thousands of unarmed Greeks gathered in Constitution Square and the police fired on them. "That was the spark," Poulos reported from Athens. "The E. A. M. forces in Athens and Piraeus set out to clean up the police, national guard, and other armed fascists." But even then the war could have been averted if the British had allowed their puppet premier, Papandreou, to resign, as he wished to do. The Liberal leader, Souphoulis, was actually forming a coalition Cabinet with the approval of the left when General Scobie ordered Papandreou to remain in office. Then the fighting began in earnest; it was at 2 a.m. the next morning that Mr. Churchill, as he says, "drafted a telegram to our General Scobie . . . that he must no longer [sic!] consider himself neutral between the Greek parties, but on the contrary should sustain Premier Papandreou, and not hesitate to fire on the Communist assailants."

The civil war we have inherited in Greece is definitely Mr. Churchill's war, and his warm indorsement of the Truman policy as nothing more than a continuation of his own is the most damaging attack the Administration has yet suffered. Cheerfully and without scruple, Mr. Churchill has knocked into a cocked hat the story built up in Washington over the past five weeks that our intervention in Greece is largely an altruistic enterprise, designed to accomplish what three years of British control have failed to do. In Britain and on the Continent, Henry Wallace is telling large audiences that our government, out of panic fear of communism, has embarked on a global course of military and dollar diplomacy. But none of his charges, no matter how vigorously expressed, can have quite the deadly effect of Winston Churchill's bland and approving restatement of the same point. Mr. Churchill says, in effect, "Henry Wallace is right; this is imperialism." Does the Administration accept the mantle the British war leader has laid on its shoulders? If not, it had better shake it off fast. Until it does, no repudiation of Henry Wallace will sound convincing to liberals, either here or in Europe.

Challenge to Business

IF THE OPA is permanently discontinued, the production of goods will mount rapidly, and through free competition prices will quickly adjust themselves to levels that consumers are willing to pay." So said the National Association of Manufacturers in full-page advertisements on July 3, 1946. Since then, the OPA has been discontinued and output has expanded rapidly. But the cost of living has jumped about 20 per cent in the same period, and as Simon Lesser shows in his article on page 442, resistance to price reduction and a steadily mounting volume of profits remain the dominant features of the business landscape.

When is the performance of industry going to match its promises? That, briefly, was the question posed by the President last week, and it is a question that demands a quick and satisfactory answer if this country is to avoid serious economic grief. Pointing out that the course of prices has been as he predicted when vetoing the first OPA Extension Act last June 29, Mr. Truman said that responsibility for preventing a crash now rests squarely on business. The government has been stripped of powers to deal with the price situation; it can only use "moral suasion" and it begins to look as if that will not be enough.

Yet it ought to be as clear to our great industrial leaders that their present course of action is not going to prevent a reduction of prices in the very near future. Consumers' resistance to prices is growing, not because of a conscious buyers' strike, but because their income is insufficient to take off the market the ever-greater flow of goods from the production lines. J. Roger Wallace, writing in the Journal of Commerce on March 29, demonstrated statistically that present national income is insufficient to support the prices asked for all the goods that are being produced. "A national income of approximately $224 billion rather than the present rate of around $185 billion would be necessary," he asserted, "to move the present industrial production into consumption at the present price level." In the face of this situation we are told by the same newspaper on April 11 that many cotton mills and converters "go so far as to sit on goods in preference to bringing prices down." In other words, unsold production in the textile industry, and in others as well, is being piled up in inventories. This state of affairs cannot long continue: either we will have an orderly reduction in prices to a level which enables current production to be absorbed in consumption, or our economy will be overtaken by a disorderly retreat of values accompanied by forced liquidation of inventories, slashed production schedules, unemployment, and widespread bankruptcies.

The longer business men wait to make the necessary adjustments, the harder they are likely to fall. A few have recognized this fact and given a commendable lead, but all too many, refusing to face the fact that they have to sacrifice some part of their present lush profits or risk going without profits at all, are unwilling to take the step that common sense dictates. For instance, the chiefs of the steel industry, which is believed to have enjoyed a record first quarter, profitwise, have said in the last few days that they cannot consider price changes so long as wage issues remain unsettled. Yet it is clear from the steel union's tactics that it is anxious to avoid a strike; almost certainly it would moderate its demands if the companies showed that they were willing to use part of their profits to cut prices and so insure the maintenance of capacity operations. On the other hand, if prices do not come down, wage increases, as President Truman has pointed out, will be fully justified.

Another example of stalling is the complaint of some business groups that they are inhibited from getting together to reduce prices by fear of the anti-trust laws. We are sorry to note that Mr. Truman dignified this red herring by referring it to the Department of Justice. As Attorney General Tom C. Clark observed, "The anti-trust laws do not interfere with voluntary price reductions." An agreement to reduce prices would not seem to offer a case for prosecution unless it represented a deliberate attempt to squeeze out competitors or unless it included an undertaking to freeze prices at the new level.

In any case, we cannot afford to wait for industry-wide agreements on NRA lines. They would take months to negotiate and are quite unnecessary. Prices in our largest and most typical industries are determined neither by outright agreements between competitors nor by the free play of market forces. They are the result, rather, of what is known as "price leadership." The pattern is set by the strongest units in the industry; when they alter their course, their fellows are usually quick to respond. Under these circumstances, responsibility for lowering prices rests particularly heavily on United States Steel, General Motors, General Electric, American Viscose, du Pont, Alcoa, and similar giants. By timely action they could do much to ward off the danger that our present boom will turn to bust, and if they fail to seize the opportunity, the country should hold them strictly to account.

Will Business Bring Down Prices?

BY SIMON O. LESSER

Washington, April 14

IN RECENT weeks the President of the United States has felt compelled to warn business again and again of economic difficulties ahead if prices are not reduced. Despite the charge that this is a timid Administration, three government departments—Treasury, Commerce, and Agriculture—have spoken out to the same effect, as has Edwin G. Nourse, chairman of the President's Economic Council.

As summarized in the New York Times, the report of that council—the basis of last week's "seminar"—was a remarkably outspoken document. Calling attention to the growing probability of a recession, it noted the expansion of consumer credit, the shrinkage of war-time savings, which are being used to supplement current income, and the decline in the rate of current savings. Such "danger signals" warn that purchasing power and consumption are sagging in the face of rising production. To reestablish a balance, the council pointed out, either wages must be raised or prices must be reduced. It prefers the second alternative, since the benefits would be spread more widely. Profit figures cited in the report show that most industries have an ample margin for price reductions. The question is whether these reductions are to be made voluntarily, as the council hopes, or are to be precipitated by a collapsing market.

No real basis existed for expecting the natural play of economic forces to bring about price reductions as soon as this. It may be remembered that the Box Score I compiled for The Nation of January 18 predicted that price cuts on some items would do little more than counter-balance increases on others until about the middle of the year. Keith Hutchison has explained why casual readers of newspapers may have got a different impression: the significance of every favorable development on the price front has been exaggerated. Reduced prices for some luxury goods and clearances of such things as sport shirts have been heralded as the harbingers of general price slashing. This was careless and irresponsible journalism, or worse. The conservative press wanted the country—especially the workers—to believe that an early tumble of prices was due.

On the other hand, much of the comment addressed to business has been basically hortatory. The first message of the President under the Employment Act of 1946 was less a report than an appeal to business to reduce prices in order to stave off a recession and achieve industrial peace. So far the course of events has borne out the contention of Robert R. Nathan and others that it is unrealistic to expect business to display this amount of foresight and restraint. There is still time for business to act. But it cannot wait much longer. A lower level of prices is imperative if we are to consume the tremendous volume of goods now being produced. Each day's delay in reaching that lower level makes it less likely that the adjustments can be achieved without a business setback. That is the real menace of the continued firmness of prices.

Business men have been increasingly concerned about high prices, but unfortunately not sufficiently concerned to act. Everyone has wanted prices to come down—but preferably the other fellow's. Of the business men interviewed in Fortune's February management poll 44 per cent expected prices to fall, but only 15 per cent intended to reduce those of their own products. What business men hoped in particular was that farm prices would lead the downward adjustment. This would mean cheaper food and clothing and thus help to pacify labor. At the same time it would reduce business's raw-material costs and take some of the pressure off the demand for lower prices all along the line.

The argument for lower farm prices is based on the plausible hypothesis that since they have risen faster and farther than prices in general they should now decline until the former balance is restored. The need for cheaper wheat, cotton, and pork is undeniable. But there is nothing sacred about the balance between farm and non-farm prices which prevailed before the war. Throughout the twenties and thirties our farm population was impoverished. The low level of farm buying power was one of the basic causes of the depression of 1929 and of the slowness of the subsequent recovery. Farm prices must come down, but this necessity must not be permitted to obscure the need for cheaper manufactured goods also.

One reason why business men have maintained their own prices, even though they recognized the need for lower prices generally, is that they have tended to be more hopeful about prospects in their particular field than about the over-all business outlook. While this optimism is encouraging and makes their policy less inconsistent than might at first appear, it points up the fact that most business men see only one reason for reducing prices—to prevent a decline in their company's sales.

SIMON O. LESSER is a Washington economist formerly with the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion. The Nation of January 18 carried an article by him called What Will Your Dollar Buy in 1947?

Their unwillingness to act in the national interest at a time when they are fully cognizant of what should be done and well able to trim profit margins is the most discouraging feature of the present economic scene.

Were it not for the irresponsibility of certain influential business leaders, the chances of avoiding a recession this year could still be regarded as bright. It is still as certain as anything can be that farm prices will be lower, probably sharply lower, during the last half of this year. Though the world food situation is worse than was realized some months ago, many of the factors which accounted for the recent flurry in hogs and grains—severe weather, the box-car shortage, worry about domestic crop prospects—were transitory. There have been offsetting declines in other farm products, and even for those commodities which have soared, "futures" market quotations forecast lower prices later on.

With respect to manufactured goods the situation is better than it appears on the surface. The cost-of-living index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics has declined slightly for two consecutive months. Wholesale prices of a wide variety of items—handbags, jewelry, handkerchiefs, toilet goods, cosmetics, and radios—have reached their peak and begun to come down. The W. T. Grant Company reports that since December lower prices have been quoted to its buyers on one-fourth of the 7,500 lines it carries. These reductions have not yet been fully reflected in retail prices.

The President's statements have increased the number and strengthened the hand of the business men who see the need for lower prices, and a civil war is flaring in the business community. It would be an oversimplification to say that the war is between manufacturers and retailers, but by and large the manufacturers are the ones who are resisting price adjustments. While the National Association of Manufacturers has again put itself on record as favoring lower prices, its recent statement, like the one of last December, seems less an appeal to its members than a warning against wage demands and an attempt to shift responsibility for the rises already witnessed. Most manufacturers can make a plausible case for postponing price reductions: raw-material costs are high and further wage demands are in the offing. But present profit margins permit reductions that would help keep wage demands within reason.

Retailers are already feeling the impact of consumer buying resistance and are well aware of the urgency of the situation. Long before Mr. Truman's latest warnings, such representative retailers as A. W. Hughes, president of the J. C. Penney Company, and Adam Gimbel, president of Saks Fifth Avenue, had stressed the importance of lower prices. Lew Hahn, president of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, was quick to indorse Mr. Truman's views. Jack I. Straus, president of the world's largest department store, R. H. Macy and Company, has urged in a press interview and a signed advertisement that manufacturers and retailers cooperate in an effort to bring prices down. Many other retailers and retail organizations are working vigorously to effect reductions.

The nation's lumber dealers and home builders, hardly noted as champions of the consumer, have begun to complain about high prices. They are afraid that the present huge demand for homes will fade away unless costs are reduced. And to the harassed builders and dealers the inflexibility of building-material prices represents not simply an economic threat but an ideological blow. They had convinced themselves that while prices might rise temporarily after the death of the OPA, they would promptly settle down again after their little fling.

In the manufacturing field the most conspicuous champion of lower prices has been the Ford Motor Company. Ford not only talked about the need but, as a "down payment" toward a continued high level of production and employment, actually lowered prices. Granted that the reductions were small and motivated in part by public-relations considerations, they were an important step in the right direction. The Ford price cuts are all the more commendable because Ford was less well situated to absorb them than manufacturers already producing at capacity and had less reason to fear a lessened demand.

Following the Ford lead, International Harvester announced substantial price reductions on a wide variety of its products. Like Ford, Harvester is untroubled at the moment by buyer resistance; its sales are running 50 per cent ahead of last year. It reduced prices in the belief that such a policy would benefit the nation and, in the long run, the company.

Other prominent manufacturers have announced modest price cuts. Many members of the business community, however, have let neither Presidential appeals nor competitors' actions disturb their serenity. General Motors thumbed its nose at young Henry Ford by promptly raising the prices of some of its models. It could get away with this because, as a low-cost producer, its prices were competitive even after the increases. The necessity of the adjustments, forcefully argued in a company statement, may be judged from the fact that General Motors shortly afterward raised its dividend. The company's earnings are estimated to be running at more than twice the new rate, and it is widely predicted in brokerage circles that the dividend will be increased again, or supplemented by an extra, before the year ends.

Lumber manufacturers reacted to the demand for lower prices in similar fashion. In February mill quotations on Northern hardwoods in all grades were advanced from 10 to 15 per cent. There is general agreement in the trade that lumber prices must and will fall by late spring, but meanwhile supplies of processed lumber are limited and demand is urgent. Buyers can be squeezed a little harder.

The New York Times story which reported the price rise declared, "Manufacturers expressed amusement at yard threats to concentrate on substitute materials." How much longer, one wonders, will these boys be amused?

Unfortunately it is all too easy to point to businesses which in spite of lush profit margins ignore the need for lower prices. Several weeks ago the Wall Street Journal carried a front-page story which began, "The high cost of building threatens to make the 'great housing boom of 1947' just a might-have-been." In the same issue was the 1946 annual report of Sewell Avery's United States Gypsum Company: on a sales gain of less than one-third, profits had about tripled, rising from $3.18 to $9.91 per share of common stock.

As in the past each individual firm seems to feel compelled to act in its own interest rather than adopt policies serving the general good. Last year many companies doubled and tripled their 1945 earnings. Thus far this year profits are larger still. Many large corporations have been able to establish reserves against every possible contingency. Some merchandisers have reserves against inventory losses equal to more than one-fourth the value of present inventories. Such sums should certainly be ample to protect the individual firms against disaster—but if some of today's excessive profits were applied to price reductions, the disaster would be less likely to occur.

Time is running out. For several months now prices have been too high to permit us to buy all the goods pouring from our factories. Fortunately, the overflow has been needed to replenish inventories. But inventories have become approximately large enough. From now on, if we are going to keep factory wheels turning and employment up, the prices of goods will have to be brought into balance with purchasing power. If they are not voluntarily reduced, they will be forced down by a decline in demand. That kind of price correction will mean losses for business, unemployment for workers, and trouble for everyone.

Iraq: Black Gold and Poverty

BY ANDREW ROTH

Bagdad-Kirkuk, March 12

RICH as Iraq is in "black gold," having one of the largest and most easily exploitable oil fields in the world, the visitor is immediately struck by the people's bleak poverty. After broad-avenued Damascus, Bagdad is a shabby slum. Its dirty main street, lined with whining beggars, is somewhat mockingly named after Haroun al-Rashid, but there is little romance in the life of the citizens. Most of them are landless and live in mud hovels. The average wage is 30 cents a day, while prices are as high as in New York or London. A large majority have syphilis, and 95 per cent are illiterate.

During the past year many dramatic events have been staged against this sordid background: vociferous political parties have been born; striking oil workers have been shot; British troops have landed; and "new-style" elections have been held. Only a tiny minority of the population, however, have had roles in the drama—on one side a few feudal sheiks owning dozens of villages and tens of thousands of acres, the big city merchants, and the "old gang" politicians linked to both; on the other the newly articulate students, some progressive intellectuals, and the railway and oil workers.

While some of the extreme nationalists are ready to blame all Iraq's ills on "British imperialism," conditions were much worse before the British forces arrived thirty years ago. Under British control a good port, a railway system, roads, and airdromes have been built, and a moderately efficient police and civil service have been trained. The government has been centralized by imposing the Hashimite dynasty of King Feisal on the feudal sheiks and by the R. A. F.'s suppression of tribal uprisings. Of course the nationalists say that these benefits are merely by-products of Britain's need for oil and markets and for an effective but subservient ally on the Mediterranean-Persian Gulf air and land routes.

Iraq's independence has been recognized internationally since the end of the British mandate in 1932, but as late as last January even the Anglophile Premier Nouri Said described it as "conditional independence," that is, independence limited by the conditions of the Anglo-Iraqi treaty. By this treaty Britain was given air bases, facilities for moving troops and supplies, the right to supply the foreign military and civilian advisers and technicians required, joint control of the British-built Iraqi railways and port of Basra, and the right to move in troops if war threatened. The purpose of the treaty—to keep Iraq safely within the British sphere of influence—was nearly defeated by the machinations of the Nazis in the period 1933-39, but when a group of ultra-nationalist army officers under Rashid Ali tried to seize the government in May, 1941, the British stepped in and remained firmly in the saddle throughout the war. Today the ruling Iraqi is Emir Abdul-Ilah, regent for the boy king, Feisal II.

Nouri Said, called the "Smuts of the Middle East," is the smartest of the "old gang," the men who served under and were paid by T. E. Lawrence in World War I and came to Iraq with King Feisal. Nouri has a genius for conjuring up schemes to advance British policy. He negotiated the Anglo-Iraqi treaty and the Saadabad pact and has pushed the Arab League. In 1943 he proposed the "Greater Syria" plan, which was to unite Syria, Lebanon, Transjordan, and part of Palestine under the British puppet, King Abdullah of Transjordan, great-uncle of Iraq's monarch. As a result he is much in demand for Cabinet posts, the present Cabinet being the ninth he has headed and the twentieth or so in which he has served. His pro-British policy is strongly seconded by Foreign Minister Fadhil Jemali, who would like people to forget that he was pro-Nazi before the war.

The British occupy the key posts in the Iraqi economy. Recently when a Briton was appointed head of Basra's laundry department, the left-nationalist paper Saut el Siasa asked sarcastically whether the task was beyond the ability of an Iraqi. The British firm of Andrew Weir monopolizes the chief agricultural exports—dates and barley. An Englishman is Acting Controller of Currency and Exchange Control Director. Iraq's foreign trade is controlled in the interest of British exports. A contractor of my acquaintance was refused the requisite dollars to go to the United States to purchase road machinery and therefore had to buy from England. Many Iraqi merchants do not seek United States accounts for fear of being blacklisted by "the Embassy" and its friends in the government. Although Iraq's allocation of $14,000,000 from the London "dollar pool"—into which American payments for Iraqi exports are pumped—is quite generous, Iraq is encouraged to spend these dollars in countries like Sweden, Switzerland, and Canada which want dollars for their products but spend a large portion of them in England. The most recent statistics (January to September, 1946) show that Britain's exports to Iraq are fifteen times its imports from Iraq, while our exports are only six times our imports.

Since the war discontent has been stirring in the people, and progressives and students have demanded the political liberties promised by the Atlantic Charter and other expressions of Allied war aims. The Regent, believing that moderate reforms would block the development of Persian-style extremism, appointed as Premier Tewfik Suweidi, a man of wealth but of somewhat more modern views than most of the ruling clique. Suweidi abolished war-time security regulations restricting civil liberties and in April-May, 1946, allowed the formation of five "reasonable" (his word) political parties. He limited their activities, however, to Bagdad. One was the Premier's own Liberal Party, led largely by wealthy merchants. Another was the chauvinist Istiklai, or Independence Party, comprising many of the junior officials and army officers who had followed Rashid Ali. Three were progressive parties, alike in advocating free elections, evacuation of foreign troops, distribution of state, not private, lands, and an independent Arab state in Palestine, but differing somewhat in leadership and following. The pro-Communist National Liberation Party was not licensed.

The actual membership of the new progressive parties was only some thousands—their newspapers, like other Iraqi papers, had a maximum circulation of 3,000—but they were a nightmare to the Iraqi feudalists. At the end of May the Regent withdrew his support of Suweidi and replaced him with Arshed Umari, who suspended six journals in his first month in office.

Last summer political warfare, stimulated by Anglo-Soviet tension, was almost as hot as the broiling sun. In Bagdad a student was killed when police fired on a demonstration of the National Liberation Party urging the evacuation of British troops. But the shots that echoed around the world were those fired at the striking Kirkuk oil workers.

The Kirkuk field, one of the most valuable in the world, is worked by the Iraq Petroleum Company, which pays only eight shillings a ton in royalties to the Iraq government. The company is jointly owned by American, British, French, and Dutch concerns, but its top personnel is almost entirely British. Wages were good, for Iraq, but had not kept up with the rise in prices. Workers had to walk at least a mile in the hot sun from Kirkuk to the fields. There was a critical housing shortage because the number of workers had greatly increased and floods had washed away many of their mud hovels. The I. P. C.'s opposition to the formation of a union and its reluctance to grant demands until it could get word from the London office provided ammunition for a handful of Communists who were anxious to sharpen the militance of the workers in this strategic industry and to brand the company as "imperialist exploiters" in an area of sharp Anglo-Soviet friction. On July 3 all of the I. P. C.'s 4,000 workers struck. On July 14, when most of them had eaten up their slender reserves and were ready to return to work, gendarmes fired into a labor demonstration, killing eight men. Although the local governor was a former I. P. C. employee, there is no evidence that the company instigated the shooting. However, a British official formerly in the Indian C. I. D. is said to have declared: "The Iraqi police botched the job. In India they would have got the dozen men we wanted with twelve shots; here they fired three hundred rounds and didn't get any of the ringleaders."

The Iraqi government and its British advisers, recognizing the danger in this incident—on the very same day 80,000 workers went on strike in the Anglo-Iranian oil fields in Abadan—rushed conciliators to the spot and induced the workers to go back to work by promising that conditions would be improved and that there would be no discrimination against the strike leaders. All the ringleaders were in fact soon fired on one pretext or another, but, partly under British government pressure, important concessions have been made. Wages have been raised from 16 to 75 per cent, a daily allowance of 20 cents for rent has been added, medical facilities have been extended, and plans have been made for 400 workers' houses when materials become available. My trip to Kirkuk convinced me that while labor relations have improved, the company and the cooperating local authorities have no intention of allowing anything but a company union.

The Kirkuk shooting aroused tremendous indignation, but anger rose still higher in August when the British, to counter what they considered a threat to their Abadan fields, moved troops into the Iraqi port of Basra just across the border from Iran. The nationalist papers in Bagdad asserted that this was a violation of the Anglo-Iraqi treaty, which allows reinforcements only in case of a threat of war. The papers were thereupon suppressed and their editors imprisoned. This provoked a printers' and railway workers' strike. Arrests were the order of the day.

When in London last fall, Foreign Minister Fadhil Jemali, according to a highly placed Iraqi source, boasted of these "anti-Communist measures" to Mr. Bevin. To his surprise Mr. Bevin suggested that blind repression was not the best way of fighting communism. When informed of this, the Regent, already made jittery by Premier Umari's erratic actions, called for his resignation and gave the post to the agile, experienced Nouri Said with instructions to hold elections.

If any proof were needed, the recent elections have demonstrated Nouri's amazing skill as a manipulator, in which he is equaled in the Middle East only by Persia's Premier Qavam. As a result of the government's victory, Iraq's parliament will be filled with the usual subservient merchant-landlord representatives, but the crudities of pre-war practices will have been avoided. In the past what were known as "telephone elections" were held. Parties were illegal, but the feudal sheiks and city merchants put up candidates. Then the night before the balloting the Minister of Interior's assistants called the provincial governors on the telephone and informed them, in cipher, which candidates were to win and by how many votes. Later, unless there was a mistake in deciphering, the figures ordered were announced as the electoral results.

As in Turkish times elections are indirect—that is, have two steps—and the political parties were much too weak to hope for more than a scattering of urban seats even in an unfettered election. But Nouri took no chances, although he wanted to preserve the outward trappings of "free elections." His first step was to break up the united front of the political parties which had been driven together by his predecessor's repressive measures. In November he split off the Liberals and National Democrats and persuaded their representatives to join his Cabinet on the promise of free elections and full scope for the political parties. Then he proceeded to suppress the extreme, underground left. Iraq has two sectarian Communist factions with a combined membership of about a thousand. Their immediate programs differ very little from those of the progressive parties, but they emphasize mass demonstrations and underground organization of the oil and railway workers, legal unions not being permitted. In mid-January the secret printing presses and over fifty leading figures in both organizations were seized. Apparently the police failed to uncover any Soviet connection because Nouri's best effort to discredit them has been to suggest that they were financed by the Zionists. Actually they have attacked Zionism as a creature of British imperialism and sponsored an Anti-Zionist League.

Even before the left was weakened by these arrests it was clear that all the legal parties were kept in a strait-jacket by being banned from the provinces. At the end of December the Liberal and National Democratic ministers resigned from the Cabinet. In January the National Union and People's parties decided to boycott the elections because, instead of giving the parties full scope as promised, Premier Nouri had deftly passed the buck by saying it was up to the governors, who in turn said their police chiefs had to decide whether the opening of party branches was a "threat to security and order." Under this ingenious scheme even the conservative Liberal Party has been allowed only five branches in the seventy-one provinces.

Labor Coalition in Holland

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Hague, April 1

THE new Dutch Labor Party is one of the few really creative new political impulses upon the European continent. It represents a combination of the old Socialist Party, never strong in Holland, the left wing of the Protestant churches, and a few left-wing Catholics. It is at present in a coalition government with the Catholic Party, the opposition being the traditionally conservative Calvinist parties.

What is creative about the party is that it has healed in Holland the breach between Marxism and Christianity existing generally on the Continent. It consciously fashions its program, or at least its orientation, on the example of British Labor. Like the British party it is pragmatically rather than dogmatically Socialist. Socialism, in its view, is a political-economic program, not a religion or a cure-all for the ills of the world. It therefore disavows the position of Continental Marxism, which usually challenges not merely the economics of capitalism but the whole traditional Christian culture of the West. The party is as intent as British Labor to gain the support of the middle classes as well as of industrial labor.

Unlike the British party, which has always been quasi-Christian and quasi-Socialist but which has never represented an explicit alliance of church and labor leaders, the Dutch party has in its leadership some of the most prominent leftist churchmen, particularly those responsible for the missionary enterprise of the Dutch church. One of the new points of contact between labor and the church is, in fact, the affinity between the Socialist criticism of Indonesian imperialism and the conviction of the more advanced missionary leaders of the church that imperial support for the Christian missionary enterprise is wrong. The influence of the party has greatly contributed to the liberalism of the government's position on the Indonesian independence movement.

The Labor Party controls 29 of the 100 seats in the Dutch Parliament. That it should hold office in alliance with the Catholics, who have always polled 33 per cent of the votes in Holland, rather than with the old Christian anti-revolutionary party simply means that Catholicism, however conservative, has, as usual in Europe, a connection with political labor by way of the Catholic trade unions. The Calvinist party is, on the other hand, solidly bourgeois and has always mixed middle-class conservatism with Christian piety in the manner that justifies Karl Marx's acute observation: "The beginning of all criticism is the criticism of religion." Lutheranism in Europe has usually been as conservative but not so explicitly political. Dutch Calvinism, on the other hand, has been explicitly political in much the same fashion as Catholicism. The politics of Holland have been dominated for generations by these religiously oriented parties, partly because Holland is one of the least secularized of industrial nations.

The Christian leaders in the Labor Party were somewhat disappointed that they did not gain more seats in the first parliamentary election. The prestige of some of the churchmen, particularly of Dr. Henrik Kraemer, one of the most respected missionary leaders in the whole Protestant world, was so great that a larger number of the rank and file was expected to follow him. But that was a little too much to expect. Holland, like Switzerland and Sweden—and the United States—is a thoroughly bourgeois nation. Imperial wealth and the conservatism of the farmer are allied much as the farmers and big industry are allied in our Republican Party.

One might assume that in such a situation the conflict between the "Christian" right and the Socialist feeling of the Continent, which helped to destroy the social and cultural fabric of Europe and even now prevents either the social or the spiritual reconstruction of many European nations, would have been conducted here with particular acrimony. The new impulse which gave rise to the Labor Party is therefore the more remarkable and the more praiseworthy. While it is not likely that the party will ever be able to shake the solid middle-class conservatism of the Dutch agrarian, it has gained support in the impoverished middle-class life of the urban centers and bids fair to win the industrial classes completely. It may even in time be able to forge at least a working alliance with the labor wing of the Catholic Party, if the interests of the Catholic workers ever come into sharp conflict with the policy of the party.

The significance of this whole development lies in the fact that the rest of the Continent is unable to fashion stable non-Communist governments primarily because of the breach between the Marxist parties and the Christian right. All these Christian parties have a left wing which has more in common on economic issues with the Socialist Party than with its own. Usually, however, it is prevented by ecclesiastical authority from making common cause with the Socialists. One of the disappointing developments in both the M. R. P. in France and the Christian Democrats in Italy is that various genuinely creative "lay Catholic" developments in these parties, growing out of the resistance movements, have come progressively under hierarchical domination. The clergy insist on making monopoly in religious instruction the dominant issue and thus spoil any possibility of a working alliance with the Socialists. Sometimes the Continental Socialists, unlike their Dutch brothers, also contribute to this impasse by a dogmatic secularism. If Europe should fail to achieve a stable economic or political life, ecclesiastical institutions, seeking to preserve their perquisites or even to restore medieval conditions, will have a high responsibility for the failure.

The Dutch Labor Party is not at all impressed with the present seemingly high living standard of the Dutch nation. It insists that living conditions are better in Holland than in Britain because Holland is not balancing its export-import budget. (Nor are the British for that matter.) Holland hopes to retain a large trade with the Indies, even if Indonesia gains complete independence; and it trusts its intensive agriculture for the usual surplus of eggs, dairy products, and vegetables. But there may not be as large a market for these exports in an impoverished Europe.

The Dutch party, with whose leaders I had the pleasure of meeting this week, is as concerned as any similar group in Europe that the Continent should not fall to communism. It is, however, fully aware that drawing a strategic line beyond which communism may not go in Western Europe will be of no avail if behind that line Western Europe does not regain economic and political health. It is grateful that American power is to remain in Europe and yet apprehensive about American power. Many party leaders were perturbed by Truman's Texas speech on "free enterprise," having assumed that that was the slogan of Republicanism. They wanted to know whether it was a kind of golden calf to which all parties had to make obeisance. They assured me that impoverished Europe required a managed economy and that unless we understood this, all our help would be vain.

Dixie in Black and White

BY A. G. MEZERIK

III. Big Jim of Alabama

Birmingham, Alabama, April 2

IN BIRMINGHAM there is a little factory, equipped with modern machinery, in which technology dictates the presence of many workers in one room. Some are white, some Negro. Each man does his job, and racial friction has never entered the shop. But human relations in the South are not so modern as the machinery in this factory. Convention, originating in bourbon days, demands segregation, and since the owners of the factory are not radicals, and do not want to be called radicals, they conform to the convention. To reconcile convention with technology they have made two big doors into the factory room. Over the top of one is inscribed "White" and over the other "Colored." The workers come in by different doors but once inside sit or stand side by side, just as they came along the street on the other side of the door. Thus convention and technology are both satisfied; if they were persons instead of abstractions, they would surely wear complacent if embarrassed smiles.

This is a minor manifestation of the clearly discernible changes which are being forced on the South as it passes through the stages of industrialization. To the unsolved problems of a primitive agricultural era are now added in Birmingham those of a relatively primitive industrial economy. How primitive can be judged by the fact that the average family income in Alabama in 1850 was $100 a year, and in 1938 it was only $130. Share-cropping, tenant farming, concentration on one crop, and uneconomical production methods persist, but are jumbled up with such innovations as mechanical cotton pickers, flame throwers, and harvesting combines. Consideration of the industrial worker's needs and productive capacity is retarded by the hold on Alabama of the two great monopolies, the United States Steel Corporation and the Commonwealth and Southern Power Company. With these undigested problems and relationships are intertwined the frustrated aspirations of a business class which would go into manufacturing but cannot while monopolistic restrictions prevail, and of an artisan class which would master technology but cannot while the South lacks training facilities.

Necessarily, this conglomeration of unsolved difficulties produces confusion, ill feeling, and misunderstanding. But the problems cannot be evaded, and because they are always present, a growing number of people here are beginning to see what it is they want, though they do not yet see clearly how they will get it. They visualize a future in which they will not only have the machinery of production but enjoy the fruits of that production. Alabama has marvelously rich ore and coal deposits. In Birmingham, the state's most important city, are some of the country's largest steel plants. Alabama needs bridges and highways, hospitals and schools. It cannot build them because it cannot afford to buy the steel which is produced from its own ore, coal, and flux. Alabama wants a greater volume of production usable in Alabama than has ever been dreamed of in the Pittsburgh offices of Big Steel or the Wall Street luncheon clubs where Commonwealth and Southern executives meet the partners of J. P. Morgan and Company.

A. G. MEZERIK, author of "The Revolt of the South and West," has spent the past several months making a new survey of the South. This is the third article of a series he is writing on current political and economic trends in various Southern states.

The eagerness of the people of the South for more goods fails to delight the big corporations, for the good reason that the people cannot buy what they need unless prices are lowered through more efficient production methods and removal of artificial restraints. Also necessary is a wage system which provides a standard of living equal to that in the North. Only with such a wage system will it be possible for the worker to pay, directly or in taxes, for the houses, schools, hospitals he wants.

Waste of motion, waste of material, and waste of man-power characterize the production methods of the entire country. In the South the waste is worse because of archaic farming methods and primitive industrial mechanization. Some wastage is easily seen, and its elimination is demanded. But there is an equally costly invisible wastage due to rigging of prices by monopolies, to patent pools and freight rates which exclude men and women from economic opportunity, to control of money by an Eastern corporate aristocracy. In these is snarled the progress of the entire South.

On every side Southerners see pillaged forests, eroded lands, exhausted mines. This waste, being of the old era, balks change and explains much. Unless the people of Alabama can recapture control of their own destiny, the future is lost, along with their wonderful natural resources. For them it is anything but an academic question; the decision must be made quickly or fifty years from now Alabama and the South will be an impoverished agricultural wasteland. Labor leaders worry about it; middle-of-the road college groups study every aspect of the problem; patriotic and civic-minded aristocrats call it the paramount question. And with these vocal groups stand a great many of the three million people on the farms and in the cities of Alabama.

How else explain the fact that poll-tax Alabama, by electing John Sparkman to sit in the United States Senate with the able Lister Hill, has shown itself to be at present the most liberal state of the South? How else explain the popular vote for Governor Folsom, who, though he mugged through much of his campaign, kept insisting that he intended to carry on the New Deal as Governor Arnall had done in Georgia? There is promise in Alabama that private government by Vulcan will give way to government by the people.

THE PEOPLE CHOOSE A GOVERNOR

Big Jim Folsom took the oath of office as Governor on January 20. Montgomery had not witnessed such a colorful scene since 10,000 people turned out to watch Jefferson Davis, in an open carriage drawn by six gray horses, ride through the city in 1861. Folsom had invited the people of the state to come to his inauguration, and 100,000 accepted. (The record vote in Alabama is only 300,000.) The Governor's reception, for obvious reasons, was held in an airplane hangar.

The new Governor, thirty-eight years old, a giant standing six feet eight inches, had got around to see the people during his campaign. He had traveled with a hill-billy band, the Strawberry Pickers, and had carried as stage props a corn-shuck mop and a suds bucket, with which he promised to sweep out the "Big Mules" (the big plantation owners of the Black Belt) and the monopolies. The people listened; at first because Folsom—with his background of working on WPA, sailing in the merchant marine, and serving as overdressed doorman in front of a big New York movie house was a good entertainer, and then because he told them about the things he wanted to do, things which seemed good and necessary.

Folsom had started out as a political nobody, and the important people, the heads of Birmingham corporations and the Big Mules, paid him little heed except to laugh at him as a mountebank. And then suddenly came the primary election and the big shock. The Big Mules were in danger.

Press and radio swung into action. In the country clubs and at the Hotel Tutweiler, where Birmingham's elite gather, the air was rank with rumor and slander: "Folsom is a drunkard," "Folsom can't resist a skirt," "Folsom can't read—I saw his record at school and he was kicked out because he flunked all his grades." Bankers, business men, rich farmers, all joined in the barrage to break down Folsom's public support. The noise was great, so great that it convinced the noisemakers that they were carrying the day. The rank and file of the voters heard the noise, too, but it had a very different effect on them from what was intended. They had heard all that kind of talk before—about F. D. R., and from the very same voices. Disregarding the big press, employers' pressure, and plantation owners' coaxings, they made up their minds.

The voters considered Folsom's program for the future, not the scandal retailed about his past: a $40 monthly pension for the aged, an $1,800 a year minimum for teachers, hard-surface highways so that the small farmer could get his produce to market. They thought about his proposal for a constitutional convention designed to take the state government out of the hands of absentee corporations and quisling landlords and give it back to the people. They made up their minds as to the merit of his demand for an end to the poll tax, and for legislative reapportionment which would shear from the sparsely populated Black Belt, controlled by rich plantation owners, its voting preponderance over the industrial counties of northern Alabama. Their decision was determined by all these issues, plus the affection they had built up for Big Jim and his clowning. Folsom was in—by the largest majority ever given any candidate in Alabama.

THE BOSWELL AMENDMENT

The monopoly boys and their Big Mule henchmen took a bad shaking up, but they have not quit trying to keep their control of the state and they are not going to quit. The election results were no more than announced when they began their campaign for the Boswell amendment. There was just time to pass it, they estimated, before Folsom took office. To the dethroned overlords it was obvious that the election of Folsom and later of Senator Sparkman added up to an extension of democracy in Alabama, and as has happened often before in the South, a rearguard action was attempted. A traditional pattern was followed. The Boswell amendment was directed at the historic target, the Negro. He, at least, could be kept from enjoying the benefits of democracy.

White supremacy came on stage with a bang. The incumbent Governor, Chauncey Sparks, announced that Negroes and whites could live together peacefully and harmoniously only if "absolute segregation" were recognized as the "first essential of a workable racial society." He demanded the amendment to "prevent a flood of Negro registration."

It was also demanded by one of Folsom's supporters, a dubious character who proclaimed the sanctity of the Ku Klux Klan; whereupon the Governor-elect announced his opposition to the amendment and one of the big questions which were troubling Alabama's liberals was answered. There had been doubt about Folsom's sincerity, but on this issue he was forthright and quick, and his erstwhile K. K. K. friends jumped off his band-wagon and back into their sheets and hoods. To the voices of Klansmen was added that of former Governor Frank Dixon, now attorney for some of the biggest Northern-controlled interests. Dixon toured the state, speaking to the luncheon clubs and proving to every Kiwanis and Rotary member by a dramatic and exact mathematical calculation that if the Boswell amendment failed to pass the percentage of Negroes in the Legislature would be at least equal to the percentage of Negroes in the general population. He didn't say it "might" be; he stated this prospect as a certainty.

One of Alabama's leading attorneys characterizes the Boswell amendment as an "immoral action." This lawyer has never been a liberal on race questions. In fact, he has defended the registrars of several counties who have denied Negroes the right to register. Yet he said, "I couldn't take the Boswell amendment. It is set up to give the county registrar arbitrary power. It doesn't matter how severe we make the qualifications to vote, but once made we must register all those who can meet them." The amendment defines a voter as one having the ability to "read and write, understand and explain any article of the Constitution of the United States." It also requires registrants to be "of good character" and to "understand the duties and obligations of good citizenship." The catch is that the registrar, who is part of the political machine, is the sole judge of whether the applicant meets these tests. Obviously, first the Negroes would be denied the vote and then all but the favored whites.

The lawyer I have quoted became a leader in the fight against the amendment. He was joined by Folsom, Lister Hill, some of the largest newspapers, and all of labor. But the people of Alabama had reached the peak of their political excitement in the Folsom run-off and they did not turn out to defeat it. The amendment passed. That was a setback. It served warning on the new governor that though he might have won the battle for the governorship, the war for domination of the state was still undecided.

Big Jim was thinking of all this as he stood before the massed thousands on his inauguration day and said, "I believe in the kind of democracy that goes back to the branch heads and bush arbors. That's the kind of democracy that gives the average man and woman more to say about the way their government is run. That means we're going to get rid of worn-out restrictions on voting." And to the Big Mules and the power and steel overlords he threw a defiant challenge: "We're going to have cheap electric power all over Alabama. We're going to have it at every farmer's doorstep and in every factory. Those who own our natural resources—our ores, our coal, our river valleys—have got to use these resources for the development of our state. If our democracy is strong, it has to have a regeneration every now and then. . . . I am not afraid of too much democracy. I am afraid of what happens to people when they have too little democracy." Thoughtfully the young Governor concluded, feeling the push and the throb of the huge crowd: "I want to be the best governor I can for you."

CAN BIG JIM HARNESS THE BIG MULES?

In his inaugural speech, Big Jim accepted all the implications of his fight against the monopolies. Fearing that Talmadge would establish himself as governor in neighboring Georgia and withdraw that state from the anti-trust suit which Governor Arnall had brought against the railroads, Big Jim made Alabama a party to the suit. Subsequently he announced that anti-trust actions would be filed against the "monopoly by which trade associations and corporations" have fixed the prices at which goods are sold throughout the state. The battle over the election laws, he said, was not yet over. The next round will be fought in the Legislature in May. Folsom's opponents, in full knowledge that not one member ran in support of his program, are relying on the Legislature to block his every move.

In this contest the experience and parliamentary skill of the Big Mules will count for much. The plan of the conservatives is clear. They will seek to capture the legislative committees and to bury in them the bills which must be passed if Big Jim is to carry out his program—that is, the proposals for a constitutional amendment, abolition of the poll tax, and reapportionment.

Simultaneously, they will try to drive Big Jim into premature action on old-age pensions, teachers' wages, and improved highways—sections of his program which depend for financing on federal grants. They know that Senators Hill and Sparkman are in favor of these measures and will work like Trojans in Washington to see that federal support is granted. But the Big Mules and their corporation henchmen also have tried and true friends in Washington—among the Republicans. If the old coalition of Southern reactionaries and Republicans performs now, it will serve the reactionaries of Alabama on several fronts. Their hope is that with Folsom stymied in Alabama by the Legislature and Senators Hill and Sparkman blocked in Washington the two liberal Senators and the Governor will be discredited in the eyes of the public and their program killed.

Folsom, of course, understands what he is up against, but it is said that he fights like the longshoreman he resembles. The liberal South is watching the struggle, hoping for Folsom's success but at the same time wishing it knew more about him. Everywhere people are asking, "Is Folsom the real thing, or is he a carbon copy of the Huey Long who also put on colorful campaigns and talked to the people about their deepest needs?" In the South more than in most places campaign promises of social reform are not the same thing as a people's administration. Up to now all estimates are simply guesses based on what Big Jim himself has said, and that has been encouraging.

Inquest on the British Press

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, April 2

IN THE wake of a destructive gale there commonly follows a period in which the storm's victims, numbed by the stroke of elemental disaster, survey the wreckage impassively. In time they will muster their energies afresh to cope with the damage; but momentarily they find relief in busying themselves with pathetic little odds and ends—pruning an apple-tree which is the sole survivor of a wrecked orchard, dusting the china in a house stripped of half its roof. In time the Labor government will get doubtless around to taking realistic action in the present crisis, but momentarily the observer gets the impression that governmental departments are still suffering from the numbing effects of shock.

Sir Edwin Plowden, director of a large chemical corporation and chief executive in 1945-46 of the Ministry of Aircraft Production, has been appointed head of the promised Economic Planning Staff; but he will have no executive powers and will merely tender advice to the Cabinet. The Prime Minister's latest statement, forecasting a coal deficiency of ten million tons during the summer months and suggesting that this is to be made good by exhorting domestic consumers to save two and a half million tons and by imposing economies of seven and a half million tons more or less indiscriminately over the whole field of British industry, does not encourage hopes that the Cabinet is yet facing the real implication of planning—concentration of production in essential, efficient units, without undue regard for vested interests.

For the moment, in lieu of effective steps to cope with the crisis, the government has busied itself with a side issue: it has appointed the long-promised Royal Commission to investigate the British press. Formed six months after Parliament voted for a press inquiry, the Royal Commission is headed by Sir David Ross, sixty-nine-year-old provost of Oriel College, Oxford, from whose lectures on the philosophy of Aristotle your correspondent, in the dim days before World War I, learned much that he has now forgotten. The other members of the commission, including Mr. J. B. Priestley, Lady Violet Bonham-Carter, and Mr. John Benstead, general secretary of the National Union of Railwaymen, make up between them a fairly representative cross-section of the newspaper-reading public, but the commission is definitely weak in members with first-hand experience of Fleet Street. There are two ex-journalists on it—Sir George Waters, late editor of the Edinburgh Scotsman, and Mr. R. C. K. Ensor, formerly leader writer on the Manchester Guardian—but neither knows much of the modern commercialized press. The commission is enjoined to inquire into the control, management, and ownership of the press, including "the financial structure and monopolistic tendencies in control," and to make any recommendations which, in its opinion, will "further free expression of opinion through the press with the greatest practicable accuracy in the presentation of news."

That "monopolistic tendencies" exist is a proposition which the inquirers should have little difficulty in accepting. In the fifty years that have elapsed since Lord Northcliffe, then Alfred Harmsworth, founded the Daily Mail, the history of the popular, mass-circulation press in this country has been that of the growth of a relatively small number of dominant, highly capitalized press combines. Today the independent daily journals can be counted almost on the fingers of one hand. The Times, the Manchester Guardian, the Communist Daily Worker (which belongs to a cooperative society), the Yorkshire Post, the Glasgow Herald, and the Edinburgh Scotsman—this almost exhausts the list; and in the field of Sunday newspapers the independents consist only of the Observer, Reynolds', and the News of the World. The lion's share of the press belongs to a few large corporations. At their head, in terms of magnitude, is the group controlled by two brothers, Lords Kemsley and Camrose (formerly J. G. and W. E. Berry), who manage between them three national daily papers, four national Sunday papers, seventeen provincial daily and Sunday papers, and over ninety weekly periodicals. Next comes the Rothermere group, with the Daily Mail, Sunday Dispatch, and Evening News in London, together with ten provincial dailies and six provincial weeklies. Then there is the Beaverbrook group with the Daily Express, Sunday Express, and London Evening Standard; the Odhams group, publishers of the Daily Herald, the Sunday People, and twenty weekly periodicals; the Cadbury group with the News Chronicle and London (evening) Star; the tabloid Daily Mirror and Sunday Pictorial group; the "Westminster Press," controlling twelve provincial daily papers, one provincial Sunday paper, and thirty provincial periodicals; and, finally, "Provincial Newspapers," publishers of four provincial dailies and ten provincial weeklies and periodicals. The aggregate sales of daily morning papers in this country are now close to sixteen million. Of this total, over fourteen million are products of the newspaper combines listed above.

The question which the commission may have greater difficulty in deciding is whether a press which has developed into a large-scale capitalist industry is a social menace. To what extent, if at all, do British newspapers fail, in fact, to provide "free expression of opinion with the greatest practicable accuracy in the presentation of news"? The commission will doubtless find ample evidence that the press is predominantly hostile to the government which happens to be in power today. It may find, too, that the commercialization of the press has led to undue dependence on advertisers in the sense that newspapers all want to give the impression that their readers are contented members of an acquisitive society whose chief interest in life is the purchase of branded goods. It may even find evidence to support the view that the tendency of the managements of mass-circulation newspaper groups has been to feed their readers on sensations and trivialities, with the result that the electorate is given very inadequate information on domestic or world affairs. But what is the answer to the argument, which the advocates of the status quo will advance, that a commercialized press exists to give the public what it wants, and that large circulations are a proof that the purchaser is satisfied? As for "truth" in the presentation of the news, even if practicing journalists are bold enough to testify to the issuing by managements of directives on the treatment of news, it would be difficult enough for the commission to find definite proof that news is deliberately distorted. And, in any event, at what point does the "angling" of news pass beyond the limits of reasonable objectivity? The commission will be up against Pilate's question.

The fact is that the British press, as it exists today, is the natural function of a predominantly capitalist society, and behaves as such. There is no obvious method of changing its character unless the government were to follow the example set by Czechoslovakia and pass a law making it illegal for a newspaper to be published except by a recognized political party or cultural association. From such a revolutionary remedy the present Royal Commission—whose membership, by and large, has a distinctly liberal tinge—will certainly shrink; nor is it likely to recommend any form of "trust-busting" along the lines of America's Sherman act. What it may do is to advocate the adoption of a system whereby the government of the day would be entitled—presumably on paper—to have one editorial column set aside in each daily paper for an official news hand-out. This would doubtless do something to promote the better political education of citizens, but it would not fundamentally alter the character of a press run by, and in the interest of, large-scale capitalist corporations.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Bethlehem's Forgotten Men

READERS of The Nation, I am sure, will be surprised to learn that "management is the real forgotten man in the economy of the country today." However, I have this important news straight from the horse's mouth, from one of our best-known and most highly paid corporate executives—Eugene G. Grace, chairman of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. Mr. Grace, presiding at the corporation's annual meeting at Wilmington, Delaware, let fall this pregnant sentence in the course of a vigorous defense of an amended pension plan the chief effect of which will be to raise immensely the scale of retirement pay for the corporation's leading officers. It was necessary to increase managerial incentives in this way, he argued, in order to attract first-class ability, since high taxes precluded savings from salaries for old age.

In the course of his speech Mr. Grace developed the thesis that "there is no better way of appraising the worth of an employee than by the compensation paid him." This seems a questionable proposition, but, in any case, it could only be valid when an employee's compensation is objectively determined. The chief officers of Bethlehem Steel, however, also compose the Board of Directors, so that they are in the fortunate position of appraising their own worth. No one can say that they are hampered in this task by false modesty. Collectively the sixteen men listed in the corporation's proxy statement as "directors and/or officers" received in 1946 the sum of $2,209,744—an advance of $727,631 over their aggregate compensation in 1945. Being a "forgotten" manager certainly has its attractions.

On top of this, the new pension plan insures the better-paid executives of Bethlehem, including the directors, a more than comfortable old age. Hitherto the maximum pension payable has been $25,000; now, after forty years in the corporation's service employees can draw 40 per cent of their average annual compensation during the ten years preceding retirement with no ceiling whatsoever. Mr. Grace himself has waived all rights under the plan, but seven of his fellow-directors are now in line for pensions exceeding $40,000, with two of them entitled to well over $70,000.

With most proxies made out to the management, this plan was approved by a large majority of the stockholders. But the adverse vote was by no means insignificant and probably would have been larger but for the fact that the plan, in addition to removing the ceiling on pensions, also raised the minimum from $400 to $600.

At the meeting both the executive salary and pension payments were challenged by Lewis Gilbert of New York, who was unkind enough to make comparisons between the total paid to Bethlehem officers and directors and that received by the officers and directors of United States Steel—$706,123. Was it to be assumed, he asked, that the management of Bethlehem was worth three times as much as that of its big competitor? Mr. Grace was clearly incensed by this suggestion. Under his black, bushy eyebrows his pink cheeks took on a deeper hue. The comparison, he snapped, was quite unfair since Bethlehem's board, unlike that of United States Steel, was composed entirely of full-time working directors. We can, however, properly compare payments to the three chief executives in each company.

Chairman	$293,279	$106,700
President	239,399	154,800
Comptroller	170,520	107,000

Bethlehem Steel Corporation has 74,117 stockholders, of whom eight only, apart from men connected with the management, were present in person at the annual meeting. The most active part in the proceedings was taken by Lewis Gilbert, a young man of independent means who has earned the title of "minority stockholder No. 1" by attending numerous company meetings and pressing for greater measures of "corporate democracy." At the Bethlehem gathering Gilbert introduced two resolutions which he has frequently moved with varying degrees of success elsewhere. The object of the first was to change the locale of the annual meeting from Wilmington to New York; the second provided for a "reasonably complete and impartial account" of proceedings at the annual meeting to be sent to stockholders requesting it.

These seem moderate enough reforms, but they are important. The first would make it possible for a larger number of stockholders to take part in the annual meeting and to get acquainted with the men they employ to manage their property. The second would enable the vast majority of stockholders who cannot come to meetings under any circumstances to know what criticisms, if any, were made of management and how they were answered. An increasing number of important corporations, some under prodding by Mr. Gilbert and his friends, some simply from a good sense of public relations, have started to send reports to their stockholders. A few—General Mills is a notable example—have taken steps to facilitate attendance at annual meetings.

But too many managements are like that of Bethlehem. They take the view that stockholders should be neither seen nor heard, that their sole duty is to fill out their proxies. They don't want to encourage larger attendance at meetings by making them more accessible; after all, the insatiable curiosity of Mr. Gilbert and similar "agitators" might prove disconcertingly infectious. Similarly, reports of meetings, if "reasonably complete and impartial," would reveal the fact that proceedings were not always as smooth and automatic as management would desire and might stir up a dangerous increase of interest on the part of stockholders. The Bethlehem management claims that reports are unnecessary because the press always provides a full account of meetings. Having been present on April 8 at Wilmington and taken very full notes, I can testify that this is not so. The New York Times had a fairly adequate report, though it did not mention criticism of salaries. The Wall Street Journal's very brief story referred to the increase in minimum pensions but omitted all mention of the controversial features of the plan. From the stockholders' point of view, publicity of this kind is worthless, though it may suit Bethlehem's directors. They hate to be forgotten but they don't want to be too closely supervised.

BY LOU FRANKEL

LAST month the State Department asked Congress to create and finance a public corporation to take charge of all international short-wave broadcasting in the United States. Since Assistant Secretary of State William Benton is now in actual control of all such short-wave programs, the proposed new set-up seems to many persons in the radio industry just another example of inept government action.

The plan to create the International Broadcasting Foundation of the United States is really part of the government's current effort to sell the idea of American democracy all over the globe. At the same time it foreshadows the end of international short-wave broadcasting by the domestic commercial radio industry for at least a generation, if not for good.

As defense against the propaganda broadcasts of the Axis transmitters at the beginning of the war, the United States set up the Office of War Information and the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. Later it went on the offensive in the short-wave war with the formation of the Psychological Warfare Unit at SHAEF and the operation of ABSIE, the American Broadcasting Station in Europe. After V-E Day effective American short-wave broadcasting almost ceased. The only way to save it was for the State Department to take it over, and that is what happened.

Difficulties were encountered immediately. Writers, producers, and idea men, who had, as the saying goes, "cooked with gas" during the war, found themselves stymied by the hidebound conservatism of the State Department. Better salaries were available in commercial radio, and now that the war was won this talent shuttered its typewriters and moved on. The only consolation for the department was that the exodus lessened the chances of an international incident. The professional radio men the double-talking technique of international diplomacy. In fact, the fear that something might be said at any moment which would cause trouble later was behind the State Department's desire to see a public corporation run our international broadcasts.

Today the State Department has thirty-six transmitters in the United States beaming programs in twenty-six languages. To the world these programs are the official voice of America. Frequently the State Department is made uneasy by having to put a thing "on the record" when every concept of diplomacy calls for innuendo and inference and refraining from definite statements as long as possible. It would prefer to have short-wave broadcasts handled by some outside agency under the eye of the diplomats. In that way trial balloons could be floated—and disowned if badly punctured,

Another reason why the State Department wishes to turn the short waves over to a separate agency is that it is leery of economy-minded Congressmen. At present its operation of international radio costs something over $5,000,000 a year. If Congress were to trim its budget, the short-wave unit would have to be cut. The proposed International Broadcasting Foundation would be less likely to suffer.

The foundation would be administered by a board of fifteen trustees appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Thirteen of the trustees would be "distinguished" private citizens serving without salary; the Secretary of State would be the fourteenth member, and a director at $15,000 a year would complete the board. It would be financed by Congressional appropriations, although the proposed charter permits the sale of time and the acceptance of contributions. By virtue of its non-civil service status the I. B. F. would not be limited by government salary ceilings in buying talent.

The I. B. F. would have full control and use of the international wave lengths. Today fifty such wave lengths are in use, most of which were preempted during the war. Before the war we had only nineteen short-wave signals, and after the International Communications Conference next month we shall undoubtedly wind up with fewer than the fifty-six now used and possibly with no more than the original nineteen. The result will be more crowding in an already crowded operation. For this reason the Federal Communications Commission has said it would transfer control to the I. B. F.

For this reason, too, the World Wide Broadcasting Foundation and some of the more reactionary elements in the radio industry have attacked the plan. They also object to a clause in the I. B. F. proposal which permits "a group or organization owning international broadcasting facilities the use of I. B. F. international frequencies provided that the programs of such group are in the public interest with regard to the foreign policy of the United States."

Commercial operators generally are not complaining about the government's running the short-wave end of the business. The war smashed their dream that American advertisers would soon be sending their network programs over world-wide networks using the short-wave stations of the commercial broadcasters. With United States manufacturers either operating their own plants overseas or working closely with cartel partners, the dream might have been realized. But today manufacturing facilities abroad are in many instances ruined or inoperative, and even the radio sets that could hear these programs are few in number and in poor condition.

Then, too, the war taught the commercial radio men just how expensive international short-wave broadcasting is. These business men would rather see the government run it than put their own money into it with the world so unsettled.

World Wide, the only short-wave broadcaster to protest against the proposed I. B. F., is the only one with sufficient funds to operate without a government subsidy. These funds, in the form of a foundation, kept the organization in the van of international short-wave broadcasters before the war. Today, presumably, World Wide would rather maintain its competitive lead than give the United States the international voice it requires. This in turn raises the question, as yet unanswered, of what sort of foundation is supporting World Wide and what is the original source of its funds.

The Shorter Toynbee

A STUDY OF HISTORY. By Arnold J. Toynbee. Abridgment of Volumes I-VI in One Volume. By D. C. Somervell. Oxford University Press. $5.

BY UNIVERSAL history I understand that which is distinct from the combined history of all countries, and is not a burden on the memory but an illumination of the soul"—so wrote Lord Acton. Other historians have suggested that the study of history may elicit dependable knowledge which can be used for guidance in the proper conceiving and successful solution of contemporary problems. Toynbee's "Study" is, in its synoptic view of the whole, an illumination of the soul, and in its comparisons between Western history and the histories of other societies it does elicit such knowledge. Professor M. M. Postan, in a review of the original six volumes, wrote that "Toynbee possesses the gifts of a truly great encyclopedist, for he is capable of holding and giving out essential information while pursuing an argument. . . . What is important is that for the first time the essentials of modern knowledge in every imaginable field of history and archaeology have been set out by a man capable of comprehending and handling them." What is more important is that what is known of history is so interpreted and presented by Toynbee as to be an illumination of the soul.

The first three volumes of the work were published in 1934, the second three in 1939, and the third three volumes will probably not appear before 1950. During these years "A Study of History" has established itself as the most important work of the century not only in history but also in sociology and philosophy and religion. Those scholars and general readers who are anxious to understand their fields of interest, and not merely to accumulate facts about them, have read the 3,500 pages of the six volumes with pleasure and profit; but many general readers have been unable to afford either the price of these volumes or the time required to read them. To these, the excellent abridgment by Mr. Somervell will be a boon, for the "Study" is of the sort that lends itself readily to abridgment without loss of the significance of the general argument.

The method of the "Study" is, throughout, empirical and comparative: no conclusion is drawn, no concept formulated, and no "law" derived until after a survey of the relevant facts has been made. Some of the facts and illustrations are worked out in great detail, and some of the comparisons are pursued to considerable length; hence the task of shortening the book is simply that of reducing the number of illustrations and the detail of their exposition while preserving the argument intact. Mr. Somervell has performed this task admirably, and the abridgment will consequently be a boon not only to the hurried general reader but also to the scholar who wants and needs an epitome of the larger work. The abridgment "presents an original of over 3,000 pages in 565," and the one volume includes an abridgment of the abridgment in 25 pages; it includes also four tables from the original work and a fifth table that "gives a bird's-eye view of the whole field of the first six volumes" (the fifth table is included in the British edition of the abridgment but is missing from the eight copies of the New York edition this reviewer has seen), and an excellent index. Mr. Somervell writes in a prefatory Note: "I should be very sorry if [the abridgment] came to be regarded as an entirely satisfactory substitute for the original work. For 'business purposes' it is perhaps an adequate substitute: for pleasure surely not; for a large part of the charm of the original resides in the leisured amplitude of its illustrations. Only the big book, one feels, is aesthetically worthy of the bigness of its subject. I have been able to use to such a large extent the actual sentences and paragraphs of the original that I have no fear that this abridgment will be found dull, but I am equally certain that the original will be found much more entrancing."

Toynbee's method is empirical and comparative; more specifically, it is to "search for an intelligible field of historical study independent of the local and temporary standpoints and activities of historians"; he finds that these intelligible fields "are societies which have a greater extension, in both Space and Time, than any political communities"—that is, civilizations. Investigation shows that there are in existence today five such civilizations: our own Western, the Orthodox Christian society in South-eastern Europe and Russia, the Islamic society, the Hindu, and the Far Eastern. Further investigation shows that, altogether, there have been and are twenty-one civilizations and that the earliest of these came into being not more than six thousand years ago. The members of Western civilization are accustomed to regard it as the consummation of human history and as synonymous with Civilization itself; but there is evidence in plenty that the members of all the other civilizations have regarded their own society in the same light. This suggests the likelihood that the conception of any one civilization as synonymous with Civilization is founded on the egocentric illusion by which a man regards himself—or his society—as the hub of the universe. Further, an unprejudiced analysis and appraisal of the ethos and achievements of each of the civilizations support the conclusion that it is proper to speak, as Toynbee does, of the "philosophical equivalence" of all civilizations. This conclusion, taken together with the earlier conclusion that the history of no political community or nation is intelligible in itself, should do much, for thinking men, to dispel the nationalistic illusions of contemporary power politics—and politicians. Thus, the "Study of History," in addition to being an illumination of the soul, presents and establishes ideas that are more critically needed now than at any earlier time in the history of Western society.

Societies are fields of action of human beings, are relations between them, and from another viewpoint they are intelligible fields of study; so defined, "society" is a genus comprising two species—civilizations and primitive societies; civilizations differ quantitatively from primitive societies in that the former are far less numerous and far more extensive; qualitatively, in that in the former mimesis (the imitation by the majority of the social attitudes and assets of the creative few) is directed forward and they are in process of dynamic growth while the latter are static because mimesis is directed backward. By definition, the sources of social action cannot be the society but can only be some or one of the individuals "whose fields of action constitute a society."

Toynbee has discovered that the histories of the twenty-one civilizations so far have followed the same pattern, and his notice of this fact has led some superficial readers to classify him with certain "deterministic" and "cyclic" historians. This is complete error. Toynbee fully recognizes the creativity of individuals and of societies in response to challenges, and he urges the consideration that, since the period of civilizations on earth covers only 2 per cent of the lifetime of mankind, and since, on the same time scale, many more civilizations may reasonably be expected to appear, the courses of the histories of future societies cannot be predicted.

Toynbee's conception and analysis and exposition of the ideas of growth, of challenge and response, of breakdown and disintegration, of withdrawal and return are, each of them, of sufficient importance and excellence to merit serious study; his presentation is as "entrancing" as Mr. Somervell suggests it is. If readers of this review have time for only one book during this year—and the next and the next—Somervell's abridgment of Toynbee's "Study of History" should be that book.

Two French Novels

JOY. By George Bernanos. Pantheon Books. $2.75.

WOMAN OF THE PHARISEES. By François Mauriac. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

THESE two books are exceptional, both for their literary qualities—of quite opposite sorts—and for their saturation in the consciousness and acceptance of a spiritual context for man which, considering the level of the author's concern, arrestingly extends the meaning of such terms as moral standards, the super ego, conscience, and the like. The force and authority of neither writer spring entirely from this recognition. Backgrounds in which religious ritual and ecclesiastical personnel are almost natural elements are familiar enough in French novels, but neither Mauriac nor Bernanos is a Catholic apologist; both are sophisticated psychologically and fearless religiously, and what they therefore essentially communicate is that God triumphs over the church, and man's direct relations with Him transcend its intermediation.

"Woman of the Pharisees" is the more straightforward novel, in structure and language. It tells, in the main, the story of a moral perfectionist who takes it upon herself to interpret God's will to as many of His children as come within her orbit; who in the process of her self-conscious pursuit of the abstract courses of justice and truth poisons the lives of all about her, and her own as well, but who is saved, after a crisis of remorse and loss of assurance, by the love for another human being which leads her at last to the true love of God. So summarized, this seems a rather heavy and sanctimonious conception; it escapes being that by its honesty, its irony, its compassion, and the skill of its narration. It is narrow but universal, interesting if not exciting, thoughtful without being profound, and written, this somehow "old-fashioned" novel of values, in the most admirably easy and colloquial of styles; Gerard Hopkins, the translator, has kindly and ably made himself transparent for the occasion.

"Joy" is a work of a different order, more subtle, more oblique, more intense, more immersed in a kind of spiritual poetry, and though apparently written before "The Diary of a Country Priest" it goes far beyond it into regions of the soul at once pure and opaque, requiring of its readers "patience exquisite" for the violence of its intangibles. Briefly, Bernanos tells of a pious young French girl who apparently experiences the presence of God in the manner of saints, and whose soul is caught up in Him, as it were, long before she meets her untimely and undeserved but only possible end—the astonishing young martyr is killed by the depraved Russian chauffeur who has been the first to perceive the cast of her spirit and hurries her to her God, and himself perhaps to his devil. Before her death, however, she has thrown an entire household, which already numbers several persons inhabiting only the borders of rationality, into a turmoil for which they are unable to account. Indeed, it is not altogether easy to see why sanctity, simplicity, and humility, even if of such mysterious persuasion, should quite so frenziedly distract the unsanctified. This engagement of Bernanos's with mysticism is too often baffling and elusive to the point of irritation, but it is marvelously written in a dazzling, rich, even overburdened language which makes possible a special kind of expressiveness. For this is a special kind of book, a dramatic poem of religion that quite naturally encompasses an enormous mass of experience of the world. Though it has less humanity and much less accessibility than "The Diary of a Country Priest," it is perhaps more brilliant, dense, and variously rewarding. It is no book for anyone whose imagination, for instance, would not permit sympathy with the retreat into insanity of a priest who had lost his faith but not left the church. Or perhaps it is.

Here, too, grateful mention must be made of Louise Varèse for what must surely have been one of the most exacting translating jobs of our time.

An Old Quarrel

SOIL AND STEEL. By P. Alston Waring and Clinton S. Golden. Harper and Brothers. $3.

THE cleavage between farmers and industrial workers has never been more apparent or more distressing in its effects than in the months since V-J Day. Misled by constant anti-labor propaganda in the rural press, country people as a whole have been highly critical of the unions and have blamed the inevitable shortages and high prices of the post-war period on strikes and high wages. The powerful farm lobby, notably the Grange and the National Farm Bureau, has backed big business in the drive for a revision of our labor laws. City workers, on the other hand, blame the farmers for the removal of price ceilings and the high cost of living.

Recognizing the seriousness of this cleavage, Alston Waring, a Pennsylvania farmer, and Clinton S. Golden, nationally known leader of the United Steelworkers of America, C. I. O., have collaborated in a thoughtful exploration of the possibilities of bringing about greater unity of viewpoint and action between these two great productive groups in American society. They do not attempt to gloss over the very real differences which tend to divide the groups. But they are convinced that the misunderstandings are due largely to the fact that city workers and farmers rarely know each other as persons. Because of this lack of contact, business interests have encountered little difficulty in stirring up anti-labor feeling in rural areas. The authors tell, for example, how the United States Steel Corporation and the American Iron and Steel Institute placed "canned" stories and editorials with the news agencies serving the rural press and at the same time purchased huge advertisements presenting the company's side of the steel strike in several hundred selected rural papers.

Despite this fabricated hostility, the authors find many factors which are tending to break down farm-city misunderstanding. And they describe several "techniques for unity" which hold promise of bringing urban and rural viewpoints much closer to each other. Chief among these is the cooperative movement, which by emphasizing the consumer approach to modern living provides "a tool for the welding of the interests of otherwise widely separated groups." The authors also see in the TVA and in community organizations of both workers and farmers bridges to a broader point of view. Another bond is found in the common democratic requirements of both groups—economic security, self-respect, and dignity, a democratic education for all their children, and participation of all citizens in the shaping of governmental policies. It is difficult to see how any reader who is genuinely interested in the building of a dynamic democracy in America can fail to find encouragement in this book; but it is the encouragement provided by a goal worth striving for rather than by a triumph already won.

An Unconvincing Genius

THE MIND AND DEATH OF A GENIUS. By David Abrahamson, M. D. Columbia University Press. $3.

IT WOULD seem virtually impossible that a study of a Jew of violently anti-Semitic opinions, a misogynist with the most powerful biological drives, a sadist, masochist, hysteric, and a suicide at the age of twenty-three, could be anything but thoroughly absorbing; yet with such material Dr. Abrahamson, in his book on Otto Weininger, has produced a document which falls somewhere between a case history and an insufficiently documented biography.

During his short lifetime Weininger published one book, "Geschlecht und Charakter" ("Sex and Character"), a psychological and philosophical work which attracted little attention until he

The girl who dug her mother's grave

NAME: Rozia Mehlsack. AGE: 11 years. BIRTHPLACE: Poland. FACTS OF CASE:

When father was deported by the Nazis, mother and child hid in forests. Mother sickened and died; child stayed with body a few days, then dug a grave and buried it. PRESENT STATUS: In our orphans' home at Bellevue, France. Physical condition good, but child weeps continually.

this child was "lucky"!

ONLY 1 IN 10 IS LEFT ALIVE!

Of a million and a half Jewish children in Europe before the war, only 150,000 remain alive today . . . one in ten! During the war our organization saved thousands of these, hid them from the Nazis, brought them after liberation to one of our 11 orphans' homes in Europe. Many had never tasted meat or sugar; a slice of bread was a wonderful treat. New cases occur every day. More help . . . more homes . . . more care is needed for these luckless, hurt, grieving children!

HOW YOU CAN HELP - NOW

Underground workers died to keep these remnants of Judaism alive during the war. Now, only money—more money—is needed. Your gift will help substantially! And every penny you send goes directly overboard for the care of these children. Can you rest until you have helped? Give . . . please . . . as generously as you can afford . . . today.

shot himself in the room where, seventy-six years earlier, Beethoven had died. This act stimulated considerable interest in the book, which aroused almost universal distaste by its unbridled attacks on women and Jews. But August Strindberg, to whom Weininger's misogyny was sympathetic, wrote to him after reading the book: "To be able at last to see the solution of the problem of woman is a great relief to me. Therefore please accept my reverence and my thanks." There were others to whom the book's strong anti-Semitism made an appeal.

The weakness of Dr. Abrahamsen's book lies in his failure to prove that his protagonist, with his warped mind and repugnant precepts, really was a genius. Freud describes Weininger as "a personality with a touch of genius," but writes of "Sex and Character" as a "rotten book," and accuses Weininger of plagiarizing the central theme of the book—universal bisexuality—from him. He also says of Weininger that he was completely swayed by "his infantile complexes, and from that standpoint what is common to Jews and women is their relation to the castration complex." Such complexes do not necessarily preclude a man from being a genius, but to proclaim him one is to assume a heavy burden of proof, a burden which—to the reader unfamiliar with Weininger's work—Dr. Abrahamsen seems somewhat to have shirked.

ANTHONY BOWER

The Court and the People

LIONS UNDER THE THRONE. By Charles P. Curtis, Jr. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

THE Supreme Court still makes headlines when it deals with John L. Lewis and the United Mine Workers, and it was a first-rate scandal when Justice Jackson publicly attacked Justice Black, but few people are concerned today with the basic question of the position of the court in American government which seemed so tremendously important ten years ago.

If "Lions Under the Throne" had been published in 1937, it would have been bitterly attacked and eagerly quoted. Today it seems urbane, scholarly, judicious. Nevertheless, it is an effective reminder that the Supreme Court represents anomaly and compromise in American theories of democracy.

Whether or not the framers of the Constitution meant to give the court the veto power which Chief Justice Marshall seized for it, they unquestionably had misgivings about democracy sans checkrein, and the court's authority was apparently an ideal check. There is little doubt that today an overwhelming majority of United States citizens still approve the fact that actions of their elected representatives can be nullified by nine middle-aged or elderly men.

Mr. Curtis recognizes and states explicitly that the institution of the Supreme Court is undemocratic, and that it now rarely acts even as a court of law, in the usual sense. The nine justices seldom concern themselves with a court's normal business of settling specific cases unless a principle of constitutionality is involved. But their right to pass on legislation has been virtually unchallenged, even by President Roosevelt. Criticism has arisen only when it has seemed to some people that the justices were reading their own social and economic theories into the Constitution.

So long as the people want it that way, there is no great harm. This beautifully written and witty study of the Supreme Court points out that the court can, under the exact terms of the Constitution, be overruled by Congress and the people. The author then quotes Francis Bacon: "Let judges also remember that Solomon's throne was supported by lions on both sides. Let them be lions, but yet lions under the throne"—in our case, lions under the Republic. In practice, the court has saved its position by changing with the times.

At a time when the United States is proposing to export democracy all over the world, this examination of how democracy works in the United States deserves the most careful attention. It is effective proof that democracy is still growing and changing, and may take a variety of forms. The book is also delightful reading. CHARLES E. NOYES

Wanted: Politics to Match

ECONOMIC POLICY AND FULL EMPLOYMENT. By Alvin Hansen. Whittlesey House. $4.

A READING of this volume suggests that advocates of expansionary economics ought to hold an annual conference to decide the best means for attaining the common goal. Professor Hansen does not hesitate to take his colleagues to task for alleged errors of judgment. John Pierson, Henry Simons, Frank Graham, Abba Lerner, Friedrich Hayek, and George Terborgh—friends and enemies—are given sharp academic scoldings. But they merit censure, for they have either been enthralled by capitalism's ancient glories or been much too bold with new panaceas.

Professor Hansen's own program is, as must be well known by now, a sane, balanced effort to place sturdy crutches under the arms of an arteriosclerotic economy. He wants a "high-consumption" system, one in which compensatory taxation, government-sponsored housing, an adequate health and nutrition program, and sound debt management will keep the precarious balance between volatile economic elements.

No one, I am sure, questions the need for this kind of rationality. But one can raise the question whether existing political drives are fully compatible with such programs. An economic system in which monopoly and maldistribution of income are dominant features is not easily altered, and no amount of economic analysis will do the job. The economics of full employment would itself have to be bolstered by a politics of full employment.

THE WHOLE WORLD OVER (Biltmore Theater) is a play of life in Moscow after the war. On the surface—which is where most of it seems to be—it is an amiable, rather obvious farce-comedy full of rowdy high spirits and wholesome moral sentiments. But since its author is that Konstantine Simonov who has been taking a leading part in the most recent propaganda in favor of propaganda, we critics are not to be wondered at if we sniff doubtfully and suspect a rat which ought to be there even if it isn't. I shall therefore proceed cautiously, and after describing briefly what goes on at the Biltmore let my readers in on my own darkest suspicions.

Just what it is that is the same the whole world over I am not quite sure. It may be the housing shortage, which serves in the play to bring together the dramatist personae who would not otherwise have met; it may be the desire to return to the pleasures of peace after years of war; or it may be merely love of the simple boy-meets-girl variety, of which the author seems to think surprisingly well. In any event, the story concerns a female engineering student mourning her lost fiancé who meets a Colonel mourning his lost wife and who gets him for her own just before the final curtain—thanks largely to the aid of her distinguished father, whose machinations extricate her from an imminent marriage of convenience to which she had allowed herself to become committed.

In more than one respect both the general conception and the dramatic conduct of "The Whole World Over" rather suggest one of those American works now to be found only in French's "Select Plays" and marked "suitable for amateurs." It evolves, that is to say, through a series of standard situations which do seem to be the same the whole world over, and it is replete with sound sentiment as well as unmistakable humor. Russian literature used to be praised for its "elemental" quality, but a good deal of the relatively little Soviet writing I have seen seems to be rather less elemental than elementary, and that is not quite the same thing.

On the other hand, it would be churlish not to admit that Uta Hagen as the heroine and Joseph Buloff as the eccentric father make the most of a certain disarming geniality and naive charm which the writing exhibits or, what is more important, that there are occasional moments when genuine emotion breaks through. War weariness, nostalgia, and a certain pathetic eagerness to clutch at anything which indicates a revival of normal life are now and then suggested poignantly enough to be not only effective in themselves but also interesting in so far as one can assume them to be a genuine revelation of a contemporary Russian mood. It is a pity that these moments are so few and that their effect is so quickly lost as soon as the conventional dramatic machinery begins to revolve again. A really good play might have been built around them.

Where, then, is the skulduggery whose existence we have more or less taken for granted? Most of the sentiments, far from being characteristically Marxian, seem astonishingly bourgeois. Not only flowers but even champagne and English tobacco are spoken of with favor; we are told that the dignity of the individual is a sine qua non for a good society; that it is better to obey the call of your own vocation than to try to do what the state needs to have done; and even that love—good old-fashioned romantic love at that—is the most important thing in the world. What could be more soothing than that to bourgeois ears, and if it represents the official line at the moment, what could be a stronger argument in favor of sending those Russian wives back to their English husbands? One can almost imagine whoever is responsible for the decision leaving a performance of "The Whole World Over" to rush back to his office where he signs the necessary papers and murmurs with tears in his eyes: "Bless you, my children. Amor vincit omnia!"

But let us suppose if we can that the play was written primarily for foreign consumption and that the author is Machiavellian enough to realize that in the America of the moment propaganda would be the worst possible propaganda and that nothing would do the Russian cause more good than the conviction that Russian sentiments are really very much like our own. Suppose that the end of the play in which the just demobilized colonel drinks a toast to "A future without uniforms" was really written to persuade us to destroy our plutonium stockpiles. Far-fetched you say? Perhaps. But it is really doing Mr. Simonov a service to fetch it so far. He has, I am told, recently declared not only that all plays should have a political purpose but that the very casting of them should also—in some way not made clear—be controlled by political considerations. I offer him my interpretation of the present play as a free gift to his defense if he should ever be summoned to explain how he happened to write "The Whole World Over."

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE relative poverty of American art in the last twenty years imposes superlatives in discussing anyone who shows a minimum of talent coupled with seriousness. The gulf between the mass of what is popular as modern art and the few items valid as modern art is immense. To call the latter merely "better" than the former is inaccurate and unjust; it has to be called the "best." Yet this "best" has seldom meant "best" or even "better" in relation to world art. Usually it has had to be given a local qualification.

Two weeks ago I wrote that David Smith was the best sculptor this country has produced. The quality of four or five pieces at his current show of work done in 1946 and 1947 (at the Willard Gallery through April 26) requires me to say even more. Sculpture has until quite lately been a poor thing in this country, and to call Smith the best of all American sculptors is not to claim so very much for him, the achievements of Lachaise, Flannagan, and Calder notwithstanding. In my opinion Smith is already one of the great sculptors of the twentieth century anywhere, deserving to stand next to Brancusi, Lipchitz, Giacometti, Gonzales, not to mention Laurens and Moore. That is, he is making an absolute contribution to the development of world as well as American art. The course of sculpture in other countries will be affected by what he is doing; the French, British, Germans, and others will have to take him into account. And almost equally important at this moment to criticism is the fact that Smith presents it with a relatively fixed point from which to measure the rest of the field here in America.

The baroque exuberance and invention that disrupted Smith's style in 1944 and 1945 has in this latest work been assimilated into a new unity of style that moves again with that "classical" spareness and speed which is so indispensable to the new linear, pictorial sculpture of our time. That Smith has been so well able to subdue his embroidery and luxuriance to this streamlining without emasculating his invention represents a feat and establishes a strong example. It is easy to be elegant in Smith's vein at the cost of power; it is far from easy to combine the two. His sculpture for all its energy presents an elegance like that of Picasso's and Braque's high cubism: there is a similar clarity and a similar plenitude, both of which come from the artist's certainty of having a style that is able to say everything he has to say with the maximum of economy. Yet at the same time the content of Smith's art is worlds away from cubism, being the product of an age whose remaining optimism—of which Smith seems to have plenty—has become the private affair of individuals; whereas the cubists regarded the disenchantment of the world as a triumph for man, later artists like Smith have become so disillusioned with that triumph that they now seek new myths and new obscurities inside themselves.

The best piece at the present show is beyond question the steel, bronze, and silver "Orchard Landscape," whose tail and spreading feathers are a feat of draftsmanship no less than of sculpture. Other successful pieces are "Deserted Garden" in the same materials, "Specter of Mother" in steel and stainless steel, the steel, bronze, and stainless-steel "Specter—Race for Survival," the steel "Head," the steel, bronze, cast-iron, and stainless-steel "Landscape with Strata," and the polychromatic steel "Helmholtzian Landscape." This last piece is not quite pushed through to final unity, but the richness of its suggestion and possibilities almost redeems that fault. In the future we may expect to see chromatic works from Smith's hand that belong as much to painting as to sculpture.

There are also some very bad pieces, among them the polychromatic carbon-steel "Personage from Stove City" and the massive fabricated-bronze "Euterpe and Terpsichore," the second of which demonstrates again how unsuited Smith's talent has become to the monolithic and how much he remains a draftsman, not a modeler or carver. But it can be said, really, that Smith needs his failures, for out of these arise ideas that go on to become the nuclei of masterpieces in the end.

It is to be hoped that Smith's show sells sufficiently to permit him to embark on larger-scale works. He shows every aptitude for heroic sizes, and it is only the question of expense that has confined him so far to relatively small table and pedestal sculpture.

David Hare's bronze, cement, and plaster figures at Art of This Century (extended through April 26), although different enough in style from Smith's work, belong in the same category of pictorial sculpture. If Smith is baroque, Hare is gothic, more angular and awkward, less closely related to cubism and more directly inspired by surrealism. Although under thirty and working as a sculptor only in the last three or four years, Hare has already shown enough promise to place him in the forefront of what now begins to seem, not a renaissance, but a naissance of sculpture in America: sculpture that in its methods and very utensils no less than in its conceptions—which, like our architecture and engineering, tend toward linearism, flat surfaces, and the denial of weight and mass—attaches itself more intimately to industrialism than any other form of art now being practiced.

Hare is still somewhat too prone to the self-indulgence and whimsey of surrealism to channel his powers into a style. Thus, at his present show, any unity the very fact of his temperament might impose is still not enough to overcome the impression of eclecticism and capriciousness. But one feels, as in Smith's case, better this waywardness and muscle-flexing than the anemia of good taste. In the end, when Hare does develop a style, it will say and include more, precisely because of the excess it will have to subdue. The signs of such a style were present in his last year's show; they have not multiplied in this year's, but they persist even more strongly, so to speak, in such more recent pieces as the bronze "Fisherman," and the bronze nude that was shown at the Hugo Gallery's surrealist show last month. It is my hope that Hare will confine his surrealism more strictly to the role of stimulant and not let it usurp as many of the functions of aesthetic preceptor as it has in the past.

The exhibition of works by Mirko, a new young Italian sculptor, at Knoedler's (through April 19) offers an epilogue. This, indeed, is the last gasp of academic sculpture—and that it is even a gasp and not merely a sigh is due to the fact that it is expelled by an artist of real talent. Like Chirico's, Mirko's parody destroys—in this case, the classical tradition of bronze casting. His bronze figures have the texture and a suggestion of the contours, if not the size, of eroded, oxidized archaic Greek figurines, although there is nothing of archaic stiffness about them. The distortions and simplifications are licensed by post-Rodinesque sculpture—which is about all they have to do with modern art. And yet Mirko's sculpture in such pieces as the "Pegasus," the "Figure," and the "Chimera No. 1" has a certain contained vehemence underneath its impressionism and period stylization. Nor do the classical and Renaissance motifs he favors retain enough of their original chasteness to hide a curious sexuality and sadism. This is academic, archaeological art all right, but it is also very up to date. Chirico set the example. And is all the new Italian art as academic and, at the same time, as full of the Zeitgeist as this? It is a shame to see a talent as natively strong as Mirko's waste itself and everything it has to say about modern life on the academic, only because Italian despair, pride, and nostalgia have made the academic de rigueur.

B. H.
HAGGIN

HAVING resumed production of the Glyndebourne Festival recording of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Victor has sent copies of the new pressings to reviewers for comment. Listening to the performance today I have reservations about some of the individual singers that I did not have when the recording was first issued here; but I still find the whole a beautiful and affecting achievement. Comparing the new copy with my old one I find the sound from the new records a little dimmer, their surfaces vastly and disturbingly noisier—which leads me to wonder whether Victor obtained new shells from H. M. V. in England for the new pressings. It has issued them without the original booklets containing the texts that are indispensable for complete appreciation of the music.

Even the copies I have been getting of Victor's new recordings have very noisy surfaces. One of these new recordings is that of Beethoven's Piano Sonata Opus 27 No. 2 (referred to as the "Moonlight"), played by Horowitz (Set 1115; $2.85). He drags and sentimentalizes the first movement, but plays the second and third movements quite well except for a detail here and there which reveals how much a performance of Beethoven is for Horowitz an exercise in the Horowitz style of playing the piano. Thus, much of that style is an alternation of finicky crescendos and decrescendos with no point other than the dazzling precision of their execution; and in the nineteenth and twentieth measures of the third movement, where Beethoven carries a crescendo straight up to the climax of its force, we get a Beethoven crescendo in the nineteenth, a finicky, devitalizing Horowitz decrescendo in the twentieth. The performance is beautifully recorded.

Noisy also are the surfaces of the single disc (11-9447; $1) with Stravinsky's "Fireworks" and the Sicilienne from Fauré's "Pelléas et Mélisande" music. The works are slight; the performances by Defauw with the Chicago Symphony excellent and beautifully recorded.

Columbia has issued a volume of arias from "Aida," "Otello," "Don Giovanni," "Tosca," "La Gioconda," and "Cavalleria Rusticana," sung by Traubel (Set 675; $4). This is not music one would have expected her to sing well; and as a matter of fact she chews up some of it with over-expressive phrasing; but in most of the arias the singing itself is far better than what one has heard in her other Columbia performances: the big tones may be cold but they are produced freely with little or no tremolo—the lower tones being more beautiful than the high (some of the music is transposed down a bit). But in the aria from "Don Giovanni" the voice is tremolo-ridden and shrieky. The orchestral accompaniments range from fair to poor, and are not well-recorded.

From Vanguard, a new company, I have received two single records—one with an engaging Toccata Guatemala by Sam Morgenstern and an uninteresting "Song of Worlds Unseen" by Chandler Davis, well-performed by Bertha Melnik, pianist; the other with Mahler's "Wer hat dies Liedlein erdacht" and Franz's "Zwei welke Rosen," which come out uninteresting in very poor performances by Mary Paull, soprano, and Kenneth Hieber, pianist.

A member of the faculty of one of the big universities writes: "The policies of the domestic companies are driving me to importations, and I should think would drive you to give more attention to importations. In 1946 I spent only $35 on records, and so far this year I have bought only three domestic albums—the recent Haydn Opus 74 No. 3 and two older things I happened to run across—and two single records. You might relay that to your commercial friends, although"—he adds more realistically—"it may not mean much, since such collectors are in a minority and do not figure much in the vast sales that Victor and Columbia aim for." Not only that, but Victor and Columbia have what amount to cartel agreements with their European affiliates which enable them to keep some recordings out and collect a profit on every imported record they allow in.

Nor are Victor and Columbia likely to worry about the few people like the musician I know who writes me from Connecticut: "I have stopped buying . . . I am disgusted with the recording a big firm like Columbia does of the Budapest Quartet, spoiling unique performances like those of the Schubert C major Quintet and Beethoven's Opus 132, which I bought despite the atrocious distortion of the sound." And he doesn't think more of Victor for its recording of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

As for me, though some readers of this column may be interested in European recordings I can report only on the ones that are sent to me for review—the London Deccas and the Italian C. E. T. R. A.s. Thus I have been able to hear some of the Tagliavini records that C. E. T. R. A. has put into albums, and have found the voice fresh but a little dry and hard (with none of the splendor of Bjoerling's voice a few years ago), the tones produced with extraordinary ease, the phrasing full of the mannerisms of Italian tenors (except Schipa), including the sob. I liked best his performances of excerpts from "Falstaff" and "Sonnambula" on BB-25022; and there is, of course, his singing in the performance of Mozart's Requiem, where he is kept under control by de Sabata.

As for the letter on page 463 from Storer P. Lunt, publisher of Lang's Music in Western Civilization—it is on a wrong track. I have referred to German musicologists as one does to London economists or Chicago jazz musicians—to describe not their place of birth but their school of thought or operation.

Not a German

Dear Sirs: I have just read B. H. Haggin's column on music in your issue of March 29 and am surprised to find the writer again dwelling on the German aspect of Paul Henry Lang, whose work we publish.

Professor Lang is not of German origin. He is Hungarian by birth, of a family which has lived in Hungary for many centuries. It may also not be amiss for Mr. Haggin to know that Professor Lang's musical education has been far more French and American (he took his PH. D. at Cornell) than German. He spent less than two years in Germany. He has lived in this country for the past eighteen years.

The Real "Appeasers"

Dear Sirs: Reviewing James Burnham's "The Struggle for the World" in your issue of April 5, Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., enters an incidental complaint that "arguments considered beneath contempt when urged by conservatives against the foes of Nazi totalitarianism are now trotted out complacently by liberals against the foes of Soviet totalitarianism." But such arguments are surely far less common and specious, perhaps even less beneath contempt, than the kind which consists in applying the odious pre-war label of "appeaser" to everyone who dares plead for mutual understanding and peaceful compromise of differences in our relations with Soviet Russia. One expects this sort of thing from the vast host of Simple Simons who merely parrot the headlines of their favorite newspapers, but not from an associate professor of history at Harvard University. Although he judiciously backs away from the sternest implications inherent in his author's thesis, Mr. Schlesinger concludes that "on the whole, one must prefer his brand of romantic Machiavellianism" "to the confused and messy arguments of the appeasers." Thus the direct insinuation that all who oppose a rabid and suicidal Russophobia such as Mr. Burnham's are "appeasers" of the pre-war stripe.

But argument by epithet, like other primitive weapons, can at times be more dangerous to those who use it than to those against whom it is directed. Who are actually the original appeasers of the decade preceding World War II? One need not be a professor of history to know that in the main they were precisely the same persons, or the precise counterparts of those persons, who today are the most intransigent foes of Soviet Russia. And in the main they were actuated by precisely the same emotion that chiefly inspires the post-war anti-Russian campaign—a paranoiac fear of communism, as intense and obsessive as the monarchist fear of democracy after the French Revolution. The appeasers of the thirties were willing to risk any stakes, however high, in the desperate game of "stopping communism." In playing that game they sacrificed the League of Nations, as today they are sacrificing the United Nations; they assisted, condoned, or blinked a long series of monumental crimes committed by totalitarian leaders or regimes; actively or passively they abetted the enemies of popular freedom in every country, until those enemies were powerful enough to defy the world. As end result, in a war which Winston Churchill has said could have been more easily prevented than any other in history, Europe was reduced to ruin and misery, millions turned in desperation to communism where that creed had only its hundreds of thousands of adherents before, and our ally Russia emerged from its blood bath as the second strongest power in the world. Yet today, even before peace has been officially declared, the same champions of disaster are hotly engaged in a renewal of the same fatal crusade; and again they are appeasing or preparing to appease any and every reactionary government that will serve their purposes—as in Spain, Portugal, China, Argentina, Greece, and Turkey. Like the Bourbons of old, they learn nothing and they forget nothing.

In unbroken historical continuity from the rape of Manchuria to the present day, save for those war years when Soviet Russia was bearing the brunt of the Nazi-Fascist assault on human liberties, the actual party of appeasement has been the party with which Mr. Schlesinger and so many other liberals have made "the strange alliance." But at least they should not discredit their own cause by bringing that fact into prominence through their ill-advised resurrection of "appeaser" as an opprobrious epithet and its reckless use against those liberals who from the beginning have remained steadfast in the opposing camp. The Shape of Things COMING AT THE PEAK OF AN ANTI-UNION hysteria in Congress, the settlement between United States Steel and the C. I. O.'s United Steel Workers should go far to restore national perspectives on the labor front. Achieved quietly and without any of the usual publicized bitterness, the agreement is widely accepted as the beginning of a period of industrial peace. The 15-cent hourly wage rise was clearly in order, and will almost certainly set the pattern for C. I. O. demands in the months ahead. By the same token, United States Steel has given a lead that other industries will find hard to reject. The hope expressed by President Benjamin F. Fairless that the corporation would be able to absorb the increase without raising prices should have been more than a mere hope, with profits as swollen as they are, but even this is in contrast to past procedures and promises to arrest the spiraling of prices and wages that made last year's wage boosts a mockery. Acceptance of the 15-cent formula by the rest of the C. I. O. and by industry in general will be tested almost immediately—perhaps before this issue reaches our readers. General Motors, which sets the pattern for the automobile industry, claims to have made an equivalent offer and been turned down by Walter Reuther's Automobile Workers, but few doubt that Reuther will follow Murray's lead if the G. M. proposal stands up under scrutiny. The company has actually offered an increase of 11½ cents plus other concessions, and the point at issue is whether or not the net effect will be a 15-cent raise. The first reaction of the telephone industry has been sour, but this is not unnatural in view of the fact that its chief argument has been dealt a fatal blow. Its flat rejection of a wage boost has been based almost solely on the absence of a "national pattern" for such an increase. Benjamin Fairless and Philip Murray have turned up with the missing pattern.

THE PESSIMISTIC PREDICTIONS OF FAILURE at Moscow which are current as we go to press may well be borne out by the time this issue reaches our readers. Our correspondent, Alexander Werth, has consistently held to the view that until some agreement is reached on reparations the other problems the Big Four have been considering are merely of academic significance. And, as we write, the gap between Molotov and Marshall on this matter appears to be as wide as ever. But even if the conference ends this week, there is no need to write it off as entirely wasted effort or to assume that the irreconcilable conflict between the Russian and the Western points of view makes a two-Germany solution inevitable. For one thing, the American position on Germany has been clarified. Secretary Marshall has made it plain that the United States favors the rebuilding of Germany, with proper military safeguards, so that it may emerge from its present slum status to that of an economically and politically healthy democracy. Admitting reasonable claims for reparations to help repair the devastation caused by Hitler's armies, he has insisted that the restoration of Germany must benefit the German people as well. Russia's position is also becoming clearer. Behind its insistence on large reparations is the present serious economic situation in the Soviet Union, to remedy which, heavy demands must be made on the steel and coal resources of western Germany. The two positions are not absolutely incompatible, for Russia, as well as the nations of Western Europe, would gain from an economically restored Germany. Unfortunately, Mr. Molotov has been less than candid in stating the reasons for the Russian demands and has advanced them in such an unequivocal way as to make compromise difficult. What must not be assumed is that a future agreement is impossible.

GEORG BRANTING OF SWEDEN HAS BEEN nominated by Russia for the post of Governor of Trieste. Since the Security Council has informally agreed to exclude nationals of the Big Four, the final slate of candidates will probably consist of three Swedes, a Swiss, a South African, and a Spaniard. The Swedish candidates are Nordenskiöld, chief of the Air Force; Sandstrom, a former Supreme Court justice; and Senator Branting, a lawyer with a distinguished anti-fascist record dating from 1933. General Henri Guisan was one of Switzerland's most popular war-time leaders and, though seventy-three years old, has more than enough energy to tackle what promises to be the "toughest job in the world." Leif Egeland, South Africa's Minister to the Netherlands, has established a solid reputation as an administrator. But the Spanish Republican, Pablo de Azcárate, whose name was proposed by France, is perhaps the best candidate. Azcárate was Assistant Secretary of the old League of Nations until 1936 when, in a gesture of solidarity with his embattled country, he resigned to become the Spanish Republic's ambassador to London. He was generally considered to be one of the ablest officials at Geneva, and a fair, impartial arbiter, particularly in his handling of the League's Section on Minorities. Were it not for the well-known bias of certain of the big powers, Azcarate's ability and experience would make him the logical choice; however, with the cards of power politics stacked against him in advance, most observers are predicting that the post will go to the Swiss general. Certainly there are no strong objections to Guisan. But it would be more reassuring to see a civilian in the job.

WITH THE DECISION ON AID TO GREECE AND Turkey certain of ratification by Congress, Americans who have sharply criticized the Truman Doctrine must decide what their stand should be when the policy is put into practice. The modification of policy as reflected in Senator Austin's speech before the Security Council and in the Vandenberg amendment giving the United Nations power of review does not substantially lessen the dangers inherent in the doctrine itself. They are simply brought out into the open where everybody can see them. What American liberals can do now is to watch the whole process and use their considerable power of protest and exposure to prevent American dollars from being used to bolster up corrupt, reactionary regimes. They must also see to it that the Greek people, at least, get the maximum economic assistance. (In the case of Turkey, the aid will be almost exclusively military.) The choice of personnel for the administering commission will be of first importance, particularly the choice of a director. At the top of the list of candidates we would place the name of Fiorello H. LaGuardia. He is familiar with contemporary European problems, especially with Eastern Europe, and gained wide experience as head of UNRRA. Besides which, he is highly respected by the peoples of Europe and is a man not easily pushed around.

THE HYMN TO WORK WHICH BERNARD Baruch sang when his portrait was unveiled in South Carolina's State House of Representatives has inspired a rash of sycophantic editorials, but no one has sought to analyze its content. Risking the crime of lèse-majesté, we are venturing, therefore, to ask Mr. Baruch a few questions. He suggests, quite justly, that the world's great need is not more money but more production "to catch up with the ravages of war." To this end, he proposes a forty-four-hour week with no strikes and no lay-offs until January 1, 1949. The result, he says, "would be electrifying," which we can well believe. (The question is: Who will get the shock?) What we want to know is whether Mr. Baruch is advocating a treaty between employers and employees with the former guaranteeing continuous employment for the next twenty-one months in return for a no-strike pledge and an undertaking by the workers to accept a longer work-week. If so, has he any reason to believe that most employers would be willing to give such a guaranty? Unless they are, workers are not likely to look on proposals for longer hours with any great enthusiasm. Again, Mr. Baruch says that "the more we produce, the less will be the cost of living,

Learning the Hard Way

FATE continues to deal harshly with the Grand Old Party. In the gay days of last November the Republicans swamped the country with promises to end government controls, put labor in its place, rout the reds, and slash the budget. Having killed price controls, they are now shuddering over the consequences. Their efforts to strait-jacket labor, going far beyond the few reasonable curbs that were in order, have split their ranks—seriously in the Senate—and will in the end probably yield nothing more fruitful than a veto. Speaker Martin and other party leaders complain bitterly that the Administration has snatched the Communist issue from under their very noses. And now the budget-cutting to which they had looked forward so fondly is proving the most painful disappointment of all.

To their chagrin, the Republicans are finding that the budget submitted by the President simply does not lend itself to the dramatic kind of surgery they had planned. Its recommended expenditure of $37½ billion for the coming fiscal year is $5 billion less than last year's budget and hardly more than a third of the outlay at the peak of the war. Both the President and the Budget Bureau did a thorough job of examining department requests and pared them down by $7 billion. What is left is largely the total of inescapable obligations: $5 billion in interest on the public debt; $11.2 billion for national defense, including occupation costs; $7.3 billion for veterans' services and benefits; and $3.5 billion for international commitments.

The amounts required for aid to foreign countries and other international obligations are far more likely to increase than diminish—and this with the support of the vast majority of Republican Congressmen. By the same token, few G. O. P. legislators will seriously plump for a reduction in defense expenditures while giving their blessing to a foreign policy of "containing" the Soviets. Finally, even professional penny-pinchers, like New York's Representative Taber, can hardly escape the fact that the salaries of federal workers are 32 per cent higher than they were before the war; or that the government, like everyone else, must buy in a market of inflated prices.

Faced with these road blocks, the pruners have fallen back on several types of budget-cutting that can do them no good. Type One is the deceptive, or sleight-of-hand cut, the crudest example of which is the proposed reduction of $800,000,000 in the Treasury's appropriation for tax refunds. This is a purely arbitrary lowering of the Treasury's own estimate of a cost it will inevitably have to bear. It would be just as logical—and as meaningless—to balance a budget by pretending that your revenue will be greater than you know it can possibly be. What is worse, any delay in paying the refunds, through supthe more things we can buy." How, then, does he explain the fact that a big upswing in production has been accompanied by an even more spectacular rise in prices? And why is it that, now goods are pouring from the factories, there is insufficient purchasing power to take them off the market, with the result that in some industries output is being curtailed and workers being laid off?

AN HONEST ANSWER TO THESE QUESTIONS would surely have to take into account the restrictive effects on consumption, and therefore on production, of high prices. We would therefore like to invite Mr. Baruch to descend from the moral heights from which he lays down the law in generalized form and put the weight of his authority behind the President's campaign to reduce the cost of living. Mr. Truman, with the backing of his economic advisers, has been stressing the fact that abnormally high profits afford an ample margin for price reductions. This claim is strongly supported by first-quarter earnings statements, which are now beginning to appear. In the past four days we have extracted from the Wall Street Journal the statements of thirty corporations, mostly in the small to medium-sized industrial class. For the first three months of this year these companies have reported aggregate profits of $22,546,678, a rise of 63 per cent over their total of $13,832,015 in the corresponding months of 1946. In order not to weight this comparison unfairly, we have omitted from the tabulation several concerns which last year experienced losses during the first quarter because of strikes or reconversion difficulties but this year have turned in whopping profits. The sample, while small, shows an unmistakable trend and one which, we predict, will be accentuated when the statements of the real industrial giants are available.

plementary appropriations, will serve only to increase the amount by the added interest the government will have to pay.

Even more costly, if less devious, are the proposed reductions of personnel in certain key agencies. The House Appropriations Committee, for example, has voted to slash the operating budget of the Bureau of Internal Revenue by $30 million. This cut would require the discharge of enforcement officers in a year when fifty million income-tax returns must be handled, as compared with fifteen million in 1940—an "economy" that may well cost the government some $600 million in uncollected revenue, or twenty times the salary of the discharged auditors. With only 3 per cent of all income-tax returns audited by the present staff of the bureau, according to reliable estimates, a reduction in personnel would be an open invitation to increased tax evasion. Similarly, the committee's reduced appropriation for the Customs Bureau would result in loss of revenue. The point is that such losses do not show up in a budget; lower appropriations do. Such are the weighty calculations of politics.

These dents, of course, are hardly noticeable in a budget of $37½ billion, but the latitude for cuts is narrower. What is worse for the G. O. P., it is getting narrower every day, as one potential cut after another turns out to be political poison for the Republicans themselves. Mr. Taber's party colleagues were quick to cover the gauche blunder of their Appropriations Committee chairman when he attempted to stint on veterans' benefits in a pre-election year. And now a rebellion threatens to break out among Western Republicans over proposals to slash appropriations for the Interior Department, which would wreck plans for a Missouri Valley Authority and for other reclamation and irrigation projects, particularly in California's Central Valley. The alarmed Westerners quickly sensed the irate reaction of their districts to the prospective cut of 60 to 70 per cent for reclamation purposes, and at once served notice on Martin and on Majority Leader Halleck that they would bolt the party on the issue and restore the appropriations. With the Democrats, they have more than enough votes to carry out the threat. And they are in deadly earnest. As Representative Hill of Colorado pointed out, such an assault on the reclamation program would have a "devastating effect" on the party that fathered it in the days of Theodore Roosevelt.

To add to the sorrows of the G. O. P. leadership, farm Republicans are ready to lead a similar assault on the slashing of the Agriculture Department's appropriation, and, according to Business Week, trade-association executives, most of them Republican, are up in arms against attempts to curtail the Commerce Department's business-service functions.

The experience should prove highly educational to a party that thought it could erase a decade and a half of the New Deal by a little intensive double-entry book-keeping. The question is whether the education will take effect before the fall of 1948.

The U. N. and Palestine

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

IN THE end, what is decided about Palestine in the U. N. will depend upon this country. The problem will be solved the way we want it to be; or it will be left unsolved if we decline to take a clear position. The United States has tried ever since World War I to evade the role that is now being forced upon it; and with good reason. Palestine meant many things to many peoples, but it was above all a by-product of empire. The mandate was accepted by Britain not out of zeal for the Jewish National Home but out of a firm purpose to establish and fortify the British position in the strategic areas wrested from Turkey in World War I.

The rise of America's oil empire in the Middle East has shifted the balance of interest and with it the weight of responsibility. Britain is still there, but the United States has moved in too. And the Truman Doctrine, about to find its first overt expression in Greece and Turkey, applies with equal force throughout the Near and Middle East. Greece is a frontier post, but Palestine is a major bastion of the new empire of oil.

It is easy to understand why Britain decided to submit the Palestine question to the United Nations. Caught between the irreconcilable claims of Jews and Arabs, the mandate has become a nightmare of terror and repression. The British military establishment in Palestine, 120,000 strong, is a giant trapped and harried by pigmies. Only a war of extermination could end the resistance of the Jews to the restrictions imposed by the White Paper; and the British government could neither stomach nor survive such a struggle. On the other hand, abolition of the White Paper and admission of the hundreds of thousands of Jews waiting to come to Palestine would rouse fierce resentment among all the Arab states, even though it would probably not result in the general uprising the British pretend to fear. To dump the problem into the lap of the U. N., while at the same time reserving the right to ignore its advice, offers Whitehall the best way out of its dilemma.

Britain's interests are still enormous and its military power formidable; but the vital force of empire, the will and wealth to dominate, is ebbing. This Mr. Churchill denies; he looks upon the government's policy of retreat as a tragic but temporary aberration. But he is romantically wrong. His Labor successors are far more realistic than he. They want to keep all the profits of empire they can, and cut the losses; and they know that this aim requires some measure of withdrawal. In terms of Palestine it may mean a willingness to relinquish the mandate; Britain would probably be glad to hand that thorny prize to the United States. Or it may mean merely an effort to win United Nations support for a compromise which will leave the British in effective control while offering small concessions to Arabs and Jews. It is even possible that Mr. Bevin still hopes to force through the Morrison-Grady plan. Whatever formula may ultimately be accepted, we can assume that the British intend to maintain a set-up which will protect their interests by suppressing revolt in Palestine and keeping Russian influence out.

It looks, therefore, as if Mr. Bevin had submitted Palestine to the Assembly half in good faith and half with his fingers crossed. And it is clear that the United States is the one power capable of forcing a different policy. If this country approved a solution for Palestine and assumed a major share of the responsibility for carrying it through, there is no reason to believe that Britain would balk. Indeed, an important part of Whitehall's plan of strategic retreat is to involve the United States in each area of interest, for that is the way investments can best be safeguarded, risks minimized, and losses reduced.

In spite of vacillations and conflicting promises to Arabs and Jews, the United States is legally and morally bound to support the principle of a Jewish "homeland" in Palestine as well as the admission of a large number of Jewish immigrants. We have also President Truman's recent declaration that in the judgment of the United States "the Jewish National Home has not as yet been fully developed." Just how far the American delegates in the Assembly will go in defining this commitment one dare not guess. Conflicting and powerful influences are at work, some pressing for a Jewish state, others for conciliation of the Arabs at the expense of the Jews. With the Greek-Turkish policy as a warning, we cannot assume that this country will be bound by decisions made before oil and Russia emerged as compelling factors. But neither should we too hastily decide that our new interests and fears necessarily imply a policy patterned on Britain's. For the fact that British policy in Palestine is a failure is attested not only by continued disorder and repression and military rule but by Britain's voluntary submission of the question to the U. N. The United States can hardly wish to see that failure perpetuated, still less to assume responsibility for it. Our government, in attempting to justify its intervention in Greece and Turkey, has constantly stressed the need of raising the economic level of the people to make possible a stable democratic society. In Palestine the one valid hope of democratic stability lies in the survival of Zionist institutions and their continued growth. The alternative is violent rebellion against a feudal tyranny which cannot be held intact indefinitely even by foreign doles and British troops.

The United Nations General Assembly, meeting next week in special session, will appoint a committee to investigate the Palestine question and report to the regular session in September. The choice of members and the instructions to the committee will inevitably determine the nature of the inquiry; so the decision is a vital one. A fair inquiry will be one which scrutinizes Britain's administration of the mandate with complete freedom, which passes on the legality of the White Paper and the restrictions based upon it, which considers the complaints of Jews and Arabs, which studies the various proposals for change made by both peoples and by previous investigators—particularly by the recent Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, whose excellent report was so brusquely brushed aside by the British government. The Assembly committee should also face the desperate situation of the displaced Jews in camps in Germany—and of those on Cyprus. And the result of the study should be a series of recommendations aimed at creating a new political order in Palestine, with the full weight of the United Nations put behind it.

The United States should insist that the inquiry committee be chosen with this purpose in view. To imagine that such a study could be made by a body which includes any of the parties in interest is clearly absurd. Neither Britain nor the Arab states should be represented; their presence would prejudice the case from the start.

Preferably, the committee should be made up of individuals chosen for their ability and integrity and not as representatives of states. But if the nationalist mood prevalent in the U. N. finds this basis of choice unpalatable, the best alternative would be a committee representing middle and smaller states which are not too closely tied to one or another of the great powers. In this divided world, real neutrality is a fiction; the most one can hope for is relative independence.

The Nation Associates is submitting to the United Nations a memorandum arguing the necessity of a committee such as I have outlined. We urge, at the same time, that if nations directly concerned should be included, the Assembly must also admit the Jewish Agency as the official representative of the Zionist interest in and out of Palestine. If a neutral body is appointed, we advocate a procedure which insures full opportunity to all the parties concerned to appear both before the committee of inquiry and in the deliberations of the Assembly itself. This means that special provision must be made for the participation of the Jewish Agency, since Britain and Arab states are in a position to present testimony and argue their case as members of the United Nations

India's Hour of Decision

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, April 19

THE first impression created by the Mountbattens during the three weeks of the new viceroyalty has been good. They have broken down the rigidity and pomp surrounding the Viceroy and have seen representatives of many different groups—the Congress Party, Moslem League, princes, untouchables, Sikhs. The Viceroy has had long talks with Gandhi and Jinnah covering the entire ground and has ascertained their points of view. Today Mountbatten will see the governors of all eleven provinces and obtain reports on the situation in their respective jurisdictions. Lady Mountbatten has been busy visiting Delhi's hospitals and making the personal acquaintance of leaders of the women's movements.

All this is good and augurs well for the future. But the process of receiving other people's impressions—those of politicians, princes, governors, and lesser officials—must soon end. Then the Viceroy must begin to form decisions in his own mind in regard to the manner in which power will be transferred, completely and peacefully, by June of next year.

The first question of almost every Indian is whether Mountbatten, appointed for the short space of fourteen months, can impress on all officials from the governors down the Labor government's determination to effect such a transfer of power. The majority of the governors are drawn from the Indian Civil Service: they are able and experienced administrators, but they don't believe in India's right to independence or its capacity for it. In a dramatic outburst last week the Pathan premier of the Northwest Frontier Province declared that Churchill had more friends and followers in India than in England and that they were using the Moslem League as their tool. Several of the Viceroy's British agents who act as advisers to the princes similarly give the impression of fighting a rearguard action in order to obstruct or delay India's advance toward freedom.

The time is rapidly approaching for some big decisions on the part of the Viceroy, the Congress leaders, and the Moslem League. Jinnah continues to demand that full Pakistan apply to five entire provinces—Assam and Bengal in the northeast and Sind, Punjab, and the Northwest Frontier Province on the other side. There has been a remarkable movement among the Hindus and Sikhs in these areas in favor of the partition of Bengal and Punjab. Applying the same logic and principles used by Jinnah in his demand for division, they have worked out a scheme for partitioning the Punjab, the eastern half of which is decisively Sikh and Hindu. Similarly, the Bengal Hindus want a separate homeland for themselves west of and including Calcutta. Should these movements gain more strength Jinnah's conception of Pakistan stands in grave peril of being truncated. Assam has a Hindu majority, and the Northwest Frontier Province, though overwhelmingly Moslem, is under the influence of the Congress Party. The Pathan values independence more than anything else and despises the Moslem League as a party run by pro-British landlords.

Six months ago the suggestion for the partition of Bengal and the Punjab would have been fiercely resisted by Hindus and Sikhs as the thin edge of the wedge of Pakistan. But the large-scale murder, rioting, and arson during this period have convinced the non-Moslems that division of the provinces, however distasteful, is the only practical solution. Strangely enough, the Moslems, who insist on the partition of India, disapprove this solution of the Hindus and Sikhs. A divided Pakistan, with eastern Bengal, western Punjab, and Sind separated from the rest by a thousand miles of Hindu territory, would be administratively impossible. Gandhi at one stage seemed unwilling to bless this demand for partition but has weakened in his opposition. Other Congress leaders, like Nehru, believe it offers a way, however difficult, out of the present deadlock.

This is not the only issue on which Jinnah must reach a decision. Another which he has not faced is whether the Moslem League will enter the Constituent Assembly or stay out. This decision must be taken soon, since the Assembly will proceed with its task of framing the constitution regardless of the League's policy.

Nehru made another characteristically generous offer to Jinnah yesterday, appealing to him to confer with the representatives of the other parties and reach generally acceptable agreements. Nehru's view is that the Indians must settle their internal differences and take full advantage of the British offer to withdraw in June of next year. If the Moslem League accepts the invitation in the right spirit, the problem can be solved. If not, those parts of India, whether entire provinces or more limited areas, which recognize the authority of the Constituent Assembly should frame a constitution for themselves, thus insuring independence for a great part of the country at any rate.

Nehru again made one point explicit and clear: the Congress Party will not coerce any region to accept the constitution framed by the Assembly. Pakistan, he observed, can never be established by violence and murder; all settlements must result from negotiations and compromises. There was deep emotion behind his words as he referred to the vast influence India could wield both among its Asian neighbors and in the world if its internal feuds did not prevent. No religious community, he said, could aspire to domination.

There are two points that for tactical reasons Nehru and the other Congress leaders have not raised. First, assuming as seems likely that Jinnah and the Moslem League will decline to join the Constituent Assembly and will demand separation, should the Assembly continue to work on the basis of a weak federal center controlling only defense, external affairs, communications, and possibly some aspects of finance? This was a compromise intended to attract the Moslem League into the Constituent Assembly. Many competent constitutionalists have been critical of it, pointing out that India's social and economic progress demands a much stronger federal authority. If the Moslem League stays out, the compromise loses the only merit claimed for it. Therefore, the argument runs, why should not the Assembly decide to strengthen the federal center, while conceding to the units the largest possible measure of autonomy?

The second consideration is whether the Moslem Leaguers who joined the interim government during Lord Wavell's viceroyalty—when they had the assurance, which Jinnah later repudiated, that the League would enter the Assembly—have the right to continue as members. This issue was raised by Nehru, but the controversy ended for the time being with the recall of Lord Wavell. Mountbatten has not had the question put to him, since hope persists that the crisis may be averted. Congress leaders have appealed to Jinnah to take part in the Constituent Assembly, and Gandhi, more realistic than the rest, seems willing to let Jinnah run the central government in cooperation with Congress provided he guarantees peace in the country and seeks Pakistan through argument and not force and violence. If Mountbatten confirms the first impression he has created—of being strong and decisive as well as pleasant and accessible—the crisis may never come.

Some essential conditions, however, will have to be fulfilled. Governors and officials must either loyally carry out the government's policy or vacate office. The Moslem Leaguers cannot urge direct action and incite to murder if they are to remain members of the interim government. The process of transferring power must begin immediately.

Looting the National Forests

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Portland, Oregon, April 18

IN A period of international crisis, when the attention of the American people is on distant points, their enemies at home invariably get ready for some good old-fashioned stabbing in the back. This time the knife is being whetted by the National Livestock Association and kindred groups. The victim has not been closed in on for many years. It is the vast system of National Forests west of the Continental Divide. John Muir, Teddy Roosevelt, and more recently Gifford Pinchot, all died thinking these majestic woods and mountain ranges forever the possession of succeeding generations of Americans. The stockmen hope to prove them wrong. Unfortunately, the present Congress is ideally constituted to transform such a hope into reality.

Ever since the National Forests were torn away from the lumber companies and railroads, grazing has been allowed within their boundaries. During these years, through political influence and mortgage foreclosures, the grazing permits issued by the federal government have become the property of a comparatively small group of powerful ranchers. Fewer than 11,000 farm owners out of the half-million or more in the Far West monopolize the forest range. On these grazing privileges formidable baronies in sheep and cattle have been built. Animals withheld from the market in order to arouse feeling against the OPA were actually fattened on grass growing on the public domain, and the American people thus denied the product of their own forage.

You might think that the stockmen would be satisfied with these feudal powers and not seek to extend them—but you would think so only if you were totally ignorant of the practices of the big ranchers in Wyoming, California, New Mexico, Oregon, and Arizona. While any contest to determine the greediest and most selfish minority in the United States would assuredly end in a photo finish, the inevitable winner would be the Western livestock industry. Its operators regard as insufferable the slightest effort by the American government to halt their flagrant looting of the range. Having helped to liquidate the OPA, they now stalk even bigger quarry. Their current ambition is to bring about the end of all Forest Service control over 80,000,000 acres of the most scenic and productive mountain pasture between the Rockies and the Pacific Ocean.

The livestock industry wants to own this land outright, and its scheme to get it has been given encouragement by recent resolutions of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Not since the campaign waged long ago against T. R.'s conservation program has so blatant a proposal for the destruction of recreational and scenic values been advanced. Moreover, some 8,000,000 people get their drinking water from rivers and lakes which rise in this area. And it is a haven for wildlife—elk, mule deer, bighorn sheep, antelope. It includes the Tonto Basin, the Wallowa Mountains, the High Sierras, and many other regions of natural grandeur.

Even the lumber industry is horrified by the demands of the ranchers. "As a raid upon public resources the plan of the stockmen is astounding in its audacity," asserts the American Forestry Association, itself heavily composed of logging and sawmill members. "This is a plan to break up the National Forests. The strategy is to put pressure on Congress to eliminate grazing lands from the forests and give permit holders the right to acquire such lands in fee simple. We cannot believe that the Eightieth Congress will be trapped by this strategy."

The American Forestry Association, I am afraid, does not know as much as it should about Congressmen. The situation is ripe for just such a legalized steal as the cattle and sheep raisers now contemplate. The people themselves disconnected the burglary alarm last November when they defeated tested conservationists in the Western states and sent to Congress as their replacements many allies of the stockmen. Even such Democrats as Senators O'Mahoney and Hatch, who have taken a liberal stand on various other issues, are willing to see ranch herds eat off the grass anchoring the top soil on the vital Columbia, Snake, and Colorado watersheds.

Franklin D. Roosevelt knew what conservation was all about. A regard for forests and soil was instilled in him by his upbringing. When he spoke from an observation-car platform, he frequently advised the people to guard their resources. On trips across the Inland Empire and Oregon's high desert he commented constantly on the trees, or grass, or gullies fringing the railroad right of way. Roosevelt appointed two great chief foresters, the late F. A. Silcox and Lyle Watts. Watts, a lean, quiet career man in the Forest Service, is still on the job, but the fervor for conservation has been extinguished in the rest of the government. Secretary Krug, for example, has been practically supine in the face of attacks by the livestock men on his department's handling of arid grazing lands which are less valuable than the National Forest pastures.

The first objective of the stockmen is to have federal forage areas turned over to the various states for "administration." The tender mercy the forests would then receive may be judged by the fact that practically all the Western states long ago parted with their public school lands for less than the proverbial song. The ultimate goal of the ranchers is of course private ownership of the long mountain slopes which provide millions of people with opportunities for skiing, hunting, fishing, boating, and camping, to say nothing of furnishing water for domestic uses and crop irrigation. "Seldom would the rights of so many have been so flouted to intrench the special privilege of so few," declares the Enterprise Chieftain, published in the heart of the Wallowa grazing country along the Oregon-Idaho border.

The United States Chamber of Commerce resolves: "Private ownership should be reestablished as the ultimate objective in government land policy." The theme of the campaign is indicated by use of the word "re-established." Federal ownership of National Forest grazing lands is condemned as a heretical New Deal doctrine, ■ practice obviously never envisioned by the nation's founders. Completely forgotten is the fact that the Roosevelt who set aside the National Forests was named Theodore, and that before him the cause had been supported by both Grover Cleveland and Benjamin Harrison.

Grazing preferences in the National Forests were granted over the strenuous objection of John Muir and other conservationists. Even E. H. Harriman voiced a mild protest. T. R. and Gifford Pinchot, distinguished conservationist and head of the Forest Service, finally compromised with the livestock interests; else there might have been no forest reserves at all. Then as now many of the Senators from the inter-mountain states fitted conveniently into the saddle-bags of the beef barons.

Instead of being grateful for the privilege of feeding their stock on the public domain, the stockmen have abused it shamefully. They have run larger herds than the land is supposed to sustain. Rangers zealous in the public interest have learned that their superiors have received nasty letters from local Congressmen. The Wyoming stock growers are now attempting to force the ouster of John W. Spencer, regional forester at Denver, who courageously referred to the ranchers seeking to get personal ownership of forest lands as "trouble-makers, rabble-rousers, and purely selfish individuals." Conservationists in the Rocky Mountain area were heartsick when the Department of Agriculture chose to issue a mealy-mouthed apology for Spencer's "injudicious words."

The stockmen want to rid themselves of the Forest Service because its soil and forage experts insist that the number of animals allowed under at least half the grazing permits must be reduced. With the grass gone, the sod is beginning to blow. Eroded hillsides are crumbling into rivers and creeks. Fish runs have been destroyed. Lakes behind irrigation dams are clogged with silt. Flash floods replace the steady murmur of mountain streams.

If the number of head allowed under a permit is trimmed, the rancher will be out of pocket thousands of dollars. Many famous Western ranches are mere "head-quarters outfits"—that is, the operator owns only a house, corrals, and a silo. The value of the property is in the monopolistic privilege of using the adjacent National Forest land for forage. "Grazing permits," says the Chieftain, "are often far more valuable than the deeded ranches to which they are appurtenant." These permits are sold with the ranch. At a recent sale in Montana the ranch was appraised at $6,500 and the grazing permit at $29,000.

The Forest Service has not only stated that the forest lands are over-grazed. It has also hinted that perhaps reduction ought to be made for "distribution purposes." Why should one big operator hog the grass in a whole mountain cordillera? Why not reduce his permit and give others a chance, particularly if some of the newcomers happen to be ex-G. I.'s starting out on a shoestring? This suggestion is lèse majesté to the cattle Senators. Pat McCarran of Nevada has introduced a bill taking from the Forest Service power to trim the permits of operators now running stock on the National Forests. And Senator Robertsof of Wyoming, himself the holder of a permit to run 2,400 sheep on the Shoshone National Forest, is sponsoring legislation to turn over the public domain to the Western states. This, of course, is tantamount to giving away the legacy of the American people at bargain-basement prices.

If these measures are passed, Harry Truman's veto may be the sole means of preserving our heritage of forest and mountain for future generations. But the character of the President's conservation advisers is not reassuring. Certainly neither Secretary Krug nor Secretary Anderson has demonstrated the understanding of soil and forest problems which distinguished Harold Ickes and Henry Wallace. The lethargy of the people of the West is also discouraging. They succumb to the argument, repeated with boring monotony in the daily press, that the inflated prosperity of the big stockmen is essential to the economic well-being of the region. They forget the lesson learned long ago by Switzerland—that the tourist trade goes on forever and brings money into the pockets of everyone from hotel keepers to garage mechanics. A range grazed bare is an economic loss. A mountain meadow, lush with grass and wild flowers, will lure nostalgic fishermen and campers from the ends of the earth.

If the National Forest grazing lands pass into the possession of the livestock operators, the joys they offer will be gone beyond recapture. The National Forest system as Muir and Pinchot envisioned it, as millions of Americans have come to accept it, will be ended. The one sure way to thwart the stockmen and their minions in Congress is for people in garden clubs, wild-life groups, and Izaak Walton Leagues all over the country to make their voices heard.

Italy's Place in the World

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

IN THE Palazzo Chigi, Italy's State Department, Carlo Sforza has found the spot in which he can best serve the interests of his country. A consistent anti-Fascist, Count Sforza quit the Italian embassy in Paris on the very day Mussolini came to power, in spite of the Duce's insistence that he remain. When the Fascist regime was overthrown, he might easily have become the leader of the new Italy; but he made the mistake of letting himself be caught in the web of Anglo-American diplomacy, whose goal then as now was to check the Resistance everywhere and prevent it from becoming stronger than was necessary for the defeat of the Nazis. Washington and London were playing one group of political exiles against the other in order to split the anti-Fascist forces of Italy just as they had split those of France and Spain.

For a brief period Sforza was involved in these intrigues to the point of believing that he was the only man who could swing Anglo-American support to the Italian liberation movement. Against his initial impulse to stay out of the Badoglio Cabinet, he finally agreed to become a minister without portfolio. But Sforza's republican sentiments and his loyalty to the Italian people were too deeply ingrained: when the British began maneuvering openly to restore the House of Savoy, he rebelled. In reprisal Churchill attacked him as politically "unreliable" and charged that he was conspiring to usurp Marshal Badoglio's place. By this cynical foray into Italian politics the British leader succeeded in blocking Sforza's appointment as Prime Minister after the first Bonomi Cabinet fell in November, 1944. Now, on his own merits and without the blessing of either Washington or London, Sforza has won the post of Foreign Minister. Had it not been for the split in the Socialist Party, Nenni would probably have remained in the Foreign Office and pursued a bolder policy than his successor; since he did resign, however, Italy is fortunate to have a man of the experience and international prestige of Sforza.

It is the fashion these days to scoff at classical diplomacy. In the period between the two world wars the career diplomat became so closely identified in the public mind with failure, appeasement, and all the rest that progressives instinctively look with a suspicious eye on striped trousers and silk hat. But recent international conferences have proved that a certain amount of old-style diplomacy, or at least old-style diplomatic experience, is desirable; at the Paris Foreign Ministers' conference I heard radicals more than once express a longing for a few veterans who had cut their teeth on problems of foreign affairs and knew how to deal with them.

Drawing by Dolbin

Carlo Sforza

Carlo Sforza is such a veteran. He made his international debut at the Algieras conference of 1906, which settled the fate of Morocco. There the young diplomat was thrown into the center of the turmoil of his time. Sforza was one of the first to realize that the European balance was already precarious and that the headstrong ambition of Kaiser Wilhelm, the stupidity of the statesmen of imperial Austria, and the consuming greed of Hungary's feudal landholders must inevitably lead to war. Time after time he called the turn in foreign affairs. In 1919 when the Paris conference was announcing almost daily the "imminent collapse" of the Soviets, Sforza wrote to his chief, Foreign Minister Sonnino: "I hesitate to venture an opinion on the vitality and the future of the Soviet regime. But of this I can assure Your Excellency: it will never be smashed by wretched White Russians like those we have saved at the front and are now supporting. . . . Theirs is a dying world, without courage, without generosity, without ideals." But one of Sonnino's weaknesses was his lack of imagination; and as Sforza told me the other day, repeating a favorite maxim of his, "imagination is the only thing that counts in foreign policy."

A notable achievement in Sforza's long career was to have gained the confidence of Serbian Prime Minister Pachich and to have convinced him that it was in the interest of both Yugoslavia and Italy to settle their differences by direct negotiation. During the Spa conference of 1920, when I interviewed him for La Nación of Buenos Aires, Sforza told me that the only way to come to an agreement with the Yugoslavs was to deal directly with them; he did not allow the dispute to be brought before the conference. He carried on direct discussions with the Yugoslavs and after five months of effort concluded the Treaty of Rapallo, the first negotiated treaty of World War I. Unfortunately Italy had little opportunity to enjoy this success, for barely two years later an adventurer called Mussolini staged his march on Rome. The Rapallo accomplishment by itself justified the choice of Sforza as Foreign Minister in the present period, when the need to establish friendly relations with Yugoslavia is even more urgent.

Meeting Sforza for the first time since he left the United States two years ago, I found him as youthful and energetic as ever, even more sure of himself, and delighted to be back in the magnificent setting of the Palazzo Chigi, which seems somehow to have been designed to his measure. His visiting cards and all official documents simply carry the name "Carlo Sforza," though the Republic has authorized him to use his title. When the issue of titles of nobility came up in the Constituent Assembly, a Communist deputy, Ruggero Grieco, settled it with his vote, saying: "After all, titles are fairly innocuous toys; surely the many freedoms guaranteed by the Italian constitution ought to include the freedom to play with them."

Recently Sforza joined the Republican Party of Rodolfo Pacciardi, though in the Cabinet he is an independent. It is a source of deep pride to him that Italy's "common man," instead of following Giannini, has rallied to those parties which stand for real democracy based on social and economic justice. His sympathy for the people will not be affected by the incident last week when he was assaulted by a group of unemployed. He knows that the provocative display of all kinds of luxuries in the windows of shops and the exhibition of the new wealth in Italy has created an irritation which Fascist agents and other provocateurs may easily exploit.

Sforza is certain the treaty will be revised, because, he says, it is almost inconceivable that the Allied statesmen would deny Italy a role in the reconstruction of Europe for the sake of a few million lire in reparations. At the same time he realizes that the way to speed revision is not by protest demonstrations and threats, all too reminiscent of the Fascist era. He succeeded in obtaining Cabinet approval of the treaty on the ground that it would prove Italy's determination "to hasten the advent of a constructive peace in the interest of genuine amity and collaboration among nations." Unlike the reactionaries, Sforza rejects the idea that Italy, by playing the role of tertius gaudens, could profitably exploit the differences between East and West. He opposed an anti-Soviet bloc in 1919 and he opposes it today. The new foreign policy of Italy is embodied in Article VI of the draft constitution, which not only bars forever Italian participation in wars of aggression but accepts any limitation of sovereignty necessary to make the United Nations a more useful instrument than the League.

Unquestionably the peace treaty will be revised. But in the meantime, it seems to me, Italy should be admitted to the United Nations with full rights as a country that has resolutely taken the democratic path.

While Sforza is doing his best to pave the way for Italy's entrance into world affairs without sacrifice of its independence, his colleague in the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, Rodolfo Morandi, is working hard to restore the country's economy without mortgaging it to reactionary internal or foreign interests.

Morandi is one of the ablest men in the Socialist Party. He has that characteristic air of energy and initiative which marks the men of the Resistance. Now in his middle forties, he struggled throughout the Fascist period to keep alive a nucleus around which the party could later be rebuilt. Morandi was arrested for propaganda activities in behalf of the Spanish Republic at the most crucial moment of Italy's intervention in Spain. He is the author of a number of books on economics, notably the "Storia della Grande Industria Moderna in Italia." Convinced that in Italy as in all Europe reconstruction must go hand in hand with socialism, he advocates orderly planning to eliminate the chaotic free-for-all of unregulated enterprise.

For more than twenty years Italy survived in an economic limbo halfway between state control and free enterprise. At the economic congress in Florence last January the delegates were unanimous on one point: the country must now choose between a capitalist economy and a planned economy along Socialist lines. The partisans of capitalism pointed to the recent extraordinary expansion of certain industries, especially textiles, which in 1946 surpassed all previous records; I myself talked to several prosperous textile manufacturers who impressed me with their optimism and ingenuity. But Morandi is not interested in isolated success stories; his aim is to release all the potentialities of Italian industry. For while the textile industry has already reached a peak of technical capacity, there are many other industries, like food, chemicals, and machine tools, which still have a long way to go and whose development could contribute greatly to the economic independence of the country.

Morandi realizes that Mussolini's corporate state discredited in the eyes of many Italians the whole idea of planning. None the less he has submitted for popular approval a simple program outlining two objectives:

1. To reconstitute an efficient system of transport by rail, sea, and other public carriers, and to alleviate the shortage of electric power. At the present rate, this objective can be realized by 1949.

2. To reestablish the balance of payments, provided, of course, that materials necessary to the development of Italian industry are made available. This implies important changes in the economic structure and therefore cannot be achieved much before the end of 1951.

Economically Italy has one advantage over France: the war left its industrial machinery relatively intact. "Deliver nothing to the Germans—save as much as you can for Italy," was one of the slogans of the Resistance. All sorts of methods were used to keep supplies from going to the Nazis. Hitler's armies were able to buy far more in Vichy France than in Fascist Italy. When Mussolini signed a pact with Hitler, anti-Fascists in the civil service as well as in industry systematically sabotaged the fulfilment of its economic clauses. The outraged Nazis complained bitterly to the Duce; it did no good. Machines were smuggled out of factories and hidden away in villages; in Milan I visited a printing plant whose entire equipment had disappeared overnight and been distributed among peasants in the neighborhood. Thus the bulk of Italy's wealth remained within its borders even though the Germans created a vast black market in the hope of luring products into the open. When the Allies reached the industrial centers of northern Italy, they were amazed at the resources they found there.

Despite the efforts of the Resistance, however, Morandi has a major task on his hands. Although considerable progress was made in 1946, industrial production on the whole is still under 70 per cent of the 1938 level. The lira is subject to constant inflationary pressure, and its fluctuations make it difficult to fix prices or finance new business enterprises. The nightmare of Italian planners is the lack of fuel. Before the war England, Germany, and Poland supplied most of Italy's coal, but they are no longer in a position to do it. Of course there is always the United States, but American coal is expensive and distant and, besides, Italy has not the ships to transport it. The government is now studying several practical projects for new hydroelectric power plants; the main difficulty is to find sufficient capital.

All this may lead people to question my optimism about Italy's future. That optimism is based not so much on statistics as on human factors. Italian leaders with whom I spoke, unlike those in other European countries, expressed complete confidence in their ability, despite all difficulties, to see the job through. The Italian workers provide even greater reason for hope. While I was in Milan I used to watch them on their way to the factories. I would get up early and go to the Cathedral Square, where other early risers were treating hundreds of pigeons to their breakfast. Then I would take a tramway or a bus loaded with workers and ride out to the factory with them just to listen to their talk. At closing time I would go again to the plant and accompany them back to town. Men who exhibit the humor and vitality and interest of these people will surely set Italy on its feet again.

Given the role the workers played in the Resistance, one can understand Morandi's determination to push through his bill to give legal status to the "Consigli di Gestione" (Industrial Councils). He told me the story of these mixed committees of laborers and technicians which sprang up spontaneously during the war and spread through Italy after the liberation. They shared in the battle for freedom; today they are more than ever essential in the reconstruction of the nation. During the Allied occupation the committees were prohibited from functioning; apparently the military authorities thought they represented a step toward bolshevism even though similar methods were prevalent in Britain. Morandi's project has met with stiff opposition from the Christian Democrats; Premier de Gasperi argues that recognition of the committees might jeopardize Italy's chances of obtaining further financial assistance from the United States. The dollar continues to exercise an inhibiting influence on progressive developments in Europe.

If in these articles I have placed special emphasis on the role of the Resistance, it is not out of partisan sympathy. It is because the Resistance is the very backbone of the new Italian Republic and will, I predict, lead the left to victory in the elections next October. I have come back from this brief visit to Italy convinced that neither the Vatican nor Western capitalism nor the surviving native Fascists will prevent the Italian people from making their country a leading factor in a progressive Europe. That is why I say again: Open the doors of the United Nations to the new Italy.

Ocho Rios, Jamaica

THE "uneducated ones" in Jamaica speak a pidgin English that is almost unintelligible, and speak it in a singsong fashion that doesn't make it any more comprehensible. By chance the Gleaner printed the other day a poem written in this lingo. I pass it on both for the language and the content. As literary editors are wont to say, it has some rather good lines in it.

PLAIN TALK

Tan tuddy, bwoy, an ah respect

GEORGE B. WALLACE

One is always being regaled with talk about the ways of the natives and how one must handle these people. An amusing and downright woman—a part-time resident who owns a property here—told me you had to lose your temper at regular intervals and make it clear that you were not a “fool-fool.” She outlined her methods of preventing pilfering—up to a point. She said you had to allow for a certain amount, and Marx would agree with her. She spoke of the high incidence of venereal disease and added that the only thing that kept it down was the fever treatment provided by malaria. “If they wipe out malaria before they wipe out syphilis,” she said, “God help us.” Shortly before our conversation Pamela Churchill had been out here and had written an article on the terrible conditions in the hospital in Kingston. One of her complaints was that the patients sometimes slept two—or three—in a bed. My acquaintance said that Pamela was right but that Pamela didn’t know that the natives don’t like to sleep alone—her own servants have often told her so, and she has never been able to put over the idea of one to a bed!

All “nice people” agree that the natives have no morals. One woman told me that the native population was 75 per cent illegitimate. The old grannies say that you are not a woman until you’ve had a child, and girls are anxious to prove their womanhood. Besides, marriage is a costly affair, since it is a great event and must be celebrated properly. By the time they get around to it there may already be seven or eight children on the scene. The connection between sex and sin has simply not been established. A woman who does a good deal of work with the natives and is fond of them told me she had a group of girls who came to her house once a week to sew. One of them suddenly stopped coming. When she questioned the others she was told that the girl had had a baby. “She knew you wouldn’t approve of it,” said the informant. Illegitimacy makes difficulties, of course, for young and indigent mothers. If they go to court they may get half a crown or a shilling and a half a week from the father or fathers of their children, but their employability is impaired. Where religion is concerned they are similarly polite and impervious. The same woman was authorized by her church to hold Sunday School at her home. When she asked what time of day would be most suitable, she was told that the afternoon would be the best time because the kids went to the Baptist Sunday School in the morning. They like to dress up and go to church and sing, but creeds mean little.

All this is a condensed version of the views of white people I talked to, views undoubtedly colored by a conviction of upper-class superiority. I offer them as testimony not as evidence.

But it is a fact that the very poor present a difficult problem, especially in the towns. This problem assumes its most extreme form in the West End of Kingston, an urban slum which was recently the subject of much comment when a member of the city council, Wills O. Isaacs, made a tour of the area and confronted his colleagues with his findings. One has only to drive through the district—as one does traveling in or out of Kingston—to know that Mr. Isaacs’s dismal report was not exaggerated. It is a huge tropical Hooverville, the obvious breeding place of the current crime wave and of the epidemic which Mr. Isaacs said must sooner or later break out. For an American perhaps the most lurid sight of all was the spectacle of two movie houses, rising like palaces out of the surrounding squalor, with long lines of people waiting to see “The Road to Alcatraz” and “Saratoga Trunk.” It seemed hardly the fare they needed.

Needless to say, the illiterate poor, urban and rural, are a class apart from the colored Jamaicans of education and status who with the white minority run the affairs of the island. In view of the fact that they are not a race apart, the nature of the relations between the whites and the people of color on the upper levels seems to an American all the more interesting. Officially, of course, there is no color line. I was assured more than once, however, that socially the color line does exist. Yet as it works out in practice, according to my observation, the line doesn’t hold with any consistency. It is whispered that so-and-so is no longer accepted because he married a woman “with a lick.” Yet the very people who will not accept the woman in question have colored friends of their own.

Among the most interesting people I met were a colored man and his white wife who told me something of the family history. Mr. A’s great-grandfather, a Scotchman, came to Jamaica in 1743 and married a mulatto—at this point Mr. A spoke with eloquence of the superior colonizing talents of the Scotch as compared with the English. They founded a family which in the third and fourth generations is proud of its ancestry, both dark and light, and appears to be freely accepted, socially and otherwise. It was a very pleasant experience. I’ve no doubt that there is a great deal of race prejudice, but it would seem that colored people are accepted or rejected as individual human beings and not made much or little of as symbols—as they usually are in America by the enlightened or the prejudiced as the case may be.

To one coming in from the great world Jamaica seems an archaic period piece, something left over from a simpler time. It has its charm. The white people I've met have a very pleasant way about them—as if the tropical sunshine had softened the sharp edges of their Northern heritage. But they live in a small and special world—which is now being impinged upon by world events and forces, including the famous American standard of living. They are in general conservative, and think the Labor government is going too fast and too far!

I've mentioned the Daily Gleaner. It's not a bad little newspaper. Mr. Bustamante says it's a monopoly; the Gleaner retorts that it is not. Certainly it gives plenty of space to Mr. B. Its news stories of the British crisis revealed a desire to believe that the Labor government was about to fall—like many other journalistic harvesters the Gleaner sows what it reaps—and this desire was nowhere more apparent than in its considered, reluctant editorial opinion that nothing of the sort would happen. But it tries, perforce, to please its readers, white, brown, and black, and it is endlessly interesting for the picture it gives of the people who do read and advertise in it. It plays up, for instance, cases of racial discrimination in the States. At the same time it deplors Bustamante's references to the color question at home. Its advertisements are often quaint and naive. My favorite, frequently run, is that of a funeral director whose catch line is, "If I should die call Jackson." Its proofreading is amazing and confounding; some of its headlines are not to be classified. One declared that "Lady Huggins Finds Poor Stimulating." (Lady Huggins is the wife of the Governor.) Her speech didn't really deserve the headline. She, by the way, is very active in the campaign to prevent cruelty to animals. A great many ladies are: Marxians please note. The animals are badly treated, and thin as rails. It's just possible, of course, that the natives think it's the only way to handle these creatures.

ENVOI

In Jamaica you still clap your hands to summon a servant. An American who still has a maid was wondering how Mary would react if she inadvertently did the same thing at home. "That's easy," said another American, "she'd think you were applauding and ask for a raise."

I prefer it that way—even though my hands have acquired that Ivory look in just twelve days. I shouldn't like to live in a community with a submerged population. It's pleasant to be waited on hand and foot for a pittance, but it's also uncomfortable. And the discomfort rises from a mixture of feelings. The sense of guilt is basic, I suppose, and in a way it puts you at the mercy of the people who wait upon you, whatever their particular attitudes. You tend to ascribe to them all the resentments you yourself would have in their situation—and the fact that they accept their situation and don't have the resentments you ascribe to them is not soothing either.

The faithful servant embarrasses you. The occasional surly one arouses a vague anxiety rather than a clear anger. And, not least, the knowledge of what the living conditions of these people must be may stir your nobler feelings, but it also makes you conscious of the relation between food and sanitation. The ideal of equality, like most ideals, has its practical aspects.

In the Wind

A PAMPHLET ENTITLED "The Use of Books in Public Relations" states that "it is preferable to find . . . a writer of reputation who will mix truth with interest in proper proportions."

AND A STEAMING RELEASE from the Jonfield Service in New York City announces with pride that that organization has "secured access to the 1946 List of America's 500 Second-Best Writers."

HERE COMES COLONEL R. C. KRAMER, chairman of the Allied Store Corporation, a department-store chain, to tell us, as quoted in the Cooperative News Service, that "never in my business life have I seen business morality so low, so little sold for so much, such disregard for quality and long-range interests, such opportunism, and such an absurd inflation of ego."

NOW LET'S HEAR from two churchmen: "I should want segregation if I were a Negro," says the Reverend Dr. Cyril E. Bentley in a recent issue of Living Church; the Reverend Dr. Walter R. Courtenay, in a bulletin published by the First Presbyterian Church of Nashville, Tennessee, weighs in with this affirmation: "I believe in Private Property, its sanctity and dignity, because I believe God does."

ACCORDING to the Meridian (Mississippi) Star, "Crooner Taylor [Senator Glenn Taylor] speaks for 500,000 Idaho Potatoes," while "Bilbo represents 2,000,000 Mississippi Anglo-Saxons." The Wind is glad this is so, because the 1940 census reveals Mississippi's population to be 2,180,905, of which 1,074,478 were colored.

NOT TO BE OVERLOOKED in the loan-to-Greece crisis is the small news item that the Greek parliament, two weeks ago, approved a bill authorizing the government to allocate $40,000 for the dowry of Princess Catherine.

And Still They Laugh

BY CHARLES LAROM

Jinsen, Korea

THE Stateside newspapers which arrived aboard our broadbeamed LST in the last mail would probably seem amusing, except for the dead children lying in the gutter a few hundred yards from the ship.

The several-months-old papers seem to be unusually food conscious. Spread over one front page is a three-column picture of a line-up for sugar. . . . Two learned writers fuss over the political implications of sending food abroad—one of them sure the food is playing into the hands of the Communists, the other that the totalitarian right is benefiting. . . . The response to President Truman's food-conservation plea is adjudged "mild," the plan condemned as "naturally ineffectual"; Walter Winchell alone gives it a real plug. . . . A columnist on a Boston paper screeches at "Uncle Sap" for sending food abroad when the country is suffering from a "critical shortage" of its own.

Those two kids over in the gutter died of starvation.

Their sucked-in cheeks, washboard chests, and bloated bellies are almost a trademark of the post-war Asiatic area. They are only a step ahead of millions of others who are still trying to scrape together enough food to last another day, another week, or even until the next harvest.

Evidences of mass starvation have been plentiful from French Indo-China, all the way up the line, and the people reaching the coast from farther inland say the situation there is even worse. They agree that UNRRA has helped, but insist it has never had large enough supplies to be more than a token blessing.

In Haiphong I walked the streets early one morning with an American medical sergeant, a member of a military liaison unit, while he made his daily count of bodies before the street cleaners disposed of them. Thirty-seven natives had dropped dead in the main part of the town during the previous night—a new low for the week, according to the Sarge. It was cholera that usually struck the final blow, he explained, but in almost every case the dead man had been so weakened by malnutrition over a long period that it was merely a matter of chance which disease shoved him over the brink.

Northwest of French Indo-China families in crude paddle sailboats fluttered close to our anchored ship, hoping for any sort of handout. In athletic contests got up by the sailors rival boatloads of natives dived into the choppy waters of Henriette Pass for slices of bread. The women of the winning boat were required to express their thanks for each soggy slice by an undressing act, but the rows of their ribs protruded too distinctly for the sight to have the expected allure. (Before the ship left, incidentally, the crew robbed the galley of most of its own evening meal and lowered it over the fantail—probably without contributing to a political victory for either Commies or Fascists.)

In Soochow and Tsientsin listless, scrawny children chanted their plaintive "No momma, no poppa, no chow-chow—Comashaw, Joe?" We never knew whether they had really lost their parents, but their frail malformed bodies offered adequate proof of "no chow-chow."

Sampans of natives, crowding close around the ships in the Hongkong anchorage, vied for a chance to collect the slop-cans of garbage. After sorting the discarded swill into its component parts, they would wash off chunks of food in the sea, carefully ration out enough for a meal, then carry the rest ashore.

The usual mob of skinny urchins surrounded the Sixth Marine Division's officers' club in Tsingtao, but their wail was just a little different from the usual chant. Someone had tipped them off to some additional varieties of suffering; so they expanded their plea into: "No momma; no poppa; no chow-chow; no sea pay; no flight pay—Comashaw, Joe?" Then a smile spread the distance between sunken cheeks, and some of them even laughed.

Your thumb and finger could reach around the calves of their legs. The bodies of many of them were covered with sores. And surely they must have known instinctively that any night it might be their turn to crawl into their rat-hole homes along the dock and get too sick ever to crawl out again. Yet whenever they told their little joke, which they could have only partially understood, they were somehow able to laugh.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The British Budget

THE New York Times, editorializing on the British budget, praises Chancellor of the Exchequer Hugh Dalton and his colleagues for scorning "the radical, escapist budgetary theories that one finds among our own neo-economists and their followers." It continues: "Under a Conservative government or a Labor government a balanced budget is still, to the British, a symbol of financial integrity, and as such a matter of national pride." If the writer of these words had read the excellent report on the budget in the New York Herald Tribune, he would have come across a quotation from the Chancellor's speech, omitted in the Times's own dispatch, which shows that Dr. Dalton is no believer in the shibboleth of a balanced budget.

Summing up the fiscal policies of the Labor government, Dr. Dalton said: "The aim is not, as used to be thought, to balance the budget each year regardless of circumstances. . . . Each year we should consider, in the light of our financial and economic situation, the movement of prices, the level of employment, the relative danger of inflation or deflation, whether it should be a surplus or a deficit. There can be no doubt that on these terms this is a good year for a good surplus."

Dr. Dalton's approach to fiscal planning, in fact, is almost identical with that of American advocates of a "compensatory budget," and the Times could hardly have picked a worse witness for its side. What is more, in the current controversy over the United States budget it is the so-called radical economists who have urged the importance of achieving a surplus to be applied toward debt reduction; it is the conservative elements in Congress and elsewhere who have been calling for tax cuts even if they cause a deficit.

In Britain, as in this country, objective analysis of the total economic situation indicates the need for a revenue surplus. There, although the government has kept basic prices under firm control, many inflationary elements are present. As the recent White Paper pointed out, incomes totaling $28 billion are competing to buy goods and services priced at a total of $24 billion. The first step toward closing this gap must be to end deficit financing through the banks, and this should be one of the results of the new budget. In place of last year's actual deficit of $2,276,000,000, Dr. Dalton has provided for an estimated surplus of $1,080,000,000. It is interesting to note that this transformation has not required cuts in vital social services; it has been achieved by reducing military expenditures nearly 50 per cent.

Members of the British opposition have been quick to claim that the budget is not genuinely balanced. They point to the inclusion in revenue of "windfall" items such as proceeds from the sale of surplus war material. I cannot say how far such criticism is justified until full details of the budget reach me. It seems probable, however, that there are non-recurring expenditures which offset these non-recurring receipts. More questionable, perhaps, is the large total of "below-the-line" items—war-damage payments, excess-profits refunds, repayments of post-war tax credits, and so forth. But again it is not clear from the information at present available to what extent these liabilities are payable from previously accumulated funds. In any case, whatever borrowing may be necessary to meet them should not exceed the amounts that can be derived from genuine personal savings and therefore should not prove inflationary.

In providing for revenue Dr. Dalton has given with one hand and taken away rather more with the other. Revisions in income tax—Mr. Knutsen, please note—are calculated to ease the burden on low incomes while affording but negligible relief in the upper brackets. They include increases in personal exemptions and children's allowances and a restoration of the deduction for earned incomes to the pre-war rate. Apart from the equities involved, the purpose of these changes is to provide an additional incentive to workers who have been discouraged by income-tax deductions from putting in a full week's labor.

Tax increases have been designed as antidotes to various inflationary pressures. A steep rise in the purchase (sales) tax on such goods as heaters and cooking stoves is intended to moderate the rush for electrical equipment which helped to overload the power stations during the winter coal crisis. A new 10 per cent tax on bonus shares and a 100 per cent increase in the stamp duties levied on stock certificates and other financial instruments are expected to curb speculation. An increase in the distributed-profits tax from 5 to 12½ per cent shows that the Chancellor was not fooling last year when he warned corporations to use their increased profits to improve and expand capital equipment. Many of them have ignored this warning and have been paying lavish dividends. Hence this new tax, which is justified by Britain's need to recoup war losses by reinvesting a more than normal proportion of its income.

The most spectacular and controversial item in the British budget is the 50 per cent increase in tobacco duty, which means that popular-brand cigarettes have risen from 47 cents for twenty to 67 cents. This staggering burden on smokers is being imposed to save dollars rather than to raise revenue. As Dr. Dalton explained, current British expenditure on American tobacco is absorbing nearly all the dollars which the country earns by selling goods to Americans. Consequently, should British smokers go on strike, as some of them threaten, nobody would be better pleased than the Chancellor, for while his surplus might be diminished, his anxiety about the rapid exhaustion of the American loan would be somewhat relieved.

The need for economizing dollars is generally understood in Britain, but this increase in the tobacco tax is being attacked in some quarters on the ground that the same objective could have been achieved more fairly by rationing. There is force in this criticism, but the British government probably decided that the mechanics of tobacco rationing were unduly complicated and that the necessity of issuing cards to all adults, whether smokers or non-smokers, would lead to a big black market in coupons.

IN ONE EAR

BY LOU FRANKEL

ONE of the favorite whipping boys of the radio critic has for years been the programs for children. With public attention now focused on juvenile delinquency—its causes, effects, and possible preventives—radio's kid programs are again getting the strap.

Juvenile delinquency stems of course from an unsound home life and numerous other social factors that have thrown a child off his moral balance long before he ever listened to a radio program, but its manifestations are undoubtedly influenced by radio. Most kid programs are blood-and-thunder shockers. In addition to these the youngsters listen to detective dramas, ostensibly designed for adult ears, which can easily leave them with a perverted sense of moral values. Admittedly, one solution would be stricter parental supervision of a child's listening. Another would be for the broadcasters to raise the level of adult programs. But radio is not certain that its audience wants this, and until it is convinced, no change can be anticipated.

However, the continued complaints about children's programs have induced NBC and CBS to get rid of chiller-diller juveniles. Unfortunately American and Mutual have kept them, and NBC and CBS are going in for pulp-drama serials, the so-called soap operas, which are but a short step above the kid shows. As a result children get the dubious excitement of pulp-written violence and teen-agers the just as dubious excitement of pulp-written romance.

The American and Mutual networks together provide nine "violence" serials a day. In plot they vary but slightly. All of them attract listeners with a theme that is straight blood, thunder, and terror. As Variety said recently, "These serials make up a carnival of sluggings, muggings, shootings, murders, and tortures—a veritable paradise for sadists. In each quarter-hour episode the violence mounts from a high-starting plateau to a towering climactic peak where the dialer is left hanging until he's rescued the following day 'in another exciting chapter in the so-and-so at the same time, same station.'"

Just as at a murder trial the defense can produce "experts" to offset the testimony of the prosecution "experts," so in the controversy over these programs both sides produce psychiatric opinion in support of their views. One group says the killer-laden shows of radio give youngsters the same emotional release that the stories of Robert Louis Stevenson and Mark Twain gave their parents. Other experts insist that radio's kid programs are not only far below the level of the children's classics of literature but through their serialized presentation create an unappeased appetite for violence.

What makes these programs all the worse is that American and Mutual air their "violence" serials at the same time and therefore try to outdo each other by piling horror on horror in order to get the audience. Through every program runs the familiar cops-and-robbers theme. When Buck Rogers is fighting pirates in the inter-planetary spaces, Dick Tracy is doing much the same thing on a steamship. One may use scientific mumbo-jumbo, the other a straight blood-and-thunder approach. Hop Harrigan battles enemy agents and espionage in Darkest Africa while Terry and the Pirates are similarly active in China. And so on down the line. All are larded with such juicy nightmare-makers as giant man-eating ants, fixed prize fights, crocodile men, and assorted tortures. Superman, much lauded for preaching tolerance, dispenses some of the most abusive language and worst brutality. Invariably the hero is a run-of-the-mill individual with rough edges, a heart of gold, and plenty of strength and staying power. The villain is sophisticated, educated, and speaks precisely and fluently. How this determines a child's attitudes requires no expert to interpret.

That the networks know how to provide better programs is evident if one listens to Adventure Parade, a sustaining program used by Mutual as bait for its "violence" strips, which are all sponsored. Adventure Parade translates the classics of literature into serials, completing one novel each week. The production uses none of the high-power sound effects of the killer programs but relies on deft narration and performance. Unfortunately Adventure Parade, when it came on just before Buck Rogers, had the lowest rating of any program in either Mutual's or American's skein of juvenile shows. Now that Adventure Parade has taken the Rogers spot, it will be interesting to see how it stands up.

It should be noted that this same rating anemia afflicts Columbia's American School of the Air, a most intelligent educational program heard for a half-hour at 5 p.m., E. S. T.

Another "good" program on CBS is the eminently successful Let's Pretend, which dramatizes fairy tales each Saturday morning. NBC presents a well-done half-hour dramatization of a Frank Merriwell story at 10 a.m. on Saturdays, followed by thirty minutes of Archie Andrews, a teen-age version of the Aldrich Family. Beyond this, there are a number of good programs on local stations, but by and large they are exceptions.

The reason for this condition is no secret. American radio is a highly competitive commercial enterprise. The local stations cannot afford to compete with the networks—again with a few exceptions. And the networks themselves have profit-and-loss statements to consider. As long as the children continue to buy comic books by the million each week, as long as newspapers run comic strips, and as long as the kids prefer this kind of radio show to less exciting programs, these much-criticized juveniles will remain on the air.

One hopes that all four networks will finally do what only two have done thus far. The stronger the listener pressure the sooner they will do it. Meanwhile, remember that it took the movies a long time to drop their "cliff-hanger" serials. When I was a kid, the Fu-Manchu serial was a must at the neighborhood nickelodeon on Saturday afternoons.

BOOKS and the ARTS

SOME NOTES ON D. H. LAWRENCE

BY W. H. AUDEN

THERE is one characteristic of D. H. Lawrence which can never fail to delight the reader, namely, the enormous pleasure he took in writing. Superficially the voice may be strident, hectoring, even, in his deplorable letters (as dreadful as Rilke's), self-pitying, but au fond—what wonderful high spirits! How can the class take their wiggling quite seriously when teacher is having such fun giving it?

THE WOULD-BE young writer of my generation in Europe grew up under the aesthetic shadow of nineteenth-century France. The serious writer was a solitary esprit; writing was an extremely difficult and exhausting sacred task; between the artist's working life and his personal life there could never be anything but antagonism. To encounter a writer who wrote as naturally as he breathed or slept was for us therefore a great liberation. For what the young writer needs is the child's shamelessness and frivolity which is not afraid of making a fool of itself nor asks if its play is important so long as it is having a good time, and we were aesthetically too prudish for our age, so afraid of writing badly or trivially that we were in danger of losing the self-confidence to write at all. Once, of course, the young man has won the battle with his laziness and his fears, and learned to work easily and happily, the questions of the importance and truth of what he writes have to be raised, and their restraining hands should grow stronger as he matures. Lawrence will not be much help to him then, but so long as there are earnest aesthetic young pigs in the world, few can give them the shaking they need better than he.

NEARLY EVERY important writer brings to consciousness some field of human experience of which before his time men were scarcely aware but which henceforth they can never forget; even if the writer himself ceases to be read he has effected a historical change in human sensibilities.

When we try to read a person's character, not from his words, not even from his face, but from the shape and movement of his body, we are doing something which Lawrence taught us to do. If we can no longer watch, say, a tennis match as if it were merely a simple contest of skill and wits but are immediately on the look-out for obscure and violent passions behind the sport, Lawrence is largely responsible for our loss of naivete.

THERE ARE four things which Lawrence does supremely well: writing about non-human nature, writing as a stranger about places and people he sees for the first time, criticizing books, and describing states of irrational hostility between man and man or man and woman.

IN MY OPINION, the poems in "Birds, Beasts, and Flowers" are Lawrence's greatest achievement. To begin with, they are of great technical interest: so far as I know, Lawrence is the only poet on whom Whitman has had a fruitful influence; his free verse is quite new, but without Whitman it could not have been written. Then, whenever he writes about animals or plants, the anger and frustration which too often intrude in his descriptions of human beings vanish, agape takes their place, and the joy of vision is equal to the joy in writing. To Wordsworth the creatures are symbols of great mysterious powers; to the naturalist, examples of a beautiful or interesting species to be observed objectively; Lawrence, on the other hand, loves them neither as numinous symbols nor as aesthetic objects but as neighbors. To a fig tree or a tortoise he gives that passionate personal attention usually offered by lonely or shy people, or by children, invalids, prisoners, and the like; the others are too busy, too accustomed to having their own way. (The forerunner of these poems is Christopher Smart's description of his cat Jeffrey in "Jubilate Agno," which he wrote in an asylum.)

ALL THE travel books—"Twilight in Italy," "Sea and Sardinia," and so on—are excellent. Here again Lawrence has the intensity of the lonely man looking in at a life which is not his and trying to guess what it is really like. In a way he would like to be invited to join in, but in his heart of hearts he knows that would be a fatal disappointment.

LAWRENCE'S literary criticism—"Studies in Classical American Literature," the essay on "Galsworthy," the reviews of novels—are wonderful in a very odd way. The only work I know which resembles them is Nietzsche's "The Case of Wagner." He is often quite dotty, he does not make the faintest pretense at being objective, but he is so passionately interested in the work he is talking about and so little interested in his reputation as a critic that even when he is violently and quite unfairly attacking an author, he makes him sound far more exciting and worth reading than most critics make one sound whom they are professing to praise. I shall never forget my disappointment when, having just finished Lawrence's essay on him, I rushed off to read the novels of Fenimore Cooper.

LIKE BLAKE, Lawrence was interested, not in "individuals," but in "states." In writing about nature or about strangers this does not matter, as these are only experienced as states of being, but it is a serious drawback in writing fiction which cannot avoid the individual and his relations to other individuals over a stretch of time. Lawrence is never at ease when the time is a long one, so that none of his long novels quite succeeds because we get bored with the lack of a character to bind the states together and give them uniqueness. With his Righteous Man and his Righteous Woman he flops utterly. Mellors is as intolerable as Uncle Tom.

LAWRENCE is now neglected as an artist because his kerygma no longer seems good news; yet the situation from which he tried to save us is too little changed and too desperate for us to read him as a classic whose theories, like Dante's views of the relation between pope and emperor, belong to history. A sick patient cannot take a detached view of the bedside manners of a doctor who has failed to cure him.

LAWRENCE is best regarded as a Christian heretic. Like Nietzsche and unlike Goethe, who was simply unchristian, Lawrence was obsessed with Christianity, and it seems as inevitable that his last finished work should have been "The Man Who Died" as that Nietzsche should have ended by signing himself The Crucified. (Goethe thought the Cross in such bad taste.)

HERESIES usually go in pairs. A half-truth which becomes a lie by claiming to express the whole dogma provokes the opposite half-truth to a similar excess. Further, at any particular period it is usually one particular dogma that is most liable to heretical distortion. In the fourth and seventeenth centuries, for example, the main issue was nature and grace—that is, men were concerned with the First Person of the Trinity. The characteristic debate of the twentieth century as of the second is over Christology.

It is not the relation of free will to determinism but of the Word to the flesh, the universal to the individual, the eternal to the historical, which seems to our generation the real problem involving our liberty and happiness.

LAWRENCE'S life and work was a violent crusade against the liberal bourgeois perversion of Christianity according to which:

1. The mind is spiritual. The body is base.
2. White-collar work is respectable. Manual labor is "low."
3. True love between the sexes is the marriage of two minds. The physical relation between their bodies is an unfortunate necessity, a rather ugly greed justifiable only as a means to begetting children.

4. The flesh cannot be redeemed. It can only be kept quiet by repression or indulgence while the mind pursues its salvation.

5. Utopia will be a society in which, thanks to the progress of science, the production of goods has become so ample and so automatic that the flesh has ceased to be a problem. There will be no need of a coercive authority, and every citizen will be able to devote his whole time to contemplation and culture.

In so far as these attitudes claim to be Christian, they imply a Gnostic conception of the Incarnation. The Word was not mere historical flesh but briefly appeared in borrowed flesh to teach men, not how to redeem their flesh and their time, but how to redeem their minds from flesh and time.

In reaction Lawrence preached the opposite:

1. The body is good. The mind is corrupt.
2. Nearly all intellectual and white-collar work is mechanical and sterile. Manual labor when it is really manual and not just machine-minding is free and creative.
3. True love between the sexes is a creation of the Dark God, the physical sympathy of two bodies. Spiritual intimacy is always hostile to this.
4. The instinctive flesh must redeem the corrupt mind.
5. Salvation for society is probably impossible, but if it should come to pass, it will be through the authority of an instinctive genius.

This is the same gnosticism stood on its head. The Word is not made flesh for the true Word is the flesh. Lawrence's Christ is the pre-Adamic hero who rescues Adam and Eve from their bondage in the White Devil of mechanical reason and reflective consciousness.

LAWRENCE is right in attacking the intellectual who forgets that all genuine thinking has its roots in passion, but the cure he suggests, to retreat from desire to passion, is dangerously wrong. It is not accidental that "The Plumed Serpent" should emit such an unpleasant whiff of fascism, for fascism gives the same answer to the same Cartesian errors, only on a mass scale instead of a personal one. Accordingly it makes political passion supreme and dismisses personal feeling as cavalierly as Lawrence did the reverse.

AS AGAINST a mechanical history of the spirit which ignores man as a natural creature and rushes him helplessly, blindly forward, Lawrence is right in reasserting natural time with its recurrent rhythms, but in so far as he makes natural time the only real time his attitude toward human history and social life remains purely negative, and the only people who are in a position to lead, even approximately, the life of which he approves are rentiers or artists or gipsies with passports. For his opponents time is an abstract concept of history in which there is no real present; for Lawrence time is a succession of passionate present moments for which past and future have no meaning.

"SEX ISN'T SIN . . . until the dirty mind pokes in." Exactly. And for that reason it is impossible to preach about purity, for to say "you mustn't think about sex" has the same effect as saying "you may think about anything you like except elephants." By its very nature art is an act of making experience conscious, which means that it cannot and must not try to deal with any experience which is "existential," that is, is falsified by reflection. "Lady Chatterley's Lover" is, unfortunately, as pornographic as "Fanny Hill." It is of necessity as indecent as, at the other end of the psycho-somatic scale, must be all attempts to describe the Beatific Vision.

AS FAR AS one can judge, Lawrence was by temperament monogamous. The average man is not, and on him the effect of reading Lawrence has been, only too often, to send him (or her) off in a search for the perfect sleeping partner who, according to the doctrine, is most likely to be found among "primitive" or working-class types, one, in fact, who is, outside of the bed, an awful bore. By always presenting the "white" spiritual love and the love of the "Dark" God as irreconcilable enemies, Lawrence has encouraged people in fact—though not of course in intention—to divide their lives between "white" relations and "dark." This is to deny the possibility of a happy marriage, for, however difficult to achieve, marriage is by definition a reconciliation of the two.

FOR A COMPLETE life a man requires six kinds of love—for his wife, for his children, for his friends, for his neighbors, for his work, and for God. In our time the secularization of belief, the mechanization of work, the atomization of society, birth control, and so on tend to deprive him of all but the first. If the average man today is obsessed with sex, it is partly because it seems to him the only sphere in which he is a free agent, in which his failures and his triumphs are really his; hence if he fails here, he has achieved nothing with his life. Lawrence was luckier than the majority because he had a second love, his work, but to judge from his books, even two loves are not enough, or, rather, it is too much of a strain on them to carry all the emotion due to the others.

LAWRENCE'S answers do not mean much to us any more; his questions still disturb a good deal. His genuine visions of plants, of animals, of certain passionate states will be treasured even if and when all his questions and ours, being truly answered, have ceased to vex.

TO PRODUCE a one-volume edition of D. H. Lawrence* which will satisfy anyone familiar with his work is—and Mrs. Trilling would be the first to admit this—impossible. If I, for example, would have omitted any selection from the long novels like "Women in Love" in order to include one of the novellae like "The Virgin and the Gypsy" or "St. Mawr," or the introduction to Maurice Magnus's "Memoirs of the Foreign Legion" (to me, the best piece of prose Lawrence ever wrote), if I would have left out the letters and put more poems in, this is only a personal preference for one kind of deficiency to another. Meanwhile several of my favorites—"Two Tickets Please," "Lovely Lady," the description of the mountain crosses on the route from Bavaria to Italy—are here, and any reader who is acquainted with the rich variety of Lawrence's work will know that a selection which manages to include more than one of his favorites is a surprising achievement.

Admirable in conception and execution as the Viking Portables are, their existence and success cast a disquieting reflection on the publishing and reading habits of our age. If an author is of real importance, all his books should be read, the minor works as well as the masterpieces, the failures as well as the successes; and the author of importance is, more often than not, prolific.

Even in the case of a minor writer, say Ronald Firbank, the reader who has a taste for his work would rather read all of it than read one line of some master, say Corneille, who does not appeal to him. But with the increase in the costs and hazards of publishing and the growing reluctance of the public to read anything that is not specifically recommended to them by critics and advertisements, it becomes rarer and rarer to find the complete works of any writer in print. One cannot blame the ordinary publisher for this, but it would be nice if the university presses would take upon themselves the important unprofitable duty of issuing definitive editions of the dead.

The Russian Neuroses

WHY THEY BEHAVE LIKE RUSSIANS. By John Fischer. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

THE three articles on Russia which John Fischer contributed to Harper's Magazine last fall impressed me at the time as a good mixture of colorful reporting and judicious analysis. But expanded into a book his travelogue seems a trifle thin even with the addition of two well-considered chapters on the cause and cure of strained Soviet-American relations. In his guided tour of the Russian labyrinth Mr. Fischer is so intent on shielding his readers from boredom—which he certainly succeeds in doing—that he sometimes hustles them too quickly from one point of interest to another. I could wish, for instance, that he had gone a little more deeply into the growth of a privileged class in Russia and its implications; or that he had expanded the paragraph in which he suggests that many Russian phenomena are the fruits not of communism but of a belated and overaccelerated industrial revolution.

However, this book, though slight, is not, I think, misleading, inaccurate, or "harmful to good relations with the Soviet Union." These are the grounds on which it has been criticized by Marshall MacDuffie, chief of the UNRRA mission with which Mr. Fischer visited the Ukraine last spring. His strictures will be shared by those who resent any writing about Russia which is not well larded with adulatory adjectives. On the other hand, the more extreme Russophobes may feel that the book gives the devil altogether too much of his due. My own view, which I think will be shared by readers who approach the Russian problem rationally rather than emotionally, is that Mr. Fischer has written as objectively as a sincere Western democrat could be expected to do.

He himself says in his preface that his purpose is neither to defend nor to attack the Soviet system but "to estimate how that system is likely to behave under the pressure of a new and unstable balance of power." As he sees it, current Russian policies may be motivated either by genuine fear of attack by the West or by long-range plans for achieving world domination. He leans to the first theory, but since there is no conclusive proof either way, he thinks that America should "adopt a working hypothesis that will cover both possibilities." That would require a program designed to persuade the Kremlin (a) that we are not threatening Russia's security or way of life, (b) that we are determined to block aggressive Soviet expansion.

In his analysis of the Soviet neurosis Mr. Fischer finds two elements. Russians, a long-suffering and much invaded people with a wide-open western frontier, have always been suspicious of foreigners and fearful of attack. These historically and geographically conditioned fears have been inflamed by others originating in Marxist theory. Every good Communist believes that the contradictions of capitalism in America will produce in the not very distant future a violent economic crisis. This will lead in turn to political upheaval and the emergence of American fascism, which will seek to consolidate its power by imperialist adventures.

To cure this phobia, Mr. Fischer suggests, we have to prove that "the Western nations are capable of developing a democratically controlled economy which will neither bog down in periodic depressions nor explode into war." This achievement is equally necessary if the Soviets are really planning to overrun the world. For to defend ourselves against such an onslaught we must maintain the industrial strength which is the basic source of American power. "From a strictly military viewpoint," Mr. Fischer observes, "we cannot afford another depression." Moreover, another prolonged slump here would be catastrophic for our potential allies and would probably cause a collapse of democracy throughout the world. It follows, therefore, that "the measures which are best calculated to cure Russia's fear neurosis and bring her around to eventual cooperation with the West also are the very measures necessary to resist Soviet expansion during the intervening period of tension and uncertainty."

Mr. Fischer's prescription is undoubtedly a sound one, but I am not very hopeful that it will appeal to the political witch-doctors who are now so influential in Washington. As a nation we don't seem to be making much headway in disentangling ourselves from the contradictions of capitalism. For their part, the Russians appear to be deeply enmeshed in the parallel contradictions of communism, as this volume shows. In both worlds internal pressures of the kind that find an eventual outlet in external adventures are accumulating. Thus even the very restrained optimism of Mr. Fischer's conclusion, that within a generation an uneasy truce may be converted into real peace, has an air of wishful thinking.

Dangerous Radical

HANNAH MORE AND HER CIRCLE. By Mary Alden Hopkins. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

IF LYTTON STRACHEY had ever written an "Eminent Georgians," Hannah More would almost certainly have been one of his subjects. She was energetic enough to be entertaining, she complacently exhibited all those traits of her time which now seem quaintly absurd, and she fell short of real greatness by just far enough to avoid shaming the mocker. Miss Hopkins's conscientious and pleasant biography is only at moments Stracheyesque, but it does strike a nice balance between genuine affection for a "good woman" and amused wonder at the limitations which seem so much more obvious to us than they did to her contemporaries.

Like Fanny Burney and Mrs. Thrale—neither of whom, by the way, she seems particularly to have cared for—Hannah More began as a pert young thing who preferred the attentions of older men to those of contemporary beaux and who was capable of amusing the former by playing at being a wit, at least as successfully as a dog walks on its hind legs. David Garrick was her special patron, as Dr. Johnson was that of the other two ladies, and like those ladies, she survived into a generation to which the members of the Club were only a legend. Rather more successfully than the other two, however, she managed to go ahead on her own steam. The bluestocking who had even risen to the height of writing a performed tragedy and having a poem printed at Strawberry Hill became the founder of Sunday Schools and the eager, priggish composer of improving pamphlets for the poor which set the tone of that sort of writing for at least three-quarters of a century.

Mrs. Thrale, though a charitable woman herself, could never forgive Dr. Johnson the fact that he not only pitied the poor but seemed actually to have a sort of fellow-feeling for them and would not consider them a separate race of creatures. This was an error of which Hannah More was never guilty. The older she grew, the more methodistical was her disapproval of the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, including the theater, for which she had once written and of which her best friend had been a great ornament. To some extent Garrick's influence was replaced by that of the Reverend John Newton, the reformed though still terrifying ex-slave-trader who is sometimes credited with having helped scare William Cowper out of his wits. But she never supposed that the lower classes should be given anything not appropriate to their station and merely differed from other respectable people in believing that an ability to read the Bible was not inappropriate. It is true, of course, that she would probably never have got as far as she did get had she been any more advanced than she was—and she was widely regarded as a dangerous radical—but it is not to be supposed that what seems to us her conservatism was by any means merely a matter of tactics. "She acquiesced," Miss Hopkins says, "in the prevailing middle- and upper-class view that rigid social distinction was God's own benevolent plan and that it was therefore wrong for the poor to try to raise themselves to higher economic or social levels by means of workers' unions or by efforts to change laws which bore harshly upon them."

At her first Sunday Schools children were taught to read the Bible, and only the most gifted learned to write. But they were also given annual presents of clothes, provided with a gingerbread treat every six or eight weeks, and in deference to the prevailing parental opinion that children should not be expected to go through the labor of learning without being paid, given a penny for each four successive Sundays of attendance. She bore patiently with the fact that the poor were not always as grateful as they should have been, and even if it is true, as Miss Hopkins says, that her writings betray the widespread anxiety that the laboring class might get out of hand and that it was part of her plan to make laborers "physically comfortable by showing them how to utilize what they had, and submissive by teaching them that joy in heaven was recompense for deprivation on earth," there is no reason for supposing that there was anything sly or consciously hypocritical in her plans. A woman who could comment admiringly on the fact that at Mr. Garrick's table she had never met a member of his own profession was not one to whom all ironies were patent.

If Miss Hopkins's book has a serious fault, it is that the author is in some ways almost too modest. She can on occasion turn a very neat phrase, and it seems a pity that she is less anxious to cultivate this talent than to aim at a sometimes academic sobriety. In any event, however, the selected facts are here on the basis of which opposing theorists can draw their own conclusions. There is no doubt that Miss More did much to "improve the condition of the poor," and if, to the radical, she will seem typical of those liberals whose humanitarianism is merely a desire to protect their own privileges, the more detached observer will remark that, as is so often the case, her reforms went a good deal farther than she ever intended. "Though the leaders designed the instruction to teach the working class to be obedient to their betters, it is not clear that this was the result. Children who could read the Bible could later read Tom Paine and Wilkes, and many did." Indeed, your real conservative may reach the conclusion that conservatives have been right all along and that Hannah's Sunday Schools should have been nipped in the bud. Maybe the Bolshevik menace really began when farm children were taught to read the Scriptures. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

France's Dark Night

THE REPUBLIC OF SILENCE. Compiled and Edited by A. J. Liebling. Translated by Ramon Guthrie. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

THREE SHORT NOVELS. By Vercors. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

MOVED by a strong sentimental attachment for France and an intense dislike—for the old French textbooks drawn from Alphonse Daudet's stories, A. J. Liebling came back from the war to make a living text based on recent French history. He had the help of Eugene J. Sheffer of Columbia, and the lively book they produced, full of extracts from French underground publications, has already had a deservedly successful career in high schools and colleges. Now the book appears in a trade edition with the French passages by Vercors, Pozner, Decour, Kessel, and so on translated by a Dartmouth professor as no college student could do. What this will do for the class edition can only be guessed.

The best writings to have come out of France's dark night are already widely known, but we are grateful to Mr. Liebling for preserving often signed bits from the resistance press that record the heroic day-to-day struggle of the unions, the peasants, and the professions against the heartless, stupid invader. The whole story is here, from the fall of France to the liberation, with its hostages, executions, reprisals, tortures, and mass atrocities. Intended as an appendix to history rather than a literary anthology, this book constitutes excellent reporting. In Africa, in London, in Normandy A. J. Liebling had his eyes open for the significant page in a mimeographed or badly printed clandestine newsheet as well as for the telling incident and picturesque detail. The latter he has incorporated into his own running commentary, written in the style now so familiar in the pages of the New Yorker, bristling with irreverence and irrelevance, always colorful and memorable.

A NEW GENERATION OPENS ITS HEART TO YOU IN THIS NOVEL OF LOVE AND SELF-DISCOVERY

In the crisp, sometimes shocking language of youth, Leslie Waller tells the story of a love that found itself. It's a romance as modern as the hope for one world, with a conflict as ancient as hate...

Wally met Fran in the midwestern town near his army camp. But their love had tough going in its noise and cheapness and dirt. It was the sort of town that did something to the kids who crowded the streets and bars, something that made them and unhappy. But for Fran and Wally it became something else—for him, a testing ground for new-found beliefs, for her, a mirror revealing the emptiness of her life.

How they found their way, together, out of its shabby hopelessness is a story as straightforward as soldiers' slang, and as tender and moving as a letter to the girl back home. It's a big story and a young story, filled with the priceless hope of a generation that refuses to be lost.

Such a record ought to shake our complacency. When it comes to literature, however, only a few of the names cited by Mr. Liebling deserve to survive. High among those stands that of Vercors, the name of the high plateau above Grenoble which the artist Jean Bruller prophetically borrowed long before it became synonymous with one of the bravest maquis and one of the most desperate battles of the war. By now everyone knows the story of how Vercors, who had not before written for publication, was moved by indignation to compose a subtle masterpiece entitled "The Silence of the Sea" and then to found a clandestine publishing house to print it in late 1942. It was this little tale, variously attributed under its pseudonym to all the great writers of France, that launched the clandestine literature that was to flow from several secret presses—but chiefly from Vercors's Midnight Editions—until we entered Paris. But many Americans do not yet know that Vercors has preserved his new identity and gone on writing.

Probably no other French writer was more deeply marked than Vercors by the occupation years which revealed him to himself. All his writings to date are concerned with the psychology of the underground worker and the political prisoner. Like most of the existentialist writers, he is tormented by problems of liberty, responsibility, and commitment. But there the resemblance ends, for Vercors has a more vivid sense of character and dramatization than they.

The heartbreaking tales contained in his "Three Short Novels"—at least one of which originally appeared in clandestinity as he and his friends would say—are typical. The first one, "Guiding Star," is the now famous "Marche à l'étoile," in which the star, symbolic of the faith and hope that draws a Moravian Jew across Europe to the land of liberty, is eventually sewed on Thomas Muritz's sleeve in yellow before his arrest as a hostage. It is characteristic of Vercors that the murder of that man's faith strikes us as more horrible than his actual execution. Similarly in the second tale—which has recently been reissued in France with the addition of a few sentences to attenuate the final despair and a new title that would translate as "The Weapons of Night"— the real horror lies less in any single act than in the systematic slaughter of a man's soul in a concentration camp. For cumulative effect it might have been preferable to publish this tale last, after "The Verdun Press," whose impact is somewhat less intense. But in each of these three gems of narration the simple, direct language coupled with the subtle technique and the sustained suspense reminds one of Maupassant at his best.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Hindus on the Czechs

THE BRIGHT PASSAGE. By Maurice Hindus. Doubleday and Company. $3.

IN THE days of Czechoslovakia's greatest debasement, during and after the Munich crisis, Maurice Hindus was my hotel neighbor in Prague. No one in the United States understands the Slav soul as Hindus does, and in those fateful days his emotional but absolutely honest spirit suffered with and for the Czechs. Since then he has spent nine years in conscientious search and research into the Czech problem. The results are set forth in "The Bright Passage," which contains an answer to the question why Communist-ruled Czechoslovakia has taken a course different from that of Communist Russia.

"Czechoslovakia is both paradox and hope," writes Hindus. "It is paradox because history . . . conspired to make [it the] supreme testing ground for the massive struggle of ideas which has long been moving mankind. It is hope because its people may meet the test. If they do, they will achieve reconciliation between the Western ideas of individual liberty and the newer ideas of collective effort and individual security which Russia has been championing."

But Hindus adds a sober qualification: "Not that the Czechs are actuated by a messianic complex and are spilling over with fervor to rescue mankind from the dilemmas in which it is enmeshed. They are too prosaic and too hard-boiled a people to cherish any illusions of grandeur or to imagine themselves savior of anybody but themselves."

Throughout the book Hindus, with his tremendous knowledge of the Slavs and his feeling for them, shows clearly the difference between Russians and Czechs. "In appraising the meaning and scope of the Czech revolution," he writes, "it is well to emphasize the differences in the history, in the culture, in the temperament of the Russian and Czech peasantry." And certainly he is at his best when he is describing the Czech or the Slovak village. Maurice Hindus is himself a child of the soil. His picture of the Czech peasant in "The Bright Passage" is as authentic as his picture of the Russian peasant in "Humanity Uprooted." "To ignore the differences [between Russian and Czech peasants] would falsify the event, especially in these turbulent times when the very word revolution conjures forth in so many a reader the picture of all the worst that has happened in Russia since the advent of Sovietism, and impels him to associate with it any and all revolutionary situations in other countries."

The book contains a store of information about post-war Czechoslovakia. There is an interesting, though somewhat confused, chapter about the important Bata shoe works in Zlin, once the counterpart in Europe of a Ford enterprise, today a nationalized factory; a vivid thumbnail sketch of the Gestapo monster who freely described Nazi cruelties; a picture of a village priest who participated in the underground and in whose rooms the many pictures of the Madonna and the saints share a place with photographs of Masaryk, Benes—and Stalin.

Hindus takes us to a remote Moravian village to acquaint us with Czechoslovakia's great recluse poet, Peter Zezruc; another excellent passage describes Jaromir Vejvoda, composer of the famous war-time song, "Roll Out the Barrel." Powerful, and typical of Hindus, is the description of the ancient city of Tabor, from which the Hussite leaders began their crusade.

More the poet than the journalist, Hindus is less successful when he tries to analyze the roots of the present revolution in Europe and Czechoslovakia or to explain the new economic order. He quotes copiously from the speeches and writings of Czech Communist leaders without seeming to realize that Communist words and action are not always congruous. His zeal sometimes carries him too far, but his book catches the Czech atmosphere very well, and it is rich in enlightening anecdotes. The writing is as genuine as the Czech soil itself. The book is to be recommended to all who desire to understand Czechoslovakia, its precarious position between East and West, its people, and its new republic.

Abstraction and Actuality

THE SELECTED WRITINGS OF JOHN AND JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. Edited and with an Introduction by Adrienne Koch and William Peden. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.50.

CAPITALISM, SOCIALISM, AND DEMOCRACY. By Joseph A. Schumpeter. (Second edition.) Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

ONE reason that "liberalism" carries decreasing conviction is that it has moved too far away from any foundation in actuality. The "liberal" analysis today is predominantly wishful, sentimental, rhetorical. Communism and fascism are serious in the sense that they correspond to basic human needs and tensions; but the gap has widened steadily between the sentimental abstractions of liberalism and the savage complexities of life. The facts included in any current liberal theory are usually so carefully selected that the concrete situation, which very likely turns on a set of facts rejected by the canon, may well fly off in the opposite direction. Nor has the liberal addition to wishful formulas been much impaired by the regular collapse of these formulas before the importunities of history.

The susceptibility to wishfulness comes basically, no doubt, from the view of man as a creature of reason and benevolence whose shortcomings will be redeemed by the inevitabilities of progress. There is, however, a contributing cause for liberal sentimentality and one especially important in the United States: that is, it is the reflex of the sentimentality of conservatism. As an expression of protest, liberalism can hardly escape the imprint of the philosophy it attacks. Where that philosophy is intelligent, vigorous, and detailed, the reaction against it is likely to be intelligent, vigorous, and detailed too. But American conservatism has been an intellectual failure. In failing, it has dragged American liberalism down with it.

The admirable volume of "The Selected Writings of John and John Quincy Adams," edited by Adrienne Koch and William Peden, is a sharp reminder that conservatism in this country had honest and sturdy beginnings. The Federalists were men of intellectual force and candor. Their ideas were founded solidly on a realistic picture of social conflicts, and they did not shrink from following out the implications of these ideas. Alexander Hamilton, Fisher Ames, John Adams had a sinewy and robust political philosophy, whose abstractions corresponded to actuality a good deal more than they falsified it.

The serious opponents of Federalism were compelled to meet Federalist standards of intelligence and honesty. John Adams's shrewd and testy "Defense of the Constitutions . . . of the United States" thus provoked John Taylor of Caroline's brilliant reply in his "Inquiry into the Principles and Policy of the Government of the United States," which in turn provoked Adams's series of letters to Taylor. Political controversy has never been at a higher level in this country. One shudders to think what Jefferson's writing would have been like if the unrelenting realism of the Hamiltonians had not constrained him from indulging his vast weakness for rhetoric and sentimentality. He would have been indistinguishable from Henry Wallace.

The Koch-Peden introduction sets forth with ability and sympathy the elder Adams's staunch conservatism and the far-ranging and courageous vision of the son. The pity is that this original tough-mindedness soon confronted American conservatives with a dilemma that resulted in intellectual disaster. If they accepted a class theory of society, they had to accept the possibility that this theory might have radical as well as conservative implications. The triumph of other classes during Jackson's Presidency thus terrified them into dropping the whole theory of class conflict. From that period arose the miscellany of conciliatory slogans under which the American business community has ever since concealed its ideas—or, rather, its confusion—about the nature of American politics.

It probably does credit to American liberals that they have not fallen so low as their opponents. It is easier to forgive Wallace, for example, when you realize that his main antagonist is not Hamilton but someone like Herbert Hoover or John Foster Dulles. In recent years, indeed, the intellectual stocks of the business community have been so watered that American conservatives have depended increasingly on imported talent, like Hayek and von Mises, to write their vindications.

Professor Schumpeter's "Capitalism, Socialism, and Democracy" will not, alas, restore wisdom on the right. Because it is the work of a complicated mind operating on a wide range of facts it fits into no obvious political category; and because it fits into no obvious-political category, it has not stimulated the National Association of Manufacturers into distributing fifty thousand copies. It burst into the generally sterile atmosphere of political discussion like a collection of firecrackers and sky-rockets. Liberals and conservatives alike can benefit by watching the display.

Schumpeter may be described briefly as a reactionary without illusions. He has no use for folklore—of liberalism or even of capitalism. "It is quite clear," he will write, "that perfect competition has at no time been more of a reality than it is at present," which is to say very little of a reality at all; and his whole theory of capitalist development—as a process of continual change, fueled by the introduction of new goods, new methods of production, new forms of industrial organization—is a world away from the static conceptions of the official apologists, like Hazlitt or Hayek, or of the official foes. "The problem that is usually being visualized," he says, "is how capitalism administers existing structures, whereas the relevant problem is how it creates and destroys them."

Is capitalism on its way out? Schumpeter thinks it is. Not because of its failure, he writes, but because of the immensity of its success. Readers should not be distracted from his subtle analysis of the problem of capitalist survival by his weakness for paradox, by his lively internecine warfare with the Keynesians, or by his hatred of leftist rhetoric. The very success of capitalism, he argues, undermines the social institutions which protect it and creates conditions which block its working and in which it will finally not be able to live.

The great corporation, for example, socializes the bourgeois mind. It destroys the vitality in the idea of property; "the holder of the title loses the will to fight, economically, physically, politically, for 'his' factory and his control over it, to die if necessary on its steps." Soon there will be nobody left who will fight for property—"nobody within and nobody without the precincts of the big concerns." In the meantime, by virtue of the logic of its values, capitalism "creates, educates, and subsidizes a vested interest in social unrest." Capitalism thus relentlessly narrows the scope of capitalist motivation: "it will eventually kill the roots." The middle class folds up under direct attack. "The only explanation for the meekness we observe is that the bourgeois order no longer makes any sense to the bourgeoisie itself." In the end, capitalism itself tends to fulfil the technological, organizational, commercial, administrative, and psychological prerequisites of socialism.

What will replace capitalism? Like Marx, Schumpeter regards socialism as the natural heir. "Socialization," he writes, "means a stride beyond big business on the way that has been chalked out by it." Quite apart from the superiority of the Socialist blueprint, which he demonstrates by acute technical analysis, Schumpeter sees no insuperable obstacles to socialism in practice. Socialist management, he thinks, may conceivably prove as superior to big-business capitalism as big-business capitalism has been to competitive capitalism.

Will socialism be democratic? This discussion is less satisfactory, possibly because Schumpeter does not much care about democracy. He seems to feel that the electoral system may well endure as the most convenient way for dealing with the agenda that the Socialist order reserves for political decision. But he is more concerned with the need for restoring social discipline than with the need for expanding individual liberty. Indeed, one of the main conditions compelling the advance of socialism, he feels, is that it is the only way to discipline the workers and the intellectuals—groups which gained a dangerous amount of freedom under capitalism. He accordingly concludes that "there is little reason to believe that this socialism will mean the advent of the civilization of which orthodox Socialists dream. It is much more likely to present fascist features." (He does not, however, equate socialism and fascism.)

In addition to the general discussion the book contains a provocative account of Karl Marx and Marxism and a somewhat capricious historical sketch of Socialist parties. This second edition has a new chapter on the consequences of the Second World War.

Liberals should expose themselves to this important book for a number of reasons. "Capitalism, Socialism, and Democracy" is the performance of an intellectual virtuoso, brilliant, complex, perfectly controlled. Schumpeter has an architectonic sense of the flow and structure of an argument, of the panorama of logical possibilities and logical exclusions. His methodological sophistication is not the jargon-chopping of the sociologist; it goes to the heart of serious issues. Moreover, his arguments constitute a serious intellectual challenge. No one is likely to parrot again, for example, the Kilgore committee type of simplicities about cartels after studying Schumpeter on monopoly. Schumpeter is certainly not right either; but there is no percentage in dodging the uncomfortable points he raises. The intellectual rigor of his analysis sets a standard that liberal writers should try to meet.

Absence of intellectual rigor, fear of uncomfortable points have made liberals vulnerable too often in the past. In Military Intelligence the penalty for substituting wishfulness for objectivity is drastic and final. It is just as important in politics as in war to know your enemy—that is, to regard analysis as the dispassionate evaluation of enemy resources and capabilities and not the projection of your own hopes or anxieties. ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

The Wallace Family

THE WALLACES OF IOWA. By Russell Lord. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

RUSSELL LORD'S book on the Wallace family is also a rich narrative of American agriculture over the last seventy years, a fascinating account of an era in which American farmers have struggled to make their adjustment to a swiftly growing industrialism. This is perhaps its most important contribution. It is a big book, smoothly and ably written, crowded with story and anecdote, and peopled with the men and women who have made modern American farm life: Tama Jim Wilson, David Fairchild, P. G. Holden, Gifford Pinchot, George Washington Carver, as well as those who made their impress during the New Deal.

The Middle West is the heart of American farming, and the Wallaces have had an important part in the shaping of modern agriculture. As Gifford Pinchot said, "The Wallace family is an institution." Closely knit, with strong family loyalties and principles, it has stood for agrarian reform, education, adjustment to the machine age, and scientific inquiry. As farmers, as journalists, especially through their own paper, Wallaces' Farmer, and as Secretaries of Agriculture, they have wielded a remarkable influence.

Thus the book is both a history and a biography in plan and intent. The assignment was a difficult one, but the author has carried it off with very real success. The Wallaces are interesting, controversial, and at times perplexing people, and the agricultural era in which they have lived has needed sorely this vivid personalized treatment.

The story begins with the first Henry Wallace. In some ways the portrait of "Uncle Henry," as he was called by everyone, and the account of his years, which stretched from the bitter days of farm depression during the Populist movement to the golden era of agricultural prosperity just after 1900, is the most successful part of the book. Uncle Henry was apparently a lovable character, with an Irish heart and a Scotch conscience. Also Uncle Henry was a vocal Wallace, and the author contends that this characteristic appears in alternating generations. In the Iowa Homestead and later in Wallaces' Farmer he fought for fairer railroad rates, contended against the monopolies in barbed wire and farm implements, and voiced the progressive agrarian spirit of his day.

The pattern of progressivism set by Uncle Henry was followed by both his son and his grandson. But Henry C. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture under Harding, after a successful career as a teacher at Ames and as business manager of Wallaces' Farmer, found the decade of the 1920's tough going for his agrarian views and political philosophy. As farmers and farm journalists the Wallaces, though otherwise good Republicans, had always questioned a rising tariff, but Harry Wallace went to Washington in an era of unprecedented farm depression—and the Hawley-Smoot tariff. The odds were definitely against him and against American farmers, and his story ends on a tragic note. He died in office in 1924.

A full half of "The Wallaces of Iowa" is devoted to Henry A. Wallace and the complex agricultural problems of the thirties. Since this section deals with more recent history, objectivity was less easy to achieve, but Mr. Lord has analyzed with care and detail and relative objectivity the whole New Deal approach to the farm problem and the part played by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The book makes it clear, among other things, that the last decade marked a new and perhaps more enlightened approach to the modern agricultural problem in America, and Mr. Lord has done a service in illuminating further the farm situation of our period. He has not told the whole story by any means, but his account tends to balance a too great concentration upon urban-industrial problems by portraying some of our deep-rooted rural and agricultural values.

P. ALSTON WARING

The author of Moscow War Diary and Leningrad writes an eye-witness chronicle of the months that transformed the U.S.S.R. into a great world power.

THE YEAR OF STALIN-GRAD

by Alexander Werth

The Year of Stalingrad begins with the hour-by-hour chronicle of an embattled convoy on the Murmansk run—the convoy in which Mr. Werth travelled in May, 1942. The narrative covers the German summer offensive, the narrowing fight for Stalingrad and the Volga crossings, the secret preparation and launching of the great twin counter-offensives, and the final liquidation of Von Paulus's 330,000.

The description of the campaign in its broader outlines has the graphic quality of a map in motion. Yet the broader outlines never obscure the human details—achievements of platoon and individual soldier, endurance of horrors by overrun village and single family, the special craft of guerrilla warfare—the flavor of life that only anecdote can convey. Thus the book is more than a contemporary journal, more than a history of a decisive military campaign. It is a fascinating panorama of one of the dramatic crises of modern history.

The Aftermath

THE NUERNBERG CASE. By Robert H. Jackson. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

FINAL JUDGMENT. By Victor Bernstein. Boni and Gaer. $3.50.

DE FENSE by counsel is part of a fair trial. The judgment, however, should not rest on anything but its own motivation. Therefore the defense of the Nürnberg trial by the President of the United States and a former Secretary of War confirmed rather than disproved the criticism of its legal foundations. This criticism, we are told by a distinguished attorney, "threw around a mass of legalisms, usually in Latin." The critic of the critics appears to be unaware that all law in Western civilization originates from Graeco-Roman "legalism" and fails to note that criticism of the Nürnberg procedure took exception to its disregard of such principles, for example, as that "nullum crimen sine lege praevia" (there is no crime without an antecedent law) and that individual guilt is the premise of criminal responsibility.

These principles have been established slowly and with difficulty over a long period of time. They have become, through the efforts of Abbé Beccaria, Voltaire, Montesquieu, Bentham, and others, the common property of the civilized sections of mankind. Their preservation is much more important than the punishment of the Nürnberg defendants.

"An honestly defensive war," we are told by Justice Jackson, "is of course legal and saves those lawfully conducting it from criminality." A precedent having been set—so the Nürnberg apologists believe—what might we expect in another war with the tables turned? The victor will certainly call the war "honestly defensive," but what kind of law and justice is it of which the existence depends on who wins a war?

Neither the "highly respected systems of jurisprudence" in Ethiopia, Haiti, Honduras, and elsewhere nor the strenuous efforts of Justice Jackson, who apparently knows Ethiopian law better than I do, suffice to meet the basic objections to what has been called the Nürnberg novelty. This book, the third to be published in defense of the trial, contains, in addition to the opening and closing statements by the United States prosecutor, some interesting excerpts from the cross-examination of Göring, Schacht, Speer, and Milch. Once more the objection to ex post facto law is rebutted by reference to the Briand-Kellogg Pact, the Geneva Protocol, the Pan-American Conference, and similar manifestations of wishful thinking. It is possible to hold individuals responsible for crimes violating the rules of international law, but nothing justifies the assumption that the individual should enjoy less protection than he does when he is prosecuted for a crime under national law.

By reference to American, English, French, and even German law on conspiracy the author attempts to establish the responsibility of the Gestapo, the S. S., and other Nazi organizations. The law on conspiracy, we are told, is "well settled and fairly uniform in all systems of law." However, the very gist of the crime of conspiracy "is liability for acts . . . abetted." This analysis somehow overlooks an essential element of crime, the consciousness of guilt, the mens rea—pardon me for the Latin tag. Non-active members of a conspiracy are guilty only if they know what crimes their membership is going to facilitate. No matter what atrocious bestialities some members of these Nazi organizations committed, who would dare to assume that the many hundred thousands who joined the S. S. were not only conscious of a common plan to employ "illegal methods" or to accomplish "illegal ends" but were aware of crimes which their fellow-members committed. A society cannot commit a crime.

Our ethical ideas are diametrically opposed to Nazism, but for that very reason we must insist on the concept of guilt, which is a link connecting law with justice and morality. Starting from indiscriminate tribal revenge it took thousands of years for mankind to recognize that without consciousness of individual guilt, punishment makes no sense. Unlike "the law of the Medes and Persians which altereth not," our law does alter, but nothing can justify its relapse into its primitive stage.

Whether the relapse has indeed set a precedent is doubtful. At least the rather personalized "fundamental information" about the Nürnberg trials has by no means disproved the case against the juridical fallacies of the Nürnberg novelty.

Victor Bernstein wisely refrains from either attacking or defending the legality of the trial. Instead, he gives us a brilliantly written historical account of the Nazi revolution and its consequences. We may occasionally disagree—for example, with the assumption that the revolution of 1918 aborted in the Weimar Republic instead of a German Soviet because the Allies never gave it a chance. But the sequence of events from the invasion of Germany by the "Brown Locusts" until the "Final Judgment" is pictured accurately and convincingly.

The Nazi war, the Todesraum, the "twentieth-century Calvary," the brutal plundering which overshadows the exploits of Genghis Khan—all of this as it is set forth in Mr. Bernstein's compendious and fascinating narrative impresses us as the most gigantic of crimes, but though history may be metaphorically called a crime, under the impact of enormity the legal concept of crime bursts. Now that the Nürnberg criminals have been executed or jailed, we may ask, "So what?" Not only did the trial not make the punishment fit the crime because it could not, but the short newspaper reports made little impress on the American and still less on the German public. The most important political case in history, cloaked as it was in the garb of the law, failed to stand forth in its outrageous enormity. Bernstein's story masterfully makes up for this omission, and it should be read not only by every American, as Mr. Shirer suggests, but by every civilized human being who has not entirely lost his faith in the future of mankind.

Dostoevsky's Huckleberry Finn

A RAW YOUTH. By Fyodor Dostoevsky. Introduction by Alfred Kazin. The Dial Press. $3.50.

FYODOR DOSTOEVSKY. By J. A. T. Lloyd. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

NOW that the vérités secrètes—André Gide's term—that were this man's most marvelous province are the only ones that will save us, and we are as befuddled about the Russians as about ourselves, and have begun to be acquainted with the idea of despair, Dostoevsky is a necessity. This was not generally true before in this country; we were perhaps not as soulless and sinless and uninteresting as Dostoevsky himself thought, but whatever the reasons, and they are various, it is a fact that there has been no major American criticism concerning him, and no leading novelist here has expressed any debt or tribute to him to put beside the studies of Gide, Thomas Mann, or Hermann Hesse. Dreiser may have been closer to him than Henry James, which only illustrates the point. But now, without entering into the perennial argument on his stature versus Tolstoy's, I believe that of all novelists Dostoevsky is the one we can least afford to do without, if only because no one else has ever made so large and genial a use of the ultimate, nightmare vocabulary that is beginning to mark our speech. It is therefore a matter of gratitude that the serious gaps both in translations of his work and in information about him easily available in English are finally being filled. One is glad to read even so unassuming a biography as this English one by J. A. T. Lloyd, which has value chiefly as a convenient reference book, and even more so, in spite of the introduction and the ugly job of printing, for the reappearance of the Constance Garnett translation of "The Raw Youth."

This novel, drawn even more than "The Brothers Karamazov," which followed it, from Dostoevsky's notes for the Life of a Great Sinner, has always been the least known of his longer works, and with cause. Its basic story is of the illegitimate youth Arkady, whose grim pursuit of an idée fixe, to become a Rothschild, is interrupted by his passionate and ambivalent search for, actually his need to define, his father Versilov—a theme of fine possibilities, some of which are fully realized; but unfortunately this central tension is not up to the elaborate and sometimes hectic dissipations of the plot. A few of the characters, including Katerina Ahmakov, the object of both Arkady's and his father's passion, remain sketchy, even a trifle schematic, which is the rarest of faults in Dostoevsky; the detective approach to some important elements of the story detracts from their force and clarity; and toward the end even the theme of the split personality, the "double," which better than anything else illustrates the nature of this artist's thought and which he used so powerfully elsewhere, becomes monotonous and in one scene, that of the breaking of the ikon, rather stagy. This is not the "formlessness" that is so often attributed to Dostoevsky. Mr. Lloyd is to be commended, I think, for refuting that facile charge, referring to the novelist's mode as rather "lucidity in confusion"; certainly no master of form ever worked a mass of contradictory material into a more perfectly balanced piece of writing than "The Eternal Husband." But this book does tend to pull the reader in too many directions, and it also hovers too much around the fascinating and yet strangely insufficient character of Versilov, who while seeming always a claimant for a place in the boldest reaches of Dostoevsky's thought, never quite arrives there and is finally resolved, like a poor relation of Stavrogin, in a scene of strained and unconvincing melodrama.

Mr. Kazin in his introduction to the book takes the opposite view of this point, maintaining that the true "hero" of the novel is not the youth but the father, Versilov, whom he calls "one of the subtlest creations in all Dostoevsky's works," and finds effective precisely because he is "out of life," that is, because his violently torn personality does not lead him into the violent illegalities that characterize the novelist's other great heroes. Aside from overlooking the fact that Versilov does attempt to commit murder, I believe that this argument misses Dostoevsky's essential meanings as shown in Arkady, in whom the typical themes of humiliation, the search for suffering, and even the ambivalence of all thought and feeling are so much more cruelly portrayed. Mr. Kazin's point, however, is at least more tenable than the rest of his oddly smug, shallow, and generally misleading piece of criticism, which is worth mentioning only because its clumsy sociological touch may perhaps be damaging a little-known book of serious value. The "double" in Dostoevsky, Mr. Kazin tells us, is "a degenerating citizen . . . who has been split on the anvil of materialism in the nineteenth century"—which leads one to some interesting reflections on Hamlet; and in connection with Versilov he remarks that "in his uprootedness Dostoevsky has shown again the great positive [sic] side of his philosophy: his vision of men in the modern world lying like broken instruments on the ground." And so on.

That Dostoevsky's characters are rarely "broken" is of course due in part to the extraordinary buoyancy, or toughness as Mr. Lloyd rightly calls it, that he injected into them, drawing as much from himself in this as in the great intellectual adventures that he projected. It has to do also with the "positive side of his philosophy," beautifully exemplified in this book by Arkady's legal father, the peasant pilgrim Makar Ivanovich, from whom comes redemption for those who have wronged him, and who in his role of second father gives its true pattern and perspective to the father-and-son theme, of which Mr. Kazin has grasped only the most obvious, one should perhaps say the most Western, aspect. But there is another element that relates perhaps still more essentially to that great quality of survival that one finds everywhere in Dostoevsky, and to the greatness, for all its faults, of "The Raw Youth." That is what Gide, speaking of the novelist's almost miraculous probing of human inconsistency, called the "integral complexity" of his thought. No passion is exclusive, no character is simply what he appears, no thought—and there are passages of extreme political pertinence—fails to suggest its opposite; even a lie is not what the Anglo-Saxon mind thinks it should be. "My dear boy," Versilov says, "we must always let a man lie a little. It's quite innocent. Indeed, we may let him lie a great deal. In the first place, it will show our delicacy, and secondly, people will let us lie in return . . . two immense advantages at once. Que diable! One must love one's neighbor. But it's time for me to be off."

And yet Arkady, in whom all the contradictions rage, and who in his pride and humiliations stems directly from the horrors of "Notes from Underground," is also capable of the most infectious outbursts of joy and trust, and it is he who gives these farthest limits of truth-telling an appeal that is unique among Dostoevsky's works. The author's great comic gift is less in evidence here than in some of his other writings, but Arkady nevertheless, one finds oneself thinking half soberly, is Dostoevsky's Huckleberry Finn.

ELEANOR CLARK

ACCORDING to his most recent biographer, Lewis Carroll was once thrown into a dither by a request for permission to present a dramatization of "Alice in Wonderland" at a church benefit. On the one hand, he had a guilty love for the theater; on the other hand, he was quite sure that official religion should not sponsor so dubious a diversion; and on the third hand—there are probably three in Wonderland—he certainly did not want to prevent a worthy cause from raising money. The dilemma was finally solved by his giving his permission on the condition that the public should not be informed that he had given it.

The incident suggests that neurotic welter of conflict and prudery out of which "Alice" grew and also the fact that few of literature's many neurotics ever succeed so well as Lewis Carroll did in making neuroticism generate a fantasy almost continuously gay, only slightly and fleetingly touched by any suggestion of terror or distress. It provides, moreover, occasion to remark that one of the minor incidents in that reward to which we hope he has gone must be the contemplation of the dramatization of his two masterpieces which the American Repertory Theater is sponsoring at the International. His permission was not asked, but it is hard to imagine that he could do other than approve, for it is equally hard to imagine how the thing could be better done. The version is astonishingly faithful to text and spirit; Bambi Linn—she who danced in "Oklahoma" and "Carousel"—is a little girl both sprightly enough and innocent enough to satisfy even the bachelor author whose connoisseurship in the matter of little girls makes the noses of Freudians quiver whenever they think of it; and all the other members of the very large cast seem nearly perfect.

The version is said to be the same as that presented some years ago at the Civic Repertory Theater, but unless memory deceives me the present production is considerably more elaborate, and sparkling—it must, to put baldly, have cost a good deal more, and the money was well spent. The are delightfully fanciful back drop some very amusing musical accompaniments, and an amazing variety of devices. Thus, for example, the little pig into which the bawling baby finally turns is a real little pig, while the Cheshire cat who appears and disappears is merely painted on a drop illuminate from behind. Eva Le Gallienne—wh by the way, has never been better—plays the White Queen in nothing more than an elaborate make-up, which matches that of Margaret Webster as the Red Queen. But the Ugly Duchess, on the other hand, gets a marvelous effect by the use of mountains of putty; the Dodo, Humpty Dumpty, and others are presented by means of delightful constructions credited to Remo Bufano while the whole Walrus and Carpenter episode is stunningly interpreted by life-sized puppets. The result is a wonderful variety, and it prevents any hint of the monotony which the persistent use of any one device would have been sure to produce; at the same time some unity of effect is nevertheless achieved. In general the method is, of course, that of make-believe rather than illusion, and it is interesting to imagine how different the movie version once planned by Walt Disney would have been, since the movies can and do produce illusion. But it is by no means certain that in the end make-believe is not here the better method.

Being myself one of the many who tend to make something of a cult of "Alice," I was very much on the alert to discover what was lost and what was gained in theatrical translation. Wisely, perhaps, quite a little of the merely verbal is either abbreviated or eliminated, and in the process there is a real loss. But there is one aspect of "Alice," namely, the faint suggestion of dream terror, which seems to me to come over better than it ever has for me in the reading. Psychologists have commented on it, and, indeed, a few years ago one very solemn one advised parents to spare their children the distressing experience and complained especially of what he called "an ever-present threat to the integrity of the body" expressed not only in all those "off with his head" orders, but also in Alice's inability to stay the same size. Alice herself does protest fretfully about the way in which the beasts order her around, but I never felt so strongly before the veiled threat of the fantastic creatures who surround her or the faint, uneasy suspicion that anyone of them or all of them together might at any moment turn definitely hostile. And though the overtone of anxiety is never more than faint, it does contribute a definite dramatic value.

When I reviewed the last previous production of the American Repertory Theater I complained that too few of its offerings had been conspicuous for either passion on the one hand or gaiety on the other. I do not mean to suggest that they should all be like "Alice in Wonderland," but I do think it is an example of the kind of thing which a public will attend for delight rather than merely out of a sense of duty.

Films

JAMES

WHEN he made "Alexander Nevsky," Sergei Eisenstein deprived himself of practically everything that had been most wonderful in his original style and developed a new and less exciting one—a kind of speeded-up, fluent, basically operatic style which was like watching a handsome, well-organized funeral cortège carry his free genius to its grave at a cheerful forty miles an hour. Relatively conventional as the film was, it was also highly charged, in nearly every shot, with Eisenstein's unique blend of poetic, intellectual, and purely animal energy. In "Ivan the Terrible," Part I, Eisenstein has deprived himself even of the speed, flow, and shape which helped give "Nevsky" grace, and most of his peculiar energy has become cold, muscle-bound, and somber. Yet "Ivan" is a bolder, more adventurous, more interesting film; for a while I felt even more admiration for it than grief over it.

Eisenstein's theme is more deeply involved in an individual and his development, and is in many ways greater, than any he has undertaken before. It is a study, on a scale as ambitious anyhow as that of Shakespeare in his political plays—and more politically knowledgeable and incomparably hotter to handle—of an able man in whom two obsessions collide and become all but identical: love for an idea (his country's strength) and, however discreetly suggested, love of power for its own sake. It is a study of what such a fanatic becomes, given unprecedented power and opportunity, under the impingement of constant danger, treachery, and intrigue. Ivan, as Eisenstein presents him, is a fair parallel to Stalin; but he is still more suggestively a symbol of the whole history of Russian communism. Eisenstein has, for Ivan, a magnificent looking actor, Cherkassov, who can handle the utmost grandiloquence of manner; he causes him to suggest some of the superhuman complexities of Stavrogin, and it may not be accidental that he makes him up with a chin and cranium which become ever more pointed, like John Barrymore as Mr. Hyde. He seems all but desperately absorbed in communicating political ideas and vindications, especially parallels to Stalin and his regime. Ivan's siege and defeat of Kazan, to choose one of the simpler examples, becomes an interesting text on dealing with a foreign enemy: while the enemy watches the army which threatens their walls, you tunnel beneath their city, roll in kegs of gunpowder, and blow it to kingdom come, meaning your kingdom. (It is made clear, moreover, that this stratagem is strictly Ivan's idea, that his lieutenants prefer the old-fashioned cavalry charge, and that his sappers never quite realize what they're up to.)

Eisenstein is very acute with his research, very excitable over architecture and decoration, costume and ritual, and very astute and forceful in his use of them. He is evidently much interested in finding out how little a movie can be made to move and yet move at all, and in giving each movement legendary grandeur—as in the marvelous shots, at once comic and sinister and full of glory, in which the kneeling Ivan's rising hands accept the orb and scepter. He goes boldly and successfully against naturalism and even simple likelihood: in his poisoning scene only opera singers could be so blind to what is happening in plain sight, and in one fine close-up Ivan's wife, his arch-enemy, and his treacherous best friend huddle their heads into the intimacy of one frame as they would never do in a court obsessed with intrigue and suspicion. Depriving himself of a good 99 per cent of all he believes in and is capable of as a cutter, Eisenstein nevertheless demonstrates what exquisiteness and power can be accomplished, even conventionally, by rhythm and series alone. The film is already famous for its lavish use of prodigious close-ups and of exorbitance in gesture and in facial expression, and I would like to make a particularly unprintable gesture toward those who can feel that in his use of these one of the most sophisticated artists of the twentieth century has been naive.

I have only faintly suggested a few of the things about "Ivan," and behind it, which make the film fascinating to watch; but I will have to move along. Interesting as the film is, the longer I reflect on it the unhappier I feel about it. I can't remember a foot of it which doesn't give evidence of a first-rate creative intelligence at work; but there is hardly a foot in which that intelligence is working on anything anywhere near sufficiently worthy of it. splendid to look at; yet there is little that is superior to, or much different from, Russian operatic and theatrical mannerisms which must have been over-rich and over-digested a generation ago. It is as if Picasso were to spend several years crowding all the sophistication that would fit within the conventions of nineteenth-century chromos. And considering the illusion Eisenstein manages to create of expressing many complex ideas, densely and continuously, it is remarkable how little actually gets expressed, and how commonplace most of it is.

I even have to wonder whether Eisenstein perversely or perforce intended this doubleness. I wonder, for that matter, whether he may not be split between a compulsion to choose the most dangerous theme possible, and virtual paralysis in its development: a paralysis which might be a natural effect of being unable, on pain of death, to say honestly, or even surreptitiously, what you really believe. There is a kind of frozen, katatonic deadness about the particular intensity and rigidity of style developed for this film—as if the intelligence, great as it is, could liberate only a very little of itself in the actual images of the film. The kind of liberation I mean occurs just twice in this picture, in the opening, coronation scene; a deacon's hair-raising intonation of a royal benediction (and his wonderful face as he sings), and the moment at which Eisenstein cuts from the ritualistic pouring of gold coins over the new Czar to the faces of young women, watching the sleeting gold and the monarch's tumescent face through it and blossoming into smiles of sexual delight. In their suddenness, beauty, and wildness, and in their ability to enrich the film with whole new trains of ideas and reactions, these two moments are of a different order from any others in "Ivan." They would have been memorable in any of Eisenstein's early films; but there, ideas as good swarmed and coruscated upon his new-found, new-crowned poetry as abundantly as the anointing storm of gold itself.

For years, as everyone knows, Eisenstein has been working as if in a prison, under the supervision of jailers who are not only peculiarly dangerous and merciless but also as sudden to change their minds as minnows their direction. It goes without saying that this has interfered monstrously with his work. Just how, and just how much it has shaped his work and his mind, I see no use whatever in trying to guess, for I fear is impossible to guess how much he agrees with his jailers, even in their treatment of him, and how much, quite aside from that, his own nature may have been predisposed to this sort of ordering and change. No mind and spirit stand still, least of all the mind and spirit of a great artist. Even disquieting outside pressures, there is no guaranty that the development will be for the better, and heaven knows they cannot be discounted in Eisenstein's case. Everything that is meant by creative genius and its performance, and everything that that signifies about freedom and potentiality in general, is crucified in Eisenstein, more meaningfully, and abominably, than in any other man I can think of. I hardly know which seems the more tragic: the possibility that he is still essentially a free man, in his own master, doing the best he can under annihilating difficulties; or the possibility that he accepts the crucifixion and has even helped drive such nails as, in that predicament, he could manage.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

VIRGIL THOMSON will have it that "Pierre Monteux, who conducted his own orchestra, the San Francisco Symphony, last night in Carnegie Hall, is one of the greatest among living conductors," but that the orchestra's imperfections were somewhat exaggerated . . . by the unfamiliarity of the layers with Carnegie Hall's rather special acoustics," with the result that all the animated passages sounded last night . . . in spite of Mr. Monteux's admirable tempos and careful phrasing, a little rowdy." But the orchestra wasn't playing by itself and obliged to adjust itself to Carnegie Hall without guidance; it was playing under a man who had conducted orchestras in that hall for thirty years; and a great conductor could have been one who—if there had been no time for a hall rehearsal—would have been able to exercise the control over the orchestra necessary to adjust it to the hall at the concert. Moreover, in addition to the raucous sound of the performance of Respighi's atrocious intermezzo orchestrale of the Bach Passacaglia there were unprecise phrasing and the same lack of sense for correct tempos individually and in relation to each other that I found in his recent recorded performance of Brahms's second and in his performance of Mozart's "Haffner" with the Philadelphia Orchestra a couple of seasons ago.

What brought me to the concert was Messiaen's "Ascension," which he describes as four "symphonic meditations." Messiaen's music in general, according to Thomson, is "a convincing synthesis of musical modernism with devotional piety . . . new, powerful, and good," and this particular work, "though not by any means its author's masterpiece, is pleasant music, easy to listen to and . . . easy to understand." Thomson may be right about other works of Messiaen that I haven't heard; but in this one I found no relation between the musical substance and the religious meanings of titles and subtitles, except the literal use of trumpet and cymbals where these instruments were mentioned in the quoted texts, and the wholly conventional use of high strings for the "celestial" effects of the concluding "Prayer of Christ Ascending to His Father"; and the musical substance I found mostly unpleasant, feeble, and boring.

Monteux conducted Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps" at its world premiere in Paris in 1913; but Stravinsky himself recorded the work for Columbia a few years ago; and if one listens to Monteux's performance with the San Francisco Symphony in the new Victor set (1052; $4.85) one finds it competent and effective; but if one compares it with the other one discovers that it lacks the sharp clarity and force of Stravinsky's performance. Nor is this merely because of the cloudy recorded sound of the Monteux performance, the sharp and clear recorded sound of the Stravinsky. Unfortunately the sound that is sharp and clear is also unpleasantly false in the way orchestral sound is in the American Columbia recordings of six or seven years back, whereas what is cloudy in the Victor recording is the agreeably natural sound of an orchestra; and so choice is difficult (I prefer the more effective performance in spite of its false sound). The surfaces of the Victor set are noisy.

In the performance of Beethoven's Sonata Opus 13 ("Pathétique") that Artur Schnabel has recorded for Victor (Set 1102; $2.85) he weakens the slow introduction with the punch-pulling decrescendos that I described last week in Horowitz's playing; but except for occasional traces of this mannered, sentimentalizing style the performance of the rest of the sonata is good. It is also well-recorded; but surfaces are not quiet. Schnabel's style is right for Liszt's charming "Valse oubliée," but not for Schumann's "Vogel als Prophet" on the reverse side of the single disc (10-1272; $.75), the surfaces of which are extremely noisy.

Columbia has issued Mozart's Quartet in E flat (K. 493) for piano and strings, played by George Szell and members of the Budapest Quartet (Set 669; $4). Compared with some others—the string quintets, for example—it is a work of lesser stature, but quite lovely; and the performance is very good. But after all these years Columbia still cannot produce something better than the dull recorded sound of the performance on a limited-range machine, its unpleasantly coarse and harsh recorded sound and the noisy surfaces on a wide-range machine.

The Columbia volume "A Night at Carnegie Hall" (Set 676; $4) offers some of the music from the film "Carnegie Hall." The best things in it are Pinza's performances of the Serenade from "Don Giovanni" and the aria Il lacerato spirito from "Simon Boccanegra" with orchestral accompaniments; the worst is his breathless and shapeless performance of Finch' han del vino from "Don Giovanni" with a miserably inadequate piano accompaniment. Rise Stevens contributes a tremolo-ridden performance of the Seguidilla from "Carmen" and a better one of Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix from "Samson et Dalila." And Lily Pons does a crystal-clear performance of the Bell Song from "Lakmé."

Letters to the Editors

You Can't Film That!

Dear Sirs: I have intended for some weeks to write you of my interest in your article, Catholics and Hollywood, in the February 15 Nation.

There is one aspect of the censorship you describe which you don't mention. Not only are books changed in order to meet Catholic censorship, but a number of books are never put into films because of a "hidden censorship." A recent book of mine, "The Peacock sheds His Tail," dealing with the Mexicans' struggle for democracy, mentioned in the latter chapters the connection of the Sinarquistas with fascist Spain. The book was bought by one of Hollywood's leading producers, but just before the contract was signed, Catholic pressure was evidently brought to bear. The matter was finally settled out of court with small payment to me.

Advice on Tactics

Dear Sirs: What I say in criticism of your point of view is only tactical, not strategic.

Liberals must get busy in their own community, and their national organizations must help them to do this by seeing that they get plenty of ammunition for handling local issues in a timely manner. My conservative friends often know that what the people of this community are concerned about is their schools, their homes—in short, what affects them directly. I do not mean to argue that Franco is not connected directly with the local school situation. I know he is and so do you, but even the well-meaning liberals out here who are worked up into a lather about such issues as The Nation and New Republic—and now, God save the mark, by Sir Samuel Pare—do not know how Franco is connected with the fact that our teachers were getting only $1,780 per annum in a community that is really very well off and boasts about it. And this is such I do know—from the hard experience of fighting it out in co-op organization, battling for higher wages for teachers, etc.: most liberals do not know how to think about action; we know how to feel, and even to generalize, but we always lose out because on specific issues we have not had enough information and we have too little experience with the people we must influence, to know how this must be done.

Liberals then must get some sort of information when they need it for action. That is, when an issue is hot locally, the man who knows the answers gets things done, even if the answers and what he does are very bad. So, while discussion groups are very good things they should be used also as reporting centers to some higher headquarters so that these quarters will know what is really of importance to people on a local level and, more important, how it is of importance.

Liberals must learn that facts are only of value if they are related to action. When I talk to a group of local citizens and tell them just what salaries their teachers are being paid, and how this compares with other communities of the same kind, I have really accomplished something. Of course this is hard to find out—even when I have the resources of the University of Chicago for the asking I find it hard to get answers to these vulgar, specific questions.

We need organization, not of ideas, but on the low levels of ward politics. We should return to the American tradition in such matters. I know this is old stuff, but when even you write about the "progressive masses," I wonder if we shouldn't do what they do in city rooms, namely, post a list of don'ts. Certainly one of these is that there are no masses to an American, just as there is no lower class.

Race Fight Strategy

Dear Sirs: My high regard for the opinion of readers of The Nation, and for Carey McWilliams, impels me to comment on his largely enthusiastic review of my "Southern Exposure." This is no mere literary matter but one having to do with my principles.

To begin with, I would prefer being called a democratic American rather than a Southern liberal. But I really take issue with Mr. McWilliams when he says, "It is only in the next to final chapter that Kennedy's liberalism begins to falter." If Mr. McWilliams can convince me that there is a more radical strategy for achieving total racial equality than that which I have advanced, I for one will hasten to embrace it.

What he asks me to do is go beyond

Supreme Court decisions which uphold the constitutionality of segregation statutes per se. I quite agree with him that those decisions are "based upon a deliberately perverse construction of the history, meaning, and purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment." But until the court changes its position, as it has in regard to the white primary, we can only be realistic.

If Mr. McWilliams will reread the chapter, I am sure he will discover that I am very much in favor of a frontal attack on segregation in the South now. All I suggest is that the attack be made apart from the economic and political demands, and that Southern whites and Negroes and non-Southerners assume specialized functions in the entire process.

A Ryder Biographer

Dear Sirs: I am at present working on a full-length biography of the great American painter, Albert Pinkham Ryder. This will be no academic study of his works but an attempt to portray the creative processes of an artist's mind as well as his life. Therefore I would deeply appreciate any letters, documents, or personal anecdotes which some of your readers may have. All material loaned to me will be promptly copied and returned. My address is 1914 Murray Avenue.

The Shape of Things

THE IMMEDIATE QUESTION BEFORE THE United Nations General Assembly, as we go to press, is the one raised by the Arab states whose delegates have arrived determined to press for an "independent Palestine now." Their plea, certainly accompanied by warm assurances of equal rights for all in the new state, is likely to appeal to many people whose minds are focused on the single fact of British dominance and who associate independence with peace and security. Unhappily the situation in the free Arab states already in existence gives no ground for such hopes. Everywhere in the Middle East religious and racial minorities are discriminated against and often subjected to massacre. If Palestine were given its independence now while Jews are in a minority, it would mean civil war and eventually the end of the whole Zionist development. Obviously this tragedy must be avoided, not only because the world cannot afford to lose one of its most hopeful experiments in social democracy, not only to fulfill the obligations to the Jews assumed after World War I by Britain, America, and the League of Nations, but also and even more urgently to save the lives of the Jews grimly awaiting rescue in Germany and Cyprus. The Arab states cannot be allowed to prevent appointment of the U. N. inquiry committee by pressing their intransigent demand. Doubtless they will be voted down eventually, but meanwhile valuable time may be lost and questions debated which should obviously be put off until the inquiry has been completed and its report brought in.

THE PRESIDENT'S CAMPAIGN TO DEFEAT inflation by "moral suasion" has won some minor successes, but the citadel of high prices shows little sign of willingness to surrender. What has mainly been achieved so far is a psychological impact on the minds of the public. Consumers, already displaying increasing sales resistance, have become still more allergic to high prices, and while the industrial sector as a whole affects indifference to this development, the retailers are showing signs of alarm. And well they may, for there is plenty of evidence that retail business is slipping. Department-store sales for the week ending April 19 were 6 per cent below those of a year ago, indicating a very much sharper decline in volume, since prices are so much higher than they were in April, 1946. Such facts are stimulating drives by retailers to get prices down. However, stunts like the Newburyport Week—we use the term in no opprobrious sense—can hardly be more than one-shot promotion affairs unless the participating merchants can persuade their suppliers to cut prices also. A few manufacturers have done so. Lever Brothers announced a downward revision in soap prices which its competitors quickly followed; the California vintners have decided to try to reduce their overflowing inventories by cutting wholesale rates from 10 to 30 percent; a scattering of individual concerns have made cuts in such lines as copper cable and wire, shoes, electrical appliances, and lumber.

ON THE OTHER HAND, N. A. M. PRESIDENT Earl Bunting has come out with a statement that prices are bound to go higher as a result of the new round of wage increases. He asserted that if the 13,000,000 factory workers in this country all get 15 cents an hour more, it will cost industry $4,058,000,000 as against net profits after taxes of $4,500,000,000 in 1945, the last year, he said, for which complete figures are available. As Mr. Bunting should know, incomplete figures indicate that 1946 industrial profits were considerably higher than that. Moreover, it is absurd to deduct the cost of wage increases from net profits; obviously they are a charge against gross earnings, and the effect on net is much less severe than Mr. Bunting indicated. The same curious kind of accounting distinguished a statement by Eugene G. Grace, chairman of Bethlehem Steel, when he said that the new wage agreement would cost between $5 and $6 per common share. Because of this increase, he went on, there is "no prospect of cutting steel prices at this time. . . . Let even ten points drop from the current operating rates and see what will happen." We would respectfully suggest to Mr. Grace that a price cut might well prove the best insurance against this eventuality. Meanwhile we note that Bethlehem Steel earned $4.84 per common share in the three months ending March 31—the best showing for a first quarter in its history. If it keeps this up, 1947 profits will be very close to those of the record year 1940, after making every allowance for the new wage increase. Bethlehem's experience is typical of that of other big industrial concerns.

GROWING PANICKY IN ITS SEARCH FOR ITEMS to excise from the President's budget, the House of Representatives last week, in carrying out the recommendations of its Appropriations Committee, all but ripped the heart out of the country's power and reclamation program. Cutting the Department of the Interior's budget by 47 per cent, the House followed the pattern of "economizing" discussed in these pages last week. The budget of the Bonneville Power Administration was reduced by two-thirds. So little was allowed for new power and reclamation projects in the Central Valley of California, the Columbia Basin, and the Missouri River Valley that, unless the Senate repairs the damage, some of them cannot be completed for decades. Not satisfied with this blow at public-power projects, the House voted to curtail activities that the government has carried on for years.
 It refused funds for collecting statistics on bituminous coal, recommended the cessation of underground water surveys which the Geological Survey has been making for half a century, and eliminated all soil and moisture work on grazing lands. There is a good deal of method behind this superficial madness. The drive paves the way for tax cuts which can be distributed to the advantage of the wealthy if the Republican-sponsored tax bill is passed, and it provides an opportunity to cripple activities long frowned on by "economic royalists." Some of these cuts may be restored in the Senate. Western Republicans are incensed, and cautious party leaders are aware that such tactics can make the West a gift to Truman in 1948. The budget-cutters, however, are trading on the fact that the public is only dimly aware of the services the federal government performs for it and is likely to regard any form of economizing and tax reduction as desirable. Only an angry and audible reaction from the beneficiaries of government services will convince them otherwise.

GREAT INTEREST WILL NOW BE CENTERED on the special elections in the state of Washington in June to fill the vacancy left in Congress by the death last week of Representative Fred Norman, Republican. It will be the first test of Congressional strength since last November. The Interior cuts will be the main issue, for this is the district that contains Bonneville.

ALTHOUGH YOUR NAME MAY BE GONZALES, the school authorities of California will no longer be able to segregate your children in the public schools. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has handed down a unanimous decision outlawing segregated schools in California. What distinguishes the decision from others upholding racial and ethnic democracy is the vigor of its language and the boldness of its conclusions. Justice William Denman, in a concurring opinion, went one step farther than his colleagues and suggested that the school authorities of Orange County should be indicted for their flagrant violation of the oath of office. "It is to such officials," Justice Denman caustically observed, "who so violate their oaths of office and openly break the state and federal law, and who set such an example to boys and girls, that these adolescents are intrusted to grow up in the American way of life." If Mexican youngsters could be segregated, he said, so could other groups; and thus "Hitler's anti-Semitism would have a long start in a country which gave its youth to aid in its destruction." If the school authorities appeal to the Supreme Court, which they are likely to do in order to escape possible indictment for past derelictions, the Westminster case may, indeed, make legal history in the nation.

REMEMBER HAROLD RUTTENBERG? FOR TEN years he was the very able research director of Philip Murray's union of steelworkers, and while in that job he, with Clinton Golden, then the union's vice-president, wrote a book on the kind of America we could have. He also wrote articles on labor for The Nation. Last week Ruttenberg's latest literary effort appeared in Life. It was a letter to the editor which the journal featured prominently. Ruttenberg, now a budding industrialist, the vice-president of a small steel mill, has done a somersault. The former apostle of low prices in an economy of abundance now proclaims as his philosophy the great benefit to the public of high prices and high profits. He argues that the profits of the steel industry (see above) are not large enough to induce the industry to build the new plants whose products the world needs so desperately. Ruttenberg reaches his climax with a short and simple prescription for inducing the reluctant dragons who own the steel industry to build more mills. "We have four-cents-a-pound steel now," he says; "let's raise it to five cents." Ruttenberg discusses steel as you would a Hershey bar, neglecting to mention the fact that steel is bought and used, not by the pound, but by the ton, and on that unit his penny is multiplied two thousand times. Steel in its manifold uses accounts for 45 per cent of the total income of this country and for 40 per cent of the jobs. The present capacity of the steel industry is too small—85,000,000 tons. But even on that tonnage the penny a pound means an increased steel price of, hold your breath, $1,750,000,000 annually, every cent of which, by the Ruttenberg formula, would be extra profit for the steelmasters. What that increase, pyramided into buildings, automobiles, bridges, and kitchen sinks, would mean to our already inflated economy, and to the impoverished countries of the world, is something only a steel-plated tycoon could contemplate with pleasure.

THE RULING OF ACTORS' EQUITY THAT IF the National Theater in Washington continues to deny admission to Negroes after May 31, 1948, members of Equity will not be allowed to appear on its stage is wonderfully simple, clear, and firm. It cuts through all the old rationalizations—that Washington is a Southern town, that Jim Crow is an old customer, that these delicate matters must be worked out gradually—and dramatizes the scandalous fact that eighty-four years after the Emancipation Proclamation colored Americans are forbidden to sit beside white Americans in a theater, ironically named the National, in the capital city of the United States. (Gradualism indeed—and whom did your sister marry?) The rationalizers will not down easily. Marcus Heiman, manager of the National, does not want his theater to be made a "guinea pig" in a fight against Jim Crow in Washington, and he is afraid patronage will fall off. A spokesman for the League of New York Theaters believes that the situation should be remedied by legislation—and no doubt it should. There will be further protests, excuses, and apologetics from individuals and groups with far less admirable motives. But we hope that Equity will stick to its guns, and we are sure it will. Theater people are likely to be regarded, say by a Southern politician, as light-minded and impractical—but they are not apt to be taken in by such an outworn belief, for instance, as the myth of white superiority. They have seen too many Bill Robinsons for that.

IN THE CURIOUS FRED ALLEN AFFAIR, OUR professional concern for the under dog is canceled out by our equally professional zeal for the Four Freedoms. Vice-presidents, like mothers-in-law, have for generations been fair game for jokesters, and we might almost have enjoyed seeing one suddenly turn and bite a comedian. But apparently you can't give the vice-presidential under dogs of the National Broadcasting Company any such leeway. Allow one of them to bite Fred Allen and the whole pack goes wild, not only taking nips out of Bob Hope and Red Skelton but laying down high and mighty rules as to who may nip whom in the future. There was something inspiring, too, in the way the comedians closed ranks and thumbed a collective nose at their network bosses after Allen had been cut off the air for half a minute for joshing a v. p. In a spontaneous wave of sympathy, they taunted the vice-presidents and invited thirty-second-degree martyrdom until the network broke under the strain, recanted, and tried feebly to pass the whole thing off as a gay jest. The vice-presidents have crept back, shamefaced, to their desks, and will probably take a worse mauling than ever. As for us, we shall waste no sympathy on underdogs-in-the-manger and wish only that the Shirers of radio had the solidarity of the Allens.

What America Wants

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

IT DOES NOT require the free-swinging imagination of an H. G. Wells to realize that mankind today is in the midst of one of the great movements of change that have punctuated its history. When Secretary Marshall and Henry Wallace landed in Washington the other day, one from a somewhat qualified defeat at Moscow, one from a rather ambiguous triumph in several European capitals, they represented something far more important than the events in which they took part. Each represented a tendency, a stream, in a swift and largely uncontrolled current. At present those tendencies cross one another, setting up a lively riddle. But Henry Wallace's thinking is not as far from George Marshall's as both men probably believe; they are moving together in the same general direction.

I have been trying, during these past days of deadlock in Moscow and vehement debate in Washington, to consider objectively the purpose this country's foreign policy is intended to defend, and then to appraise the policy itself as an instrument for that purpose. Little is gained by concentrating on individual eddies or tide-rips; they may be the daily business of journalism, but they will not be understood unless one understands as well the direction and force of the current. Nor is it enough to say that the Truman Doctrine, as applied today to Greece and Turkey, is a demonstration of "ruthless imperialism"; or to deny this charge and argue that our policy is intended to head off the imperialist drive of Soviet Russia. The purpose behind either intention, as also behind the German policy developed at Moscow by Mr. Marshall and the trade policy expounded by our representatives at Geneva, is what needs looking at: this purpose is the preservation, against immense threat, of the system of private capitalist enterprise upon which our country's whole development has been based.

This is not a small thing or a contemptible one; it is the essence of America—as socialism is the essence of Russia—and the fact that the system is giving way, bit by bit, in every continent but this one only increases the determination of those who believe in it to strengthen its defenses. For if free enterprise as a world system is crumbling, American free enterprise is not. This country has resilience and natural wealth and a productive capacity never equaled in all history; the study of America's needs and resources issued last week by the Twentieth Century Fund reveals a sensational picture of present-day facts and future possibilities.

No social order gives up while it is still capable of self-defense. Even the Communists, when it happens to suit their purpose, recognize the vitality of the American system, and I noticed that their advertisement which appears on the back cover of this issue proclaims unqualified faith in political democracy and peaceful methods, with "socialism as an ultimate goal." These protestations should be taken seriously for one reason: they offer evidence that the Communist Party recognizes the irrelevance to the American situation of the traditional position that links its dogma and sympathies and methods to those of Soviet Russia. For American Communists to be honest revolutionaries today would not only threaten their survival; it would also be utopian. And modern Communist tactics are nothing if not practical.

The question Americans must answer, as they consider the impact of the Truman Doctrine on the rest of the world, is: Do we believe—assuming the United States will do its utmost to defend the free-enterprise system—that our present foreign policy is likely to accomplish this purpose?

In Greece we are not going to preserve democracy, since there is none to preserve; nor establish it, since we have promised the present regime military help to put down rebellion. We are aiming to stiffen the ability of one of the countries least able to sustain a capitalist economy to hold out on that basis against the threat of a revolution which might create, near the frontiers of Russia and the frontiers of our new oil empire in the Middle East, another Communist-controlled state.

In Turkey we aim to strengthen the country's resistance to Russian pressure; that, and nothing more.

After withdrawing our marines and apparently washing our hands of the Chinese mess, we are now about to send warships of various sorts as a gift to China's undemocratic but anti-Communist government. By helping the Kuomintang we not only hope to stymie Russia; we also help preserve the oppressive landlord system which the Chinese Communists have been wiping out in their areas.

In southern Korea we have been supporting reactionary political groups and putting down Communist ones and, along with the Communists, whatever democratic center groups may exist. More money and supplies will be put into this job; not because we are set on creating a democratic regime in southern Korea—we would have gone about the job very differently—but because we want to make the area a barricade against a northern Korea in which Russia has expropriated private property.

and is building a Communist-controlled Korean "people's army."

In Germany most Americans advocate, with Messrs. Dulles and Marshall, the restoration of a unified economic system under proper safeguards to prevent rearming or the revival of the great cartels. This idea dominated Secretary Marshall's policy in Moscow. Its object was not merely to save American dollars now being used to feed Germans, or to prevent Russia from getting the reparations Molotov demanded—though that turned out to be its practical effect. Its object was to create a Germany in which prosperity, or at least stability, might emerge from a revitalized system of finance and industry, strong enough to withstand the pull of the socialist economies and the Russian political power to the East.

It is very easy to say, as The Nation has sometimes said, that the way to offset Communist infection or pressure or outright threat is to make a country economically strong and prosperous. It has been suggested that in Greece, for instance, American money spent, not by a United States Economic Mission acting through a royalist regime, but through an internationally supervised commission acting for the United Nations, might rebuild the country to the point where democracy would reassert itself and put an end both to a corrupt oligarchy and to the danger of revolution and foreign control. Liberals have also argued that in Germany we should use Socialists and trade unionists rather than the assorted rightists who more and more are taking over administrative functions. This, they believe, will put Germany's future in the hands of political groups which will resist both fascism and communism and lead Germany to some sort of a moderate social democracy.

Both liberals and conservatives count somehow on the power of American ideas and money to sweep back the revolutionary tide; the conservatives by "standing firm" or "getting tough," the liberals by yielding enough to the forces of change to placate and disarm them. The Marshalls want American efficiency and power to move to the peripheries of the non-Russian world and establish outposts of the system they identify with a decent civilization. The Wallaces want to go there, too, with tractors and TVA's and friendly agreements, to call off both the capitalist and the anti-capitalist drive. How realistic are the hopes of either? Do not both minimize the power of the revolutionary current?

In this process Russia is an aggressive force in a sense America so far is not. It believes, as this country does, that its system is somehow equated with civilization—with social justice and a superior variety of democracy. But it also believes that the American system is on the defensive—and so do we. This gives Russia a special dynamism in spite of its relative economic weakness.

Russia has in addition the invaluable aids of a faith and a communal spirit. With all its material success the American system has failed to evolve either one. On the other hand America has all the power that its greatly expanded industrial plant provides, together with an altogether new sense of urgency and mission, born of a sudden realization of the dangers ahead.

In face of this power Russia may halt and even appear to surrender; the American policy of toughness may seem successful. But I believe any such shift will be a temporary diversion, not a change of direction. The economic wastelands of the Eastern world cannot be turned into little Americas by dollars and soldiers. In Western Europe the revolutionary current is partly directed by conscious and more or less intelligent planning. A new order is taking form even while the process of crumbling goes on. Whether that form approximates Russia's will depend on a number of factors: the wealth of the area, the strength or weakness of the democratic tradition, the prevalence of political and financial corruption, the level of its industrial development, the vitality of its people. It is not necessary to believe that autocracy—socialist or otherwise—is the only alternative to capitalist democracy. But it is impossible to doubt that a planned and controlled—that is, a socialist—economy is necessary for the revival of Europe, or that an end of feudalism and upper-class oligarchy is necessary for Eastern Europe and the whole of Asia.

How long American capitalism can maintain its lusty health in a world where revolution is the condition of survival is something only a Henry Luce would dare guess. The Russians expect us to head into a series of depressions which will end in the collapse of the system; this is one reason why they may decide they can afford to relax their pressure in various parts of the world. Perhaps they underestimate the energy of the people and the solid resources available to cushion our falls. But one thing seems certain: we shall not successfully defend American capitalism by costly attempts to patch up the capitalism of Germany or Greece or by trying to perpetuate feudalism in the Balkans or the Middle East or China. By a paradox that seems to me a simple fact, peace and prosperity will be more secure in America if we accept the process of revolution in Europe and the East instead of subsidizing resistance to it. Our cherished capitalism itself might stand a better chance if we deliberately helped the peoples of the world to achieve socialism with a minimum of violence and repression: if we lent money to socialist states to get their state-owned industries working and their state-controlled trade flowing, to raise the standard of living of their hungry people and stabilize their debased currencies.

But this is a heresy that will not, I think, appeal to the inventors and apostles of the Truman Doctrine.

Back to McKinley

TO REPRESENTATIVE HARTLEY and Senator Taft the United States Steel Corporation and General Motors must seem models of ingratitude. The moment these statesmen launched their assault on collective bargaining was the very moment the two giant corporations chose to demonstrate the virtues of that procedure. And immediately following that demonstration, three other important companies—General Electric, Chrysler Corporation, and Jones and Laughlin—followed the lead of the two giants by reaching wage agreements based on an identical pattern. Given a reasonable balance of strength between the contending forces, these settlements showed, collective bargaining is not only an efficient institution but one that, preserving the dignity and self-respect of the contending parties, generates a good-will that is unknown where coercion is the rule.

It is this requirement of a reasonable balance of strength, we believe, that is crucial to any hope of industrial peace. In the very nature of a capitalist society, ownership starts off with a tremendous advantage. In an open-shop system it is a single controlled entity, holding the power to dictate the share which its individual and divided employees shall enjoy in a jointly made product, to say nothing of the conditions under which they work. The whole purpose of trade unionism has been to modify that original imbalance. This obvious point is rarely made in the halls of Congress; yet the extent to which equality of bargaining power exists in any industry is the extent to which stability may be expected in that industry's relations with labor. It is no coincidence that protracted strikes occur most rarely in those sections of the economy that are most strongly unionized—railroads, steel, garment manufacture, and shipping—coal being the conspicuous exception for reasons not entirely in the sphere of labor economics.

Between the dynamic stability that stems from a strong trade-union movement and the dead stability that rests on a complete suppression of organized labor there is only the troubled and costly and inconclusive industrial warfare that we have come to know so well. In this endless wrangling and frequent recourse to the strike are the proofs of immaturity, with labor too strong and too aware of its strength to accept a reversion to the economic tyranny of an earlier day and not yet strong enough to enjoy the status of an equal. Assuming that we do not want to remain longer than necessary in this intermediate stage, we can attempt to move either forward or backward. No society has ever succeeded in moving backward for any length of time or without the most violent repercussions. Yet that is precisely the spirit and intent of the legislation now being debated on Capitol Hill.

There are, as we have said in the past, abuses of power in the trade unions. The fact that abuse is an almost inseparable companion of power does not justify it, and we do not oppose legislation designed to correct it. We believe, for example, that organized labor should have eliminated the jurisdictional strike long ago, and since it did not, we concede the need of government action. The same goes for certain types of secondary boycott. But such correctives are the smallest part of the legislation now offered in Congress. The Hartley bill in the House and the proposed Taft amendments in the Senate are designed not to protect the public from such abuses or to save innocent employees from unreasonable practices. Their purpose is to weaken labor's power in collective bargaining; in fact, to make bargaining all but impossible.

Taft has adopted an attitude of sweet reason on the floor of the Senate, where he talks of "equalizing" the bargaining power of labor and management, but before the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association he was more forthright. The Senate measure, he assured his audience, is "not a milk-toast bill," but covers about three-quarters of the objectives "pressed on us very strenuously by employers." And this is without the drastic amendments he proposes to insert and without reference to the far more punitive bill before the House.

As the Senate bill stands, it would, among other provisions, forbid the closed shop, list unfair union practices, permit the union shop only with modifications, exclude foremen from protection of the Wagner act, make unions subject to suit, permit the National Labor Relations Act to enjoin jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts, and permit an employer to refuse to join in industry-wide bargaining. Taft would, in addition, give private employers injunctive relief on their own motion, put far more drastic curbs on industry-wide bargaining, and greatly restrict employer contributions to union welfare funds. The House bill, discussed in these pages two weeks ago, avoids even the pretense of "equalizing" bargaining power and would make trade unionism too meaningless to warrant the payment of dues.

Nothing could be more dangerous than the hallucination that the days of McKinley can be brought back by passing a law. The frenzy of the Congressional extremists has already brought the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. closer together than they have been in a decade, with Federation leaders all the more bitter against the Republican Party for the support they were foolish enough to give it last November. (Ironically, Hartley himself was among those specifically indorsed.) Something like sixteen million Americans belong to trade unions, and with their families they constitute a major and articulate part of the population. Since they will not and should not be reduced to economic impotence by Congressional fiat, it would be wiser to seek industrial peace by strengthening their hand in honest collective bargaining—and vastly more intelligent.

Where Do We Go from Moscow?

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, April 25

THIS time it is really over—after seven weeks. Bevin, on Friday morning, made a long statement to the British press which was meant to show that, despite appearances, it was a pretty good conference.

No one would say that it was a complete waste of time, but it certainly did not come up to expectations. Bevin, at any rate, went to Moscow with the idea that he would take back to London a new text of the Anglo-Soviet alliance and a complete Austrian treaty, and he got neither. "If anyone else tells me they've cleared away a lot of dead wood, I swear I'll strangle him," one man was heard to say at the Moskva Hotel a day or two before the end of the conference. He didn't strangle Bevin; yet the gist of Bevin's press conference was precisely that: we have come to understand each other's demands in the interval; it looks disappointing but was a very useful conference really; the unity of the Big Four is greater than it was before; and so forth and so forth.

Bevin has stuck to his guns. On the question of reparations from current production, which is really the crux of the disagreement on Germany, Bevin has been tougher even than Marshall. Marshall produced a proposal which clearly was not adequate from the Russian viewpoint but which at least, as Vishinsky pointed out, recognized the principle of current reparations, and if the Marshall memorandum had been seriously discussed, one might have detected the beginnings of agreement.

In the British delegation, reactions to the Marshall proposal, with its principle of "compensation" (compensation from current production for capital reparations to which the Russians are entitled by Potsdam but which they will not get with the raising of the industry level), was of two kinds. Some thought it was inadequate even as a basis of discussion; others, representing the Bevin school of thought, were scared lest the Russians read into it more than was intended—and soon nothing more was heard of it. As a result, the deadlock with which the conference began remains wholly unresolved as far as this fundamental question is concerned.

The impression is that on the British and perhaps on the American side there was serious miscalculation from the start. Judging from various discourses about the conference during its early stages, there seems to have been an impression that the Russians would have given in, perhaps, because of the "appalling mess they're in in the Soviet zone of Germany." There, it was suggested, everything was going to ruin, and the Russians need steel so badly that they would waive current reparations and agree to economic unity without them.

This showed lack of understanding of Soviet psychology. If the Russians have a strongly desired objective—as reparations are—they will suffer far more inconveniences than anyone else would rather than give up trying. But since they have not subscribed to German economic unity, they are now obviously threatened with two other Anglo-American trumps. First, there is no guaranty that the industrial level will not be raised in western Germany, especially since the Russians, having accepted the principle of ten million tons of steel, cannot very well object to that amount on grounds of security (though the British and Americans say they would "prefer" not to act independently). Second, there is the danger to the Russians that they will fail to get, not merely reparations from current production, but even capital reparations, with the zonal system perpetuated.

The industry-level argument, if used, would of course be a quibble: if the Russians have agreed to a higher level, it is in order to receive part of the increased production in reparations. But Bevin's argument seems to be that the higher industry level, as seen by the British, has nothing to do with reparations, and that the eleven million tons of steel agreed to by the British government long ago was not intended to include reparations.

In addition, Bevin has now advanced the somewhat far-fetched claim that British and American loans to Germany, if not repaid, will, like the standstill agreements between the two wars, constitute a foundation for German rearmament. That is not the point. There is no idea in Russian minds of letting Britain and America finance Germany so that Germany can pay reparations to Russia. The Russian argument is that with the raising of the industry level there will be enough to balance German payments, repay Anglo-American post-war advances, and pay current reparations—if not immediately, at least after some time. To the question whether this is possible or not, Bevin has been giving nothing but the vaguest answers.

But no critical analysis of the problem has been made, and the French proposal that a committee of experts be created to investigate the whole matter has never been followed up. Instead Bevin repeats: "Our interpretation and the Russian interpretation of Potsdam do not agree."

No one who has followed this conference closely can be surprised that the Austrian treaty has not come off.

And it is extremely doubtful that the Vienna committee in which Bevin places such high hopes will be any more successful than the Foreign Ministers' conference. Russia knows how eager Britain and America are to see the Soviets get out of Austria. But the set-up of its occupation of Austria is one of Russia's few big trumps, one which it will not throw away for nothing. That the Soviets will consent to a peace treaty with Austria without the main lines of the German treaty being agreed upon is extremely doubtful. Austria may well be used as a means of obtaining a reparations settlement—at least such a settlement as may for some time be little more than a face-saving device but in the long run might approximate the ten billion dollars sought. Bevin's great eagerness to get Austria out of the way can only persuade the Russians to hang on to Austria at almost any price pending agreement on the main German economic problems.

There is also another Austrian angle—strategic and political. Austria is a Germanic wedge between Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. With the evacuation of Austria Russia loses its communication lines through Rumania and Hungary. Austria is also the center of power politics between Russia and America. The Austrian government is notoriously anti-Russia, and in moments of indiscretion some high-placed Austrians have been saying: "Why worry about these German assets? Once we become an independent sovereign state we can pass laws which will reduce the values of Russian-held German factories and other assets to mighty little. For example, we can prohibit the export of such and such commodities, which will be the precise ones these plants are producing." Austria is politically and strategically so important that the Russians may well wait before departing and in the meantime study more closely the full implications of the Truman policy. There is an unhappy feeling on the part of Russia that, the Austrian government being what it is, Austria might be tempted to play the role of anti-Communist bulwark in Central Europe with American financial aid.

That such ideas are at the back of the Russians' minds is apparent from the seemingly unimportant discussions on whether the Austrian army must use home-made weapons or may import arms from abroad—Molotov insisting on home-made weapons only. In short, there is a persistent suspicion among observers of all nationalities that, even allowing for Austria's importance as a trump card in Russia's hands in relation to Germany, the Austrian treaty might still have materialized but for the Truman message on aid for democracies, which inevitably conjured up visions of Austria becoming another Turkey or Greece—and in a much more vital spot in Europe. My guess is that Russia will take certain precautions, such as putting Austria under the financial tutelage of the United Nations, before quitting.

BY A. G. MEZERIK

IV. Under the Sign of the Flying Red Horse

Houston, Texas

THERE is a new oil millionaire around. This one came up fast. He is in his thirties, and only a short while ago was a filling-station attendant. Now he is regarded as the probable heir to the mantle of Jesse Jones, who has for so long ruled the Houston roost. The new man is in the Texas "Regular" tradition. While his money came from oil, he has become a big builder and industrialist; in politics he is reactionary and fanatically anti-labor. He has the reputation of being a rough-and-ready fighter, and he fights hardest at the first sign of union organization among his employees. Union organizers often tell of their experiences with similar Texas millionaires. The union files charges of flagrant violations of the law with the National Labor Relations Board; the company's lawyers delay the hearings by every legal means; when the long-postponed day finally arrives, the union finds that its case has dissolved into thin air—the complainants have been bought up.

Houston, headquarters of the oil millionaires, is much like Detroit twenty-five years ago. New buildings are going up on every street; factories are humming; there are more jobs than men. And the talk is about the latest millionaire. My special millionaire's office, in this unmistakable boom-town atmosphere, is a cross between El Morocco's tiger-striped interior and a Hollywood producer's sanctum. I opened our interview with a question: "You are now a very rich man. You are still a young man. What plans have you for your state?" He thought my question curious, even silly. He wanted to talk about his plans for his companies. He had never thought very much about his state, but he felt sure that it was not only doing all right but was first in the world in every phase of human endeavor. There were only two evils, Communists and organized labor, and according to him they were synonymous—imported twin evils which should be destroyed.

I brought him back for a look at the Texas balance sheet. Texas is the first state in the Union in beef cattle—but in the control of pellagra, the disease of malnutrition, Texas is forty-eighth and it has 19 per cent of the nation's pellagra. Texas is first in cotton—thirty-eighth in public-school systems; first in oil and gas—forty-seventh in public-library systems. On the long and proud list of Texas firsts are sulphur, pecans, and wool—but Texas is thirty-third in per capita income. "What does all that mean?" I asked. To him, the new Texas millionaire, the income figure, if true, which he doubted, meant that Negroes and Mexicans had been counted and therefore it was of no significance. He had never seen a white man, one not too lazy to work, that is, who wasn't doing fine.

The young millionaire's idea of bettering conditions in his state was to increase his own wealth. He wanted political power in order to make that job easier. The oil men team up politically with lawyers representing Northern corporations and with bankers. The three groups together are known as "Regulars." Under their domination the state government is the most reactionary political set-up in America. They stop at nothing. In 1944 they made an attempt to steal the election and to cast Texas's electoral-college votes against Roosevelt though the people of the state clearly wanted to reelect him. To gain their ends they seized control of the state Democratic convention. That they eventually failed is a tribute to the aroused citizens, who reacted in Texas as they did in Georgia this year when Herman Talmadge tried to usurp power. Leading attorneys joined with clubwomen, clergy, students, workers, and farmers to stop the Regulars. In the final round it was the farmers, up to 1944 not distinguished for political alertness, who won back the franchise for the people at a second convention.

Having failed to pervert the Democratic Party, the Regulars formed a political party of their own. They had but one aim, to defeat Franklin Roosevelt. They threw all their resources into the campaign. Their biggest gun was W. Lee O'Daniel, the once irresistible Pappy. Always willing to help his friends, the old king of the flour sacks stumped the state reviling Roosevelt. Pappy is tied in with the Houston tough guys in other ways. He is the best-known fellow-traveler of the Christian American group of fascists which heads up in Houston. One of the most violent of the city's rich reactionaries, the late John Henry Kirby, was among this group's earliest backers, and other Regulars have supported its activities—as, for the record, have various non-native sons, for example, John J. Raskob, Ogden Mills, and Alfred P. Sloan of General Motors.

That is the crowd for whom Senator W. Lee O'Daniel,

A. G. MEZERIK, author of "The Revolt of the South and West," has spent the past several months making a new survey of the South. This is the fourth article of a series he is writing on current political and economic trends in various Southern states.

self-styled the people's choice, went to work. The people of Texas booed Pappy in Austin and in the oil men's stronghold, Houston; they were apathetic everywhere else. And Roosevelt got the votes. With the help of Pappy, two former governors, and the ineffable Martin Dies the Regulars garnered just 10 per cent of the total.

REGULARS VS. RAINEY

The Regulars went back into the Democratic Party. They knew that while they might not be able to run the national government they could still run the state and the state university. President Homer Rainey, had made an honest effort to give Texas a university comparable to North Carolina's Chapel Hill. Its buildings were modern. Its teaching staff was of high caliber. But the Regulars controlled seven of the nine regents, and they demanded President Rainey's scalp.

The regents set up an inquisition which concentrated largely on irrelevancies, the most spectacular being the presence of John Dos Passos's "U. S. A." on university reading lists and the teaching of the economic doctrines of John Maynard Keynes in university classrooms. Of such stuff as this the regents built their case. In November, 1944, Rainey was fired. The students rebelled, held mass-meetings, made a great outcry. The Regulars took notice and obtained an investigation by the state senate, which, as was expected, went down the line to whitewash the regents. The senate committee's big achievement was to call as witness Regent Orville C. Bullington, an O'Daniel appointee and one of the state's richest Republicans. Mr. Bullington testified at length. He had heard, he swore, that there were several homosexuals in the student body and the faculty. He felt, he said in ringing tones, that Dr. Rainey had not been diligent enough in weeding out this evil. The hearings ended with this as its biggest sensation.

The progressives, after defeating the attempted steal of the national election, had lost strength, and they could not prevent Dr. Rainey's ouster. But now Rainey became the focal point for a new challenge. He spoke regularly over the radio, rebuilding interest and organization. In 1946 he ran for the governorship. In the campaign he raised many issues besides that of the state's domination by the Regulars. He spoke of education, his own field, and pointed to the need of increased facilities.

He listed the many things wanted by a majority of the people and indicated a way to get them: a severance tax on the natural wealth taken out of the state would do the trick—the value of the exported oil, gas, and sulphur is truly fabulous. But Rainey knew that passage of a severance tax was blocked by the Regulars and their controlled Legislature, aided by an antiquated constitution.

The Texas constitution is a product of confused Reconstruction days. Negroes, carpetbaggers, and plantation owners were represented in the convention which drew it up, and no one of the three groups was strong enough to dominate the proceedings. As a result so many checks and balances were written into the final document that the Governor has little power and it is next to impossible to enact a law. That frequently makes it necessary to amend the constitution; more than 1,700 amendments have been proposed since its adoption. A new Texas constitution is therefore a prerequisite to progress.

It was on all these needs that Dr. Rainey built his program. The Regulars went into action against him at once, but the most formidable obstacle to his success, as to that of any progressive candidate, was probably the huge size of the state. The Gulf ports and the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth are industrial. In many other parts of Texas the dominant interest is cattle raising; in the east it is oil and cotton; the southern tip, the lush Rio Grande valley, concentrates on truck farming and citrus fruits. No candidate without access to the press and support from it can hope to make himself heard everywhere unless he has unlimited funds, which progressives seldom have.

Dr. Rainey was also confronted with a well-organized smear campaign. It was carried on like this. Two agents of the Regulars would drive into one of the many Texas hamlets and stop at a local store. While leisurely making a purchase, the visitors would pick up a conversation and quickly turn it toward the political campaign. One would say, "I was going to vote for Professor Rainey, but in justice to my family I can't. I have learned on good authority that Rainey is a homosexual," using, of course, a much more common and vulgar word. This smear went back to the unsupported but well-publicized charges made about the university, though not about Rainey, in the state senate hearings. As they drove through the country, the rumor-mongers worked on other prejudices too. With religious people they used the atheist argument. Where racial feeling was strong they said that Dr. Rainey's children were intimate with Negroes, or with Mexicans. Meanwhile the Texas press laid down a barrage of Regular propaganda.

Attacked on many fronts, Dr. Rainey was kept on the defensive and was defeated in the election. This time the victory of the Regulars was complete. Not one office was won by the progressives, though in the past they had often obtained that of attorney general or lieutenant governor.

The Texas press continues to stymie every progressive movement. Among the worst offenders is the Light, the Hearst paper in San Antonio, a city one would not expect to tolerate such a loud-mouthed, ignorant sheet. For San Antonio has a magic which captivates the traveler and mellows the resident. The little San Antonio River meanders through the busy downtown section, bringing with it hints of old Mexico and the tropics. Along its bank is a walk bordered by palms and flowering bushes. Here and there are terraced dining-rooms serving Mexican food. At one point an open-air theater spans the river. The stage is on one bank, and the spectators sit facing it on the opposite bank. The enchanted visitor comes up a winding stairway from the river into La Vallita, a restored Mexican community, complete with plaza and adobe huts, in which craftsmen work pottery wheels and spin native fibers.

The home-owned press throughout the state is controlled by very rich men who share all the prejudices of their friends the Houston oil millionaires. Their papers print little relevant information about what goes on in the Capitol. This denial of information to the people is made easy by the one-party system; no opposition is strong enough to expose the boys in power. The editorials of this press deal only in generalities, and any reference to labor or progressives is derogatory. Almost all papers praise the Texas Regulars. The numerous and important weeklies are like the dailies in serving reaction. A recent thirty-day survey found that fifty-two papers, almost all of them weeklies, were using undiluted handouts from the National Association of Manufacturers. This is hardly surprising, for the big corporations composing the N. A. M. have a strangle-hold on Texas.

EASTERN MONOPOLIES CONTROL TEXAN WEALTH

An expert estimates that one-half of all the industrial and mineral wealth of the state is owned and directly controlled by outsiders. Sixty per cent of the rest, he maintains, is indirectly controlled by them—through mortgages held by the big Hartford and New York insurance companies. Every major telephone, gas, and electric company operating in Texas is owned by Eastern holding corporations. Two New York corporations own almost all of the sulphur and thus have a perfect monopoly, for the Texas deposits are the largest in the world. Each year the East tightens its hold on every department of Texas life. Forty per cent of the ranch and farm land, settled and worked by the pioneers, is now mortgaged or owned in the East—which perhaps explains the large number of tenant farmers in the state.

The two legs on which Texas stands are agriculture and oil. But its oil will not last forever. Eminent geologists estimate that at the present rate of depletion Texas's oil reserve will be exhausted in twenty-five to fifty years. Only tiny fields have been discovered lately though the state has been thoroughly prospected. Meanwhile the enormous profits from existing wells go East. The oil industry is closely integrated and tightly controlled. Twenty big companies, with interlocking directorates and combined assets of more than $9,000,000,000, own and control over 60 per cent of the total investment in the oil industry. In 1939 these twenty companies produced over 52 per cent of all the United States crude oil and owned nearly 93 per cent of all crude-oil stocks. Control extends through the distribution system. The Interstate Commerce Commission estimated that in 1938 fourteen of the major companies owned 85 per cent of all the crude-oil pipe lines. The majors also dominate the refining of oil. In 1938 they owned 85 per cent of the cracking plants where gasoline is made.

These figures do not by any means reveal the present extent of monopoly control, which was growing even before Pearl Harbor and was materially increased by the war. When the great East Texas oil field was discovered in 1930, local people were in the picture. Independents had built 155 refineries by 1938. Then the inevitable happened. By 1941 the majors had forced out or purchased every one of them, with three exceptions.

Apologists for the oil companies like to tell Texans that they share in administering the oil industry through stock ownership. This does not hold up under scrutiny. The 100 largest stockholders of the Shell Oil Corporation owned nearly 90 per cent of the common stock in 1938. In the Sun Oil Company the figure was almost 85 per cent. Shell is owned by interests in Holland, England, and New York. Sun Oil is owned by the Pew family of Pennsylvania. Various well-known families, none of them Texan, have key holdings in other companies. The Harkness, Flagler, and Rockefeller families, for instance, have substantial interests in the six majors of the Standard Oil group; the Mellon family controls Gulf.

Even most of the so-called independents, though they still bear the names given them by their Texan founders, are now owned by out-of-state interests. Humble, the outstanding one, is a subsidiary of Standard Oil of New Jersey, which owns 71 per cent of its common stock. Magnolia is owned by

Standard of New York. The Texas Company has its headquarters in the Chrysler Building in New York. Most of its stockholders live outside the state of Texas.

Oil exerts worldwide political influence; it is therefore not surprising that in Texas politics oil is the most important single power. The Rockefellers, the Mellons, the Pews, and the other oil kings keep a close watch on their Texas province. If the state could get out of the clutches of the monopolists and their Regular henchmen and could levy an equitable tax on oil and other resources taken out of its soil, it could make life very different for its citizens. It could build and maintain the finest schools in the world. It could have modern hospitals in every county, fine highways and farm-to-market roads, parks, playgrounds, museums, and cultural centers. It might become first among the states instead of nearly the last in caring for its old people and its dependent children. The fight against the tyranny of monopoly is the fight for all this. The Rainey forces lost one battle in the war, but there are others who carry on.

The influence of labor, particularly of the C. I. O., is becoming stronger in East Texas. The middle classes are being stimulated by Minnie Fisher Cunningham, a leading Democrat, and her People's Legislative Committee, using the slogan "All Hands, Man Your Battle Stations." The students, particularly at the University of Texas, are engaging in vigorous political and social action, and the faculty, despite the onslaughts of the Regulars, has kept up its morale. Augmenting these progressive groups are able politicians, many of them young, and a growing number of business men.

These forces of the future face a tough job, which is symbolized in Dallas by the sign of the Flying Red Horse. Come into Dallas from any point of the compass, and you find that Standard Oil's team of flying red horses, revolving on top of the city's highest building, dominates the scene. Dallas and Texas live under that sign—literally.

Mr. Dalton and Mr. Micawber

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, April 18

THE British version of your Gallup Poll has just published the results of one of its periodical checks on the standing of Mr. Attlee and his government. The figures, in comparison with those of last December, are rather sensational. The proportion of the canvassed sample expressing dissatisfaction with Mr. Attlee's personal performance as Prime Minister has risen to 45 per cent, and the proportion dissatisfied with the record of the government in general has increased to 54 per cent. This represents a rise of 15 per cent and 12 per cent respectively in the adverse replies to the two questions asked. Since the poll was taken before the Conscription bill came up, the figures suggest a continuing and sizable swing against the government among the "floating" voters, who are so far not unduly impressed by the government's plans to get the country out of its economic mess, are not at all clear where Mr. Bevin's foreign policy is leading us, and are certain only that the cost of living—apart from subsidized basic food-stuffs—is rising disagreeably. For this they unreflectively blame the government.

It is questionable whether Mr. Dalton's second budget has increased the government's popularity. In his long speech in Parliament the Chancellor rather overdid his gratification at achieving a balanced budget so quickly after the war. The patient British taxpayer is indeed putting up a remarkable performance; and though the Treasury this year will be borrowing £460,000,000 to cover non-recurrent expenditure not charged against revenue—thus rather more than offsetting the nominal £270,000,000 surplus in the budget proper—Mr. Dalton is fairly entitled to claim that the nation is "out of the red" so far as its domestic finances, as distinct from its balance of foreign payments, are concerned. But this solvency is being achieved only by the continuance of a terrific impost on personal incomes.

It is true that increased income-tax allowances will somewhat relieve the burden on wage-earners and middle-bracket salaried employees. But offsetting this for the large proportion of the population addicted to nicotine is the punitive increase in the tobacco duties, which will cost every household continuing to smoke thirty cigarettes a day approximately £27 a year in extra taxation irrespective of their income. Here, say Mr. Dalton's critics, is regressive taxation with a vengeance; and though they freely grant that it is imperative for Britain to cut down dollar expenditure on tobacco, quite a few M. P.'s whose constituencies are in working-class areas feel that it would have been more equitable to impose a rationing system on cigarettes along the lines of that already in force for sweets. While this might have led to a black market in non-smokers' unused ration cards, the objections in principle to "rationing by the purse" are still weightier.

Certainly the current grumbles from smokers in the lower-income brackets are loud and are likely to be lasting. All except the well-to-do will probably have to cut down smoking drastically, and the penalizing of a pleasure which has become for many people an ingrained habit is bound to be unpopular. Among Labor M. P.'s, too, there is an uneasy feeling that though Mr. Dalton has shown no evidence of being disconcerted by the immense expenditure on defense, he is inclined to yield a little to the clamor of the opposition for economy in a direction which will hit the working class hardest. In the parliamentary debate which followed the presentation of the budget, Tory ex-Chancellor Sir John Anderson crystallized the view of the "men of property" by demanding not only a reduction in the taxation of large incomes but, even more emphatically, the curtailment of the subsidies—now costing £400,000,000 a year—spent in stabilizing the retail cost of certain basic foodstuffs. It is unlikely that Mr. Dalton will make any wholesale inroad into the subsidies, for if he did the resulting rise in the cost of living would lead immediately to a barrage of inconvenient claims by the trade unions for higher wages. There is a fear, however, that the government may intend to do a bit of financial juggling at the expense of the working-class larder. The present out-of-date cost-of-living index is to be replaced by a new one based upon typical working-class expenditure in 1938. But no attempt, apparently, is to be made to link the new index statistically with the old; and speaking of the food subsidies, Mr. Dalton held out hopes of saving a bit for the Treasury while still exercising what he described, somewhat vaguely, as "a strong stabilizing influence." How far this will differ from the maintenance of absolute stability remains to be seen.

In the "general public," then, there is a mental atmosphere of slightly uneasy disquiet which recalls in some ways that of the phony war in the winter of 1939-40. In that period, though Hitler's triumphant drive through the Low Countries and France was not foreseen with exactitude, an uncomfortable feeling prevailed that something unpleasant was going to happen some day. Today, though the man in the street has a very vague idea of the pattern events will take when the dollar loan runs out, he has an uncomfortable sense that the Maginot Line of his personal standard of living is not going to hold, and that disagreeable surprises are in store for him. He wishes that the government's steps toward meeting the crisis were less hesitant. He is not greatly impressed with this week's Cabinet reshuffle, the net effect of which is that the venerable Lord Pethick-Lawrence retires from the India Office on the eve of that department's final liquidation and the Cabinet is reinforced by the importation of a Liberal peer whose chief claim to fame is that he successfully organized the collection of charitable funds for Charing Cross Hospital and was a buddy of the late Lord Southwood of the Daily Herald. He observes, too, somewhat cynically, that when it comes to the practical difficulties of eliminating the present wasteful employment of a great deal of our limited labor force, the governmental action is cautious to the point of timidity. In a recent broadcast the Prime Minister urged individuals who felt that their present jobs were of poor economic service to the community to look for more productive work, a counsel of perfection which few people are in a position to follow. It had been hoped at least that the government would revive the war-time order to prevent employers recruiting additional labor for non-essential industry, but this is apparently not to be reenacted even in such a glaring case as that of the immense betting industry. It was announced this week that the government had simply sought and obtained a voluntary agreement with the managements of the football pools whereby they undertook not to engage further personnel unless recruits had been offered and had refused factory work.

An Impression by Oscar Berger
Hugh Dalton

What of the actual Rassemblement des Gauches—if one may borrow from France a political label which fits very well the congeries of radical trade-unionists, Social Democrats, and Marxists of which the British Labor movement is composed? Here the swing against Mr. Attlee and his government disclosed by the Gallup Poll is not manifest. The rank and file of the movement may be suffering a little from disenchantment, but if there were a general election this year, it would repeat its 1945 vote. Even the "rebels" in the Parliamentary Labor Party are still insistent that they want to bend, not break, the present Cabinet. Heartened by their success in inducing the government to make a hasty retreat on the Conscription bill and to shorten the period of compulsory service from eighteen months to twelve—a modification which will involve a considerable scaling down of British garrisons abroad—the left has found great encouragement in the enthusiastic reception given to the visit of Henry Wallace. His talks, cheered by immense audiences in London, Manchester, and Liverpool and given generous time on the air by the B. B. C., are regarded as having "put on the map" the cardinal idea of Richard Crossman and his parliamentary followers that Britain's role in foreign policy is to be an unaggressive foundation member of a One World club which the United States and Russia may join or not as they please.

Starry-eyed? Perhaps. Certainly the official British approval of the Truman Doctrine scarcely suggests that the Cabinet is at all disposed to follow the Wallace line. Moreover, the British Foreign Secretary is seen here as having been even more eager than Mr. Marshall at Moscow to "put the squeeze" on Russia. Such an impeccably anti-Communist journal as the Economist has been constrained to observe that the Anglo-American terms for agreement on the economic unity of the Reich—no reparations until Germany was self-supporting and had repaid the Western Allies' occupation costs—were bound to lead to deadlock at the conference.

British Socialists, however, are by no means dismayed by the fact that they have not yet weaned the Cabinet away from a foreign policy which may be described as one of "vassalliance" to the American Axis, or even by the slow formulation of a plan on positive Socialist lines to deal with the economic crisis. Hard facts, they think, will force the government's hand. Having no expectation that the Geneva conference will lead to any such expansion of multilateral foreign trade as would solve Britain's peculiar difficulties, they believe that shortage of dollars will compel the government willy-nilly to regulate Britain's foreign commerce increasingly through state control agencies, bulk purchase, and bilateral agreements with countries outside the dollar area. Equally, Socialists expect that stringency of external resources will act more forcibly than critical speeches in the House of Commons to restrain Mr. Bevin's imperialist proclivities. The only doubt felt is whether the Cabinet, without a substantial infiltration of new blood, will realize quickly enough that being unable to afford to do certain things constitutes only the negative side of policy: there are positive things to be done as well. It is not enough simply to require smokers to economize in dollars or even to decline the cost of active cooperation with American policies abroad; and it is certainly not enough to ask the British people vaguely to work harder under the threat of undefined, unpleasant consequences if they do not. Micawber, of course, could always claim that he had a policy; but if the really formidable task of reequipping Britain's industries and maintaining British standards of consumption is to be carried out, something much more resolute is required than the Micawber touch.

Backstage in the Persian Theater

BY ANDREW ROTH

Teheran, April 3

MOST of the spectators have left the Persian theater. On my way here I met reporters who had decided it was not worth while to stay after the pro-Soviet Azerbaijan autonomists collapsed under the pressure exerted by the central government backed by the British and Americans. They regarded me as someone arriving after the third-act curtain, but it is clear now that they left during an intermission.

World attention has been focused so intently on the acting of the major powers that little attention has been paid to the scenery or the Persian supernumeraries. Persia is equal in geographical extent to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy together; it is rich in land and oil resources; and it has only 15,000,000 inhabitants. The people are stuck deep in the muck of a feudal decay which offends even nostrils accustomed to the East. On top is a small handful of wealthy, educated, pleasure-loving aristocrats, usually absentee landlords owning scores of villages. Then comes a thin layer of middle-class tradesmen. Below are the illiterate, ragged, diseased, near-starving masses. Three-fourths of the Persian people are landless peasants living in villages which have scarcely changed in a thousand years; four-fifths of their crop goes to the landlord. Less than one village in fifty has a school, and almost none have any sanitary or medical facilities. The country as a whole is over 90 per cent illiterate.

Even Teheran, the showpiece of Persia, shocks the most hardened traveler. It has some fine public buildings, but the misery and degradation of its slums would tax the pen of a Gorki. A city of 700,000 inhabitants, Teheran has no water or sewage system. The well-to-do buy their water; others rely on that flowing through the open gutters, or jubes, along the pavement. My second day here I saw one man urinating in the jube while a short distance downstream another was washing his face in it. Little wonder that so many faces are scarred by "Bagdad boils" and other infectious diseases.

The few signs of modernization in Persia are largely the handiwork of the late Reza Shah, a nationalist general who overthrew the Qajar dynasty with British help in 1923, established his own family on the throne, and tried to bring the country up to date by brute force. He expanded rail, air, and road communications, started factories, and erected public buildings. He unified the country by disarming the tribesmen and jailing or poisoning many of their chiefs. As an assertion of nationalism he replaced the upstart name of Persia, an innovation dating back to 538 B.C., with the still older name of Iran. The new Shah's cupidity and despotism were revealed at every step. The land of whole provinces came into his possession. Thousands of liberals were jailed. At one time special police were stationed at every postal box, and it was illegal to mail a letter unless its contents were approved by the police.

But the curtain was rung down on Reza Shah's activities in 1941. When he lined up with the Axis, both the Russians and the British marched in, announcing it was only for the duration. Reza Shah was forced to abdicate in favor of his son, the present Shah, and died in exile.

THE TUDEH PARTY

The war and the Allied occupation accelerated the decay of Persian feudalism. Use of the country as the great supply route to Russia brought immense wealth to a few contractors, work for many laborers, and soaring business for merchants, though the majority of villagers suffered from shortages and skyrocketing prices. The influx of thousands of American, British, and Soviet soldiers made the people acquainted with mechanical equipment and Western living standards, gave them movies and magazines. Other forces for change were released when the ten thousand or so political prisoners were freed by the Allies. The most important of these prisoners were known as "the Fifty-three," an underground discussion group of professors and university students arrested in 1938. After obtaining their freedom, the Fifty-three founded the Tudeh (People's or Mass) Party. Even today the leadership of the party is drawn largely from socially conscious intellectuals of the middle and upper classes, many of them educated in France; only a minority are Marxist or Communist in outlook.

As the only pro-Allied group in a country whose upper classes were strongly pro-Nazi, Tudeh was at first encouraged not only by the Soviets but by the British, who supplied its organ, Mardom, with newsprint and other aid. But when the victories at El Alamein and Stalingrad dispelled the fear of a Nazi drive to the Middle East the British again made the safety of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, which is 52.51 per cent owned by the British government, their first consideration. The Abadan refinery, one of the biggest in the world, is the chief source of the British navy's fuel and the only producer of 120-octane fuel for British fighter planes. Thus when Tudeh-sponsored trade unions began organizing the workers, they met with strong opposition.

As the war wore on, Tudeh made increasing inroads among the educated youth, including army officers, and engaged in propaganda and health activities all over the country. To combat it General Arfa, the pro-British Chief of Staff, organized a fascistic "National Movement" ("God, King, and Country") with secret cells in the army. The government periodically banned Tudeh papers and dispersed party demonstrations. Political instability was so great that no Cabinet lasted more than four months.

At the end of the war the fluid political situation in Persia engaged the attention of both Russia and Britain. Kremlin policy called for encouragement for Tudeh generally and active support for the rebellious Kurds and Azerbaijani on the Soviet border. These minorities had longstanding complaints against the Persian central government and were expected to be useful to the Soviets if they received autonomy with Soviet help. The existence of an "advanced" pro-Soviet enclave, the Kremlin apparently believed, would be a radical force in Persian politics. In addition, the Kurds had kinsmen in Iraq and Turkey, and a pro-Soviet Kurdish national movement would strengthen Soviet influence throughout the Middle East. The Kremlin was probably misled as to the degree and character of pro-Soviet and nationalist feeling in the Soviet-occupied area by over-eager political officers on the spot—most of them Armenians, Kurds, and Azerbaijani from the Soviet side of the Caucasus border—who failed to discern that their informants were following the usual Middle Eastern tradition of saying what the listener wants to hear.

In August, 1945, Tudeh groups in Azerbaijan were absorbed into the broader Azerbaijan Democratic Party, and with active Soviet assistance a fast-moving campaign to organize autonomist sentiment was initiated. In November the Democrats began to seize military control. The occupying Soviet troops blocked reinforcements to the central-government garrisons, and most of them surrendered without resistance. By December 7 the Democrats had secured Tabriz. In January, 1946, the Kurds of western Azerbaijan set up a Kurdish People's Republic. The pro-British Hakimi government referred the problem to the U. N. and collapsed.

A PERSIAN MACHIAVELLI

Now a new and amazingly skilful Persian actor appeared on the stage. The wily Ahmad Qavam was a seventy-year-old aristocrat and rich landlord, but he was regarded kindly by Tudeh because he was anti-Shah, anti-militarist, and anti-British, and promised political tolerance. With Tudeh's help he scraped up enough votes to make him Premier. Once in office he jailed the pro-British ultra-rightists General Arfa and Saed Zia, allowed Tudeh to operate fairly freely, and entered into negotiations with Moscow. The British began to worry about their control of the Abadan oil fields.

Qavam was soon involved in a Machiavellian intrigue. While he played up to the Soviets and Tudeh, his ambassador, Hussein Ala, played up to the United States and the United Nations. His assistant, Prince Firooz, asserted Persia's undying friendship for Russia; Ambassador Ala denounced Soviet expansionism. When Qavam went to Moscow, his resistance to Soviet pressure was reinforced by Ala's statement that "in case Premier Qavam yields to Russian demands he will be forced to resign after his return from Moscow." And although Secretary Byrnes, and the Soviets too, cursed the Persians for their shiftiness, the game—known variously as le double jeu or "working both sides of the street"—succeeded: world opinion was mobilized, and the Soviets were forced to repair their incredible blunder in not withdrawing as promised. Furthermore, the United States had been drawn into the Persian tangle, giving Qavam a possible base of support against both the Russians and the British.

But although the Soviets had been pushed out and discredited, the Azerbaijani and Kurds were consolidating and demanding autonomy, and Tudeh was growing rapidly. Soon it reached a high of 200,000 members—1,000 students joined at one time—with over 300,000 in the Tudeh-linked trade unions. Almost 100,000 men, a third of the city's adult males, marched in last year's May Day parade in Teheran; in Abadan a Tudeh-supported union appeared above ground after having enrolled 80 per cent of the oil workers. When the strike broke out in the Abadan oil fields, British-supported tribal chieftains discussed the separation of the oil-bearing Khuzistan region from Iran. It appeared for the moment as if the country was disintegrating, with the north drawing into the Soviet sphere and the south into the British, as in the Anglo-Russian agreement of 1907.

Qavam bent with the wind. He compromised with the Azerbaijani by giving them a considerable measure of autonomy, pacified the British by getting the workers to return and later banning the union, and mollified Tudeh by taking it into the Cabinet. At the same time he began to build a platform for independent action. American advisers were attached to the army, police, and health and finance departments; Iranian Airways was organized with American army pilots; a $250,000,000 loan was requested.

Last fall Qavam began organizing his Democratic Party with the effectiveness of a Farley and the staging of a Goldwyn. He gave it a program much like Tudeh's and formed affiliated unions. Only party supporters could get government jobs—a weighty argument in a country with a population on the edge of starvation. Workers in government-owned factories were threatened with dismissal unless they tore up their Tudeh union cards and joined the new union sponsored by the Democrats. The Ministry of Propaganda and the state-owned radio were at the Democrats' disposal. A uniformed force, the "Liberation Guards," made street fighting and wrecking Tudeh headquarters its chief work. Once it became clear that the police and economic power of the state were against Tudeh and for the Democrats, the venal and the economically vulnerable changed band-wagons. By October Qavam felt strong enough to force the Tudeh members out of his Cabinet and to announce that elections would be held throughout the country.

Under the pretext of supervising the elections Qavam mobilized central-government troops on the border of Azerbaijan but did not dare move them in until he was sure of strong Anglo-American support and that the Soviets would not intervene. Mr. Molotov apparently promised Mr. Byrnes in New York to take no action, and the Soviet ambassador in Teheran demanded only that Mr. Qavam stick to his pledge to solve the problem "amicably." The Soviets evidently advised the Azerbaijani and Kurds not to fight. The Iranian army marched in unresisted and for two months carried on lootings and reprisals, including the sacking of twenty-five Assyrian Christian villages.

Elections were then held "according to plan." The methods of ballot-box stuffing were as intricate as a Persian carpet but as effective as Jersey City's best. In Teheran unknown party hacks were elected and well-known independents kept out. The first major task of the rubberstamp Parliament will be to consider the Soviet-Iranian oil agreement negotiated last April. Premier Qavam favors its ratification but, in line with American suggestions, so amended that the Soviets cannot use the concession as a base for political infiltration.

THE INTERMISSION

At the moment Premier Qavam is well upstage, surrounded by his Democratic Party henchmen and supported by the very able American ambassador. Somewhat to the right is the ambitious Shah, bracketed with the British ambassador. In the background Tudeh is licking its wounds and regretting its overdependence on Soviet assistance. A brilliant young Tudeh leader said to me, "Until December any free election would have put Tudeh in power legally. And with even a tenth of the support the Soviets gave the Azerbaijani, we could have taken power by force had we wanted to. But now we have to plan, organize, and educate our members to be ready even if it takes ten years."

A few days later I learned that a young Tudeh leader who had been arrested the week before was walking about freely. He had so successfully indoctrinated his poorly paid jailers that without any bribes they allowed him to leave jail whenever he pleased. With such a persuasive leadership, and with the condition of the people so wretched, it seems likely that Tudeh will be the chief force in Persia in less than a decade.

Francisco Franco: Dictator-Regent

IGNORING the protests of the Spanish Pretender, General Franco is going ahead with his plan to transform his Axis-spawned government into a permanent "kingdom" for Spain. The Bill of Succession which he recently submitted to the Cortes is the most cynical document of its kind in modern history. Compared with "Regent" Franco, Admiral Horthy, the former regent of Hungary, was an amateur. Under this unprecedented decree Franco can remain in power as long as he wishes, enjoying all the prerogatives of a king and dictator; should he decide to take a protracted vacation, he can name a prince of his own choosing to occupy his post for a few years.

The Council of the Kingdom, which is to "assist" him in putting across this fantastic comedy, will also be designated by the Caudillo; it will include the Cardinal Primate, or the leading Archbishop in case the Primacy is vacant; the general who heads the High General Staff, or, if there is none, the ranking officer of the Chiefs of Staff of the Land, Air, and Sea Forces; and half a dozen assorted functionaries and members of Parliament. Were he still alive Ramón del Valle-Inclán, who was famous for his satires on the Bourbon king and the generals, could surely find material here for one of his most biting esperpentos.

But however ridiculous the plan may sound, its political significance should not be minimized. Obviously it means that Franco intends to consolidate the Falangist dictatorship and stay in office for the rest of his life. Still more important, it indicates that the Spanish ruler is fully convinced that he can rely on the continued support of Great Britain and the United States. In Paris I talked with a Latin American diplomat who had been in Madrid since 1945. He told me that if in the past two years Britain and America had once given a sign that they really wanted Franco out, the generals would have forced his resignation overnight without a fight. But the army was convinced that Anglo-American policy favored keeping him in the saddle, an impression that has become all the stronger with the new turn in American foreign policy.

Americans who have any doubts on this score need only read the comment made the other day in Lisbon by Gil Robles, exiled leader of the Spanish clerical fascists. Commenting on the succession bill, he said: "After President Truman's speech, Franco saw that his moment had arrived. He interpreted the speech as a sign that the Anglo-Saxon countries have seen the force and reason of General Franco's policy during his spell of power." Otherwise, it is evident, Franco would never have dared advance a plan which is an out-and-out mockery of the resolution adopted by the United Nations Assembly.

The Spanish dictator is justified in assuming that London and Washington have no objection to his holding the reins of power indefinitely. The announcement of the new decree provoked only mild disapproval from the Foreign Office and the State Department. And Britain's gentle rebuke was more than counterbalanced by the signing of a monetary agreement with Spain that will, the London Observer predicts, "clear the decks for brisk Anglo-Spanish trade." Moreover, American firms which a year ago were being cautioned semi-officially against dealing with Spain on the ground of the regime's instability have now been given the green light. As for the reaction of the Spanish people to the Christian General's new trade deals, Dr. Francis B. McMahon, the liberal Catholic writer who was recently expelled from Spain, reported in the New York Post on April 21: "They [the Spaniards] accuse Anglo-Saxon business men and financiers of profiteering at the expense of their misery. They contrast this with the fact that whatever else Russia may be doing, at least it is not doing business with the Franco regime today. They are beginning to wonder just who is the friend and who is the enemy."

Francisco's latest move has had its repercussions in Republican quarters. If there was any excuse last February for choosing Señor Llopiés to head the new government in exile, it was the assumption of certain Spanish Republicans—an assumption I never shared—that the anti-Communist, anti-Soviet Prietist faction which Llopiés represented had a greater chance of success with Bevin than the Giral Cabinet, labeled "red" the moment Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Rumania recognized it. On the invitation of the British Labor Party Señor Llopiés undertook a visit to London a few weeks ago, only to find himself in the embarrassing position of seeing the new monetary agreement with Franco signed almost under his very nose. He returned to Paris extremely irritated, and an official statement issued after a pathetic Cabinet meeting complained that "those who had encouraged us by their words disappointed us by their deeds."

To those of us who have always maintained that only combined internal and external pressure will oust Franco, the latest developments have come as no surprise. We have never believed in the ability of the royalist clique to force concessions from the Dictator. Perhaps the Bill of Succession will serve a useful purpose after all, if only in demonstrating to the outside world the weakness of the Spanish monarchists. If Don Juan's followers had any mass influence, Franco would have thought twice before launching his new scheme. As for Prieto's policy of watchful waiting, in the expectation of an Anglo-American Badoglio solution, it no longer has a leg to stand on; two years of praying for a miracle from London have served only to strengthen Franco's hand and to sow confusion and demoralization in the Republican ranks.

But the Resistance reacted quickly against these defeatist maneuvers. On the very day after Llopiés named his "Cabinet of Liquidation" a group of Spanish Republicans in Paris formed España Combatiente—Fighting Spain—for the purpose of rallying Spaniards of all parties who are prepared to continue the struggle for the liberation of Spain and the reconstitution of the Republic. The new organization is growing fast and is bringing together Republicans in Spain, in France, and in Latin America.

DEL VAYO

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

"Fair Trade" for Whom?

THE New York Herald Tribune, telling the story of Newburyport's anti-inflation campaign, wrote: "The prices of everything, from food and clothing to luxuries, were slashed here. The only exception were items whose prices are fixed by fair-trade regulations." I have italicized the sentence which seems to me to stick out in the story like a sore thumb, just as the price labels on those "fair-traded" goods must have stuck out in the Newburyport stores. It is a reminder of the way the anti-monopoly laws have been undermined in recent years by laws in forty-five states which allow manufacturers to fix and maintain the resale prices of their products and by the federal Miller-Tydings act, which exempts from anti-trust prosecution price-maintenance agreements made in conformity with such state legislation.

The so-called fair-trade laws now apply throughout the country except in Texas, Missouri, Vermont, and the District of Columbia. While varying in details, they provide in general (a) that protected merchandise must be trade-marked and in free and open competition with commodities of the same character, (b) that distributors who do not themselves contract to charge designated resale prices are nevertheless bound to conform if duly notified that the article in question has been covered in their state by a price-maintenance agreement. A contract between the manufacturer and a single merchant is enough to bind all in the trade.

As repeated efforts to reach by telephone the American Fair Trade Council—an organization of manufacturers who maintain "fair-trade prices"—have been unsuccessful, I am unable to give up-to-the-minute data on the range of commodities covered by these laws. The latest issue of the council's journal, the Fair Trader, points with pride, however, to the fact that in New York State some 85 per cent of all drugs, cosmetics, and allied drugstore products—35,000 items in all—are protected. This probably is the branch of business in which "fair-trading" has made most headway. It is, of course, also a branch of business in which prices frequently have little relation to costs and in which retail margins are often very large. Consequently, before the passage of the fair-trade laws it was very attractive to cut-price concerns.

The economist for a large department store tells me that of the whole range of merchandise in which his firm deals probably not more than 10 per cent is subject to price-maintenance contracts. The proportion is high, however, in such lines as household equipment, photographic apparatus, and liquor. But new products are constantly being added to the list, and the approach of a "buyers' market" is accelerating the trend. Last year membership of the American Fair Trade Council tripled, and according to the Wall Street Journal, a week after President Truman's price-decontrol speech on November 9 it received inquiries from fifty manufacturers who wanted to get in position to head off future price-cutting at the retail level. The Journal of Commerce of April 23, in the midst of all the news about efforts to reduce prices, reported that "Ohio's food industry will seek to cushion the impact of a return to sharply competitive sales at the retail level through a revival and broadening of the fair-trade program" (my italics). An even choicer example of fair-trade semantics was supplied by John W. Anderson, president of the Fair Trade Council, in an interview with Printers' Ink last fall. Price-maintenance contracts, he said, "provide fortifications against such temporary fluctuations in the buying psychology of the public as the buyers' strike now predicted in so many quarters." I wonder when Mr. Anderson and his friends are going to awaken to the fact that consumers' resistance to high prices is neither temporary nor temperamental; it is due to the hard economic fact of reduced purchasing power.

I would not deny that there is a case to be made for protecting retailers from destructive price competition. Undoubtedly under a free pricing system unscrupulous merchants sometimes attempt to knock out their competitors by under-cutting and so establish a monopoly. Occasionally the reputation of a manufacturer's product is seriously damaged when retailers sell it below cost as a "loss leader" and give the public the impression that it is worth much less than its normal price. But the fair-traders spoil their case by violently overstating it. They take no notice of the fact that efficient and alert retailers may be able to make savings in their overheads which they can pass on to the public by trimming prices a little. The fair-traders attack all competition at the retail level as "unrestrained price war" and accuse all price-cutters of aiming at "monopoly." (Incidentally, they don't use the term "price-cutting," because it has a favorable connotation for the consumer; instead, they have coined the word "price-baiting" in the hope of convincing housewives that when they fall for a bargain they are really being lured to destruction.)

The lengths to which the fair-traders carry their propaganda is illustrated by a speech delivered by Mr. Anderson on November 26, 1946, when he sought to identify the opposition to fair trade with communism. Considering that the fair-trade laws have been criticized by the N. A. M., the heads of many of our largest retail businesses, and the Wall Street Journal—just to mention a few "old Bolsheviks"—this may seem merely funny.

It is rather horrifying, though, that the spokesman for an organization of reputable business men should rely on cheap rhetorical tricks instead of attempting to meet soberly the arguments against fair-trade laws. Is it or is it not the case that such legislation makes for rigidities in the price system and so tends to lessen the efficiency of the free market which is the foundation of free enterprise? Is it or is it not true that in a period like the present fair-trade laws make for frozen inventories and so help to slow down trade generally? Is it or is it not true, as Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge has alleged, that the fair-trade laws have proved "a cloak for price-fixing activities between competitors"? These are questions which deserve an answer.

The Critical Year

THE YEAR OF STALINGRAD. By Alexander Werth. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

THE historians who ultimately work out the explanation of why Adolf Hitler's Russian gamble failed will owe a heavy debt to Alexander Werth. Again and again they will return to the sensitive, thoughtful, and revealing record which Werth has kept of the war years in Russia.

Better contemporary records of what happened inside Russia between June 22, 1941, and the victory over Germany may exist. It may well be that the Politburo, for example, has kept stenographic reports of all its deliberations. An official reporter may have jotted down notes of all the meetings of the Russian high command and the Supreme Defense Council. What used to be known as the Council of People's Commissars may have kept a verbatim journal of its proceedings. But such revealing documents are not likely to see the light of day in our time.

Until they are available Werth's journals will remain a primary source of material as to what actually happened in Russia during World War II—what the people thought about the cataclysmic events which enveloped them, what official propaganda lines were adopted by the government to meet the frequently surprising developments, how the Red Army shaped itself in the crucible of battle, and what actually happened in the most stupendous military encounters of our time.

Werth's most recent volume, "The Year of Stalingrad," covers the period from May, 1942, to February, 1943, roughly speaking the second most critical period of the war—the most critical obviously was the autumn of 1941, when the Germans got their tanks into the suburbs of Moscow.

"The Year of Stalingrad" is an amorphous work, almost literally a hodgepodge. Werth has tried to do three things at the same time: to present a record of the intricate and most revealing shifts in the government propaganda line, to tell how the plain people of Russia reacted both to the propaganda and to the war developments, and, most important, to set down a fairly definitive military history of the war.

The burden of these tasks is too much. What he presents is the working draft of a study rather than a finished product. No one with editorial instincts can read "The Year of Stalingrad" without reaching for a pencil. But the very elements which make the book formidable for the general reader make it a joy to the student. Where else would you find notes about the effects of the loss of Rostov upon the programs of the Soviet ballet juxtaposed to careful interviews with Soviet military students on the successful strategy employed at Stalingrad?

Appropriately Werth concentrates his efforts on Stalingrad. He provides a wealth of detail and analysis of this epic battle which never before has been available, publicly, even in Moscow. In addition to translating restricted Soviet studies of the battle he has interviewed personally some of the chief Soviet military students of the campaign. In the field of both tactics and strategy Werth has obtained remarkable material, none possibly more revealing than that concerning the lightning transformation of the Red Army in July, 1942, after the loss of Rostov.

Rostov's fall, Werth is convinced, was as much due to panic among Red Army commanders and Soviet executives as to German military genius. It was not the first such event in the Russo-German war. Panic, he makes plain, hit Moscow itself on October 16, 1941, and almost resulted in the fall of the Soviet capital—an event which might well have turned the course of the war. And although he does not mention it, there had been panic in the Ukraine and, what was equally bad, faulty tactics as well, which led to the fall of Kiev and the virtual destruction of the southern group of Russian armies.

But Rostov was the critical example. Werth has not been able to get all the facts, but he is able to report that there was a thoroughgoing purge of the Soviet officer corps. Soon the institution of the political commissars was abolished. Heavy emphasis was laid on discipline, respect for the superior officer, obedience to orders. At the same time there were vigorous attacks on outmoded tactics derived from the civil war and perpetuated by stupid leadership. The Russians faced the challenge presented by the realization that ineptitude, backwardness, and fear had cost them Rostov and allowed the Germans to enter the Caucasus and Kuban. And they met the challenge by forging the victory of Stalingrad, which finally convinced the average Russian that Germany could be beaten.

For anyone interested in going beyond the headlines, in knowing what really happened in Russia during a critical year of the war, this book by Mr. Werth, who is, of course, no stranger to readers of The Nation, is indispensable. HARRISON SALISBURY

Le Corbusier, Revivalist

WHEN THE CATHEDRALS WERE WHITE. By Le Corbusier. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

AS THOUGH the world had shaken off the rags of its antiquity, to clothe itself anew with a white mantle of churches. . . . The glorious words of Raoul Glaber (circa 1050) are the keynote of Le Corbusier's message. The Renaissance of the eleventh century was the major one. Men of burning faith feel the same exhilaration today. This could be, and in spite of our tragic confusion this is, one of the springtimes of the world.

This hope and this joy Le Corbusier translates into architectural and city-planning terms, since fate, unfortunately perhaps, has made him an architect. He is the declared enemy of the schools and academies, guardians of conformity, good taste, tradition. And he came to America as to the land of promise, where men, unhampered, dared to live in the twentieth century.

His verdict is qualified. New York at first enchanted him: the skyscrapers because they were "romantic," the gridiron plan because it was stark, logical, functional. Disappointment did not destroy his sympathy. He is no Duhamel. He is indulgent even for our College Gothic. He does not rub it in that the Grand Central is Beaux Arts and the Pennsylvania Roman. He likes us. But he fumes because we are not American enough. The skyscrapers are too small. The Americans are timid people.

It is faint-heartedness that hampers us, not the profit motive—although he denounces that roundly enough. Enlightened selfishness would tear down the whole of Manhattan and rebuild it at a profit, for six million people. While the population of the island would be nearly tripled, the free area would be 88 per cent. We might even say 100 per cent, since the buildings would be raised on pillars.

I doubt whether six million people living in Manhattan would be a remedy for overcrowding. Even if well-spaced skyscrapers were an improvement upon our present chaos, it would be merely a palliative to the incurable disease called New York. A society as intelligent as Le Corbusier would simply not have any such macropolis as New York or Chicago.

The one great hymn of praise in the book is to Negro music. Le Corbusier might be defined as a revivalist with a jazz band. His conception of culture is "folklore and the machine." An admirable formula for barbarism. It is Hitler's: the folk soul and robot bombs. Those people would drive me back to Garnier's Opéra. But the book is ardent, shrewd, and witty—Le Corbusier's best, and the most tonic for us. As a prophet, he is stirring. As a city planner, he gave himself two permanent black eyes with his Voisin Plan for Paris: the ruthless destruction of all historical values. The great builders in Glaber's time were not nihilists. As Le Corbusier himself notes, they worked in the Romanesque, a bold and free handling of the Roman tradition; from the Romanesque of Caen or Vezelay to the Gothic of St. Denis or Paris there was a gradual evolution. "When the cathedrals were white," they implied no break with the past.

Le Corbusier is a stirring preacher: as an architect, he remains a dogmatist.

His buildings are angry fists shaken in the face of the Beaux Arts: in this particular respect they are highly functional. But they are devoid of either charm or power: he is no Saarinen, no Frank Lloyd Wright. Still, the book is delightful. It deserves a wider audience than Ayn Rand's; for it has all the "philosophy" of "The Fountainhead" without the melodrama and eroticism.

ALBERT GUERARD

Dissenting Opinion

SECRET MISSIONS. The Story of an Intelligence Officer. By Ellis M. Zacharias. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.75.

CAPTAIN ZACHARIAS is probably the navy's outstanding intelligence officer and certainly its foremost authority on psychological warfare. His book is important because of the evidence he adduces and the conclusions he comes to in his discussion of two much-debated issues—the predictability of the attack on Pearl Harbor and the imminence of the Japanese surrender when the decision was made to use the atom bomb.

His candor is refreshing and surprising, considering that Captain Zacharias is no psychological warrior or socialite G-2 or O. N. I. reserve officer but a regular from Annapolis, and that while his principal service interest has been Intelligence, he has had numerous line assignments, including, among others, the command of the heavy cruiser Salt Lake City, one of the little task force which, under Admiral Halsey, raided the Gilberts and Marshalls in our first major offensive against the Japanese.

Captain Zacharias's views on Pearl Harbor are, in part, known from his testimony before the Congressional committee investigating this disaster. Behind the tragedy of Pearl Harbor, he says, was the inadequacy of our Intelligence Service, the proverbial stepchild of both the army and the navy. The immediate reason was the failure of the local commander, Admiral Kimmel, to evaluate the intelligence available, and the similar failure of the high command in Washington to issue specific instructions based on this intelligence. Captain Zacharias further bluntly charges that both the local and high command failed to consult the opinion of those best qualified to know what the Japanese might do under the circumstances. This charge has occasioned some criticism of the author as lacking in modesty, since it is apparent that Captain Zacharias regards himself as one of those who should have been consulted. The answer to this criticism is to be found not only in the fact that the subject is not one for false modesty, but also in the circumstance that Captain Zacharias's record undoubtedly qualifies him to speak as an expert in Japanese psychology and tactics.

He was first sent to Japan in 1920 by the Office of Naval Intelligence, at a time when only one officer of the entire navy could speak Japanese. Since then, and until the closing days of the war, when he broadcast in Japanese to Japan as the official spokesman of our government, he has made a specialty of matters Japanese. Not the least impressive evidence of his extraordinary capacities in this field is the fact that in March, 1941, several months prior to the outbreak of the war, he personally warned Admiral Kimmel at fleet headquarters in Hawaii of his "conviction that if Japan decided on war with us, she would open hostilities with an air attack on our fleet without a declaration of war, on a week-end, and probably on a Sunday morning, by launching planes from carriers. . . ."

Perhaps more debatable is his second thesis that Japan was ready to surrender unconditionally before the dropping of the two atom bombs. It is his feeling that we should have given Japan a little more time to consider and respond to the Potsdam Declaration, since the Japanese habitually require time to arrive at decisions. Here, too, he charges in effect that people like himself who were experts in Japanese psychology were not consulted. Considering the moral problem involved in the dropping of the two bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, this is a very serious statement indeed, and one which must be evaluated in the light of the recent declaration by former Secretary Stimson that the dropping of the bombs was necessary in order to insure the surrender of Japan, avoid an invasion, and save countless American lives.

Captain Zacharias was recently retired with the rank of Rear Admiral. It seems strange, in view of our present pressing need for an adequate intelligence system as a guide to our foreign policy in the troubled post-war world, that both he and General Donovan, our two foremost intelligence officers, should be put out to pasture. One suspects, without knowing, that in both cases Barkis is willing.

ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG

A Limited Device

GENTLEMAN'S AGREEMENT. By Laura Z. Hobson. Simon and Schuster. $2.75.

IN THIS novel concerning a writer, Philip Schuyler Green, who lays aside his unimpeachable Episcopalian antecedents to become for a time a Jew the whole question of art and propaganda again rears its tired head. Green's fiancée, Kathy, hears his voice reproaching her condescending pity toward two Jewesses: "... if they'd been two Irish Catholic girls, all you'd have thought would have been how vulgar all that make-up is in sport clothes." If Mrs. Hobson's book were concerned with any less frightening theme than anti-Semitism, there would be no reason for a serious consideration of this piece of journalistic enterprise.

For Phil Green is a typical Ladies' Home Journal hero—tall, lean, with a touch of gray at the temples and a sensitive reserve concealing his true virility—a vigor represented in bed as well as at the typewriter, his creator carefully points out. With its 3,000,000 circulation and serialized fiction dealing in "countesses, young dukes, and American society folk" Smith's Weekly Magazine bears no resemblance to any liberal periodical extant or defunct. The series of articles based on this "journalistic stunt"—Green's own term on one occasion—is sensationally entitled in the best true-confessions tradition "I Was Jewish for Eight Weeks." In these gaucheries, in the conventionally unconventional love affair, in the ingenious "happy ending," commercial fiction is typified.

But one cannot deny to "Gentleman's Agreement" its status as an exposé. Philip Green is motivated by an indignation intensified through the brutal insults he suffers as a Jew. The crassness of prejudice faces him when a restricted hotel refuses him a room; the anguish of his own impotence strikes him when his child is savagely tormented. The more insidious aspects of anti-Semitism are reflected in the latent philistinism of Elaine Wales, born Estelle Walovsky. Yet it is the emaculated liberalism of Kathy's genteel distaste for fanaticism, directed against or in behalf of the Jew, which is most excoriated.

Mrs. Hobson's treatment is, of course, a delimitation of the problem. The situation is not quite comparable to that of the miners and California Okies with whom Green has earlier identified himself. In the latter cases the issue is primarily one of economic injustice; in the former it is essentially a question of a chaotic moral order obsessed with an infantile need for reassurance, conscious of an inner weakness which must manifest itself in a perverted assertion of power. It is here that one finds the whole ethical basis of this novel questionable. Perhaps one can in the terms of propaganda consider the topical and the circumstantial. One can scarcely explore human nature and human values within the dimensions of an illustrated pamphlet. To make such an attempt is to distort and to cheapen—especially when the means is so contrived a device as Philip Green's masquerade.

JOAN GRIFFITHS

A Founder of Contemporary Liberalism

AN INTRODUCTION TO PEIRCE'S PHILOSOPHY, INTERPRETED AS A SYSTEM. By James Feibleman. Harper and Brothers. $5.

CHARLES S. PEIRCE has often been judged perhaps the most original philosophical mind this country has produced. There can certainly be no doubt that Peirce's thought must receive prominent mention in any competent account of the origins of contemporary liberalism. Influential thinkers like William James and John Dewey, whose ideas have entered into the substance of current convictions, have called attention to the heavy intellectual debt they owe him. Yet Peirce was hardly more than a name to most of his contemporaries—he died in 1914 at the age of seventy-five—little read even by professional philosophers; and only relatively recently, subsequent to the publication of the first six volumes of his "Collected Papers" some dozen years ago, has he begun to receive the notice that he undoubtedly merits.

There are many reasons for the comparative neglect Peirce has suffered. The essays he published during his life, though some of them are eminently readable and were the inspiration for significant developments in philosophy, were chiefly concerned with apparently remote issues in logic and scientific method. They were also mere fragments from a comprehensive philosophical system with whose articulation Peirce was endlessly engaged; but he was unable, whether because of temperament or circumstance, to present his ideas in a coherent, intelligible form. His views on many fundamental questions were not always conspicuous for their clarity, nor were they always easily reconcilable with one another; and he himself admitted that no human being, not even himself, could put together his voluminous unpublished writings into a consistent whole. Except for a brief period Peirce was never connected with a university, in large measure because his marital affairs shocked the academic conventions of his day: he was thus denied the security and the discipline to organize his ideas so as to make them available to ordinary men. He was an intellectual maverick, and the isolation that was forced upon him accentuated his tendency to express his thought in unfamiliar ways. He therefore appeared to be more revolutionary in his philosophy than he actually was, and to be simply wilful in rejecting the hallowed dogmas of what passed for sound philosophy. A thinker operating under such handicaps is usually doomed to utter oblivion; Peirce was fortunately saved from such a fate.

Peirce's greatest influence, and in the judgment of many competent students his most substantial contribution, has been in the fields of logic and the philosophy of science. His papers in mathematical logic were an important stimulus to the development of a branch of formal studies at present undergoing intensive cultivation; and they were also instrumental in liberating prominent thinkers from the conception of nature associated with the traditional doctrine of the syllogism. However, Peirce's concern with formal principles of reasoning was only a part of his attempt to develop a theory of knowledge that would be adequate to the requirements of modern experimental science. He attacked vigorously the use of authority, revelation, and appeals to self-evidence as ways for establishing responsible beliefs. He espoused the method of science for resolving problems in all domains of human concern, and he was eager to defend this method against all adversaries, like a knight his fair lady whom he has chosen from all the world. Nevertheless, he recognized that even the best method for obtaining genuine knowledge does not yield infallible conclusions: he viewed science not as a body of fixed dogmas but as the exercise of a method which constantly criticizes and corrects its own findings.

Peirce attempted to bridge the traditional chasm that isolated human reason from the rest of nature. He repeatedly called attention to the continuities that exist between intellectual and physical operations, and he spared no pains in exhibiting the objective basis upon which valid reasoning rests. Long before the current interest in semantic analysis became a fashion, he recognized the central role that symbols play in the life of man. Indeed, few recent writings on semantics are as rewarding reading as Peirce's discussion of the ways in which our language and our ideas may be made clear. According to him, the meaning of any symbol consists in the practical effects which the object of the symbol may have; and in consequence, the import of our ideas and actions must be viewed in the light of their effects upon the community of mankind. Peirce was thus a founder of pragmatism and a forerunner of contemporary positivism, but he also helped to forge the logical tools for a liberal social philosophy that is not committed to the preconceptions of nineteenth-century atomic individualism.

Peirce's general philosophy was inclusive enough to embrace an evolutionary cosmology. He had the requisite knowledge as well as daring to challenge the deterministic conception of nature that was the orthodoxy of his day, maintaining that the laws which the sciences discover express only statistical regularities. Absolute chance and spontaneous variation were thus taken by him as irreducible features of the world. However, he rejected the view that general laws are nothing but convenient mental fictions, useful bookkeeping devices for bringing into order our sense impressions. On the contrary, he regarded general laws as formulations of the habits that things had acquired in the process of growth and development from an original chaos characterized by protean variety. The reality of chance, the tendency in things to form more or less fixed habits, and the progressive subjection of the primal chaos to general laws are thus the three central themes around which all of Peirce's thought revolves. He wrote philosophy in the grand manner, and there is much in him that makes him akin to Plotinus, Schelling, and Hegel. But although he is almost always suggestive and provocative, his speculative flights are of doubtful permanent value. On these as well as on other matters he wrote with assurance, but he also wrote cryptically; so that he can often be read to mean everything to all men.

Mr. Feibleman's volume is the first large-scale attempt to exhibit Peirce's ideas in systematic form, and to interpret all phases of Peirce's thought in terms of the latter's grandiose metaphysics. The chief value of the book consists in its bringing together, largely through quotations and paraphrases, Peirce's views on all the subjects upon which he had reflected. There is no attempt to evaluate critically Peirce's contributions, and as much space is devoted to expounding what is at best Peirce's fanciful speculations as his unquestionably substantial analyses. Mr. Feibleman's exposition is controlled by the assumption that Peirce was a consistent thinker and that his writings can be given an unambiguous interpretation. Mr. Feibleman is something less than successful in establishing this assumption, and indeed a more critical reading of Peirce than Mr. Feibleman has apparently made shows why he was foredoomed to failure. He writes in the conviction that the salvation of modern society depends on the adoption of a sound philosophy, and he does not con-veal his belief that such a philosophy must be a species of Platonic realism. It is perhaps for this reason that he shows little understanding for features in Peirce's thought that cannot be made compatible with an extreme realism. Attempts such as Mr. Feibleman's to win assent to Peirce's philosophy in an all-or-nothing fashion, and to rivet everything in Peirce to his speculative metaphysics, are not doing service to what is vital and permanently valuable in Peirce's thought.

Militants and Realists

ACTION FOR UNITY. By Goodwin Watson. Harper and Brothers, $2.

SINCE the race riots of midsummer, 1943, a bewildering variety of organizations with a bewildering variety of programs have been established to improve group relations in the United States. Incoherent and unorganized as this movement has been, it nevertheless represents the most significant attempt to apply the democratic process in group relations that has yet arisen in this country. Goodwin Watson has performed, therefore, a real public service in this first effort to describe and evaluate what has actually been happening. He describes the particular approach of each action pattern, appraises its effectiveness, suggests possible limitations, and indicates the need for further research. Clear, precise, compact, his study is most skillfully organized. Of primary interest to persons working in the field of race relations, it also has a larger interest as a study of democracy in action. No one who has attempted to invoke the democratic process in even the most simple form of community organization can fail to appreciate his pointed discussion of some of the major problems involved. The basic need in all such efforts is to induce the "action" people and the "prestige" people to work together. While Dr. Watson does not offer a definite solution of this perennial difficulty, he has a clear recognition of the importance of militancy. "A handful of militants can win more publicity and arouse more apprehension in public officials than the 90 per cent who go along smoothly enough with what ever is or is not done." As one who has been bruised and battered in the endless fighting between "militants" and "realists," I read Dr. Watson's comments on this issue with the avidity of a veteran reading an account of the engagements in which he has participated.

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

The Disadvantages of Respectability

FATHER OF THE MAN. How Your Child Gets His Personality. By W. Allison Davis and Robert J. Havighurst. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

THIS book is a discussion, on a popular level, of the personality differences and maladjustments of children, especially siblings. The authors are two University of Chicago sociologists who are primarily concerned with comparing the effects of varying cultural requirements on the character development of young children in different segments of our society. The role of the subconscious in determining personality, while not wholly evaded, is generally relegated to a subordinate position. (Dr. Helen Ross, an analyst, contributes a brief chapter on the child's necessity for identification with one parent, and an even briefer appendix that describes her use of play therapy as a research method.) Care is taken at every point to mention the importance of "emotional relationships" in the shaping of character; yet emphasis is laid at all times on the significance of "social relations" and cultural pressures exerted on the child to adapt himself to the habits and institutions of the social stratum into which he is born.

Four children of two families are examined in detail, although the authors' conclusions are based on case studies of more than two hundred families. All the children are girls; two are Negroes belonging to the lowest income group, two are daughters of a professional man with a relatively high income. The ages of the worker's children are six and eight years; the upper-middle-class girls are both adolescents. This disparity is contrived to demonstrate the advantages and disadvantages of two opposing sets of familial and societal restraints within a single culture in terms of growth of personality. As might be expected, the children belonging to the highest income group show the greatest respect for property and the canons of respectability, and this integration is achieved at the cost of extensive ego-frustration. Middle-class mothers breast-feed their babies too seldom, wean and toilet-train them too soon, thwart their explorative tendencies with pens and walkers. Slum children are trained less rigorously, have greater freedom, more chance for self-expression. This comparison is used as a device to make the reader aware of the deficiencies of middle-class child rearing. However, a serious synthesis of cultural and psychological factors in child growth is not attempted. More case histories, a less episodic treatment of the cases presented, a choice of children at the same age level, a greater sampling of equivalent institutions in a primitive culture would have made a better book.

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

DECIDEDLY, painting is now in a situation that forces it to live on accumulated reserves. Not a single important new impulse has manifested itself since cubism and abstract post-cubist art, Kandinsky, Klee, and Mondrian laid down positions almost thirty years ago that ambitious painting today has not succeeded in extending save in isolated and therefore minor instances. Painting has had in the interim to content itself with intensifying its occupation of territory conquered long since.

Marc Chagall, one of the best results if not prime movers of the revolution that is the School of Paris, is a case in point. The substance of his art has shrunk progressively during the last twenty-five years. After becoming one of the most pungent and personal of all twentieth-century artists between 1910 and 1920, he has failed almost absolutely since then to add anything to himself beyond Frenchified refinement and a more hedonistic sensuousness. Not that he does not still betray twinges of ambition, but these very twinges serve now only to disorganize his work. Chagall's recent show at the Matisse Gallery makes it clear that today he has to keep his aims modest in order to produce successful pictures—compromised though these successes may be by their lack of seriousness or weight. Some of the thirteen gouaches Chagall has turned out as illustrations for "A Thousand and One Nights" are felicitous, but it is the felicity of prettiness. And his oils, which are quieter and more fulfilled than most of his recent ones, escape prettiness not because of the heavier medium but simply because of his permanent difficulty in unifying his canvases—present even in such obviously well-painted works as "The Red Rooster," the "Resurrection," and the "Madonna of the Village." (It is curious how Chagall's original gaucherie persists no matter how syrupy his painting becomes.)

In the final analysis this art lacks an extreme, even the extreme of control. Chagall has no longer enough to say to fill out his style, which is left without strains or tensions. He was never an independent, self-fructifying master like Matisse, and the present deliquescence of his art reflects, precisely, the decay of the movement that quickened and nourished him in the beginning. It is Chagall's tragedy that he has never had much more than his genius.

The latest annual show of the American Abstract Artists makes in its own quite different way the same point as Chagall. Here the hand of the past descends more heavily because none of the thirty-seven artists represented can quite boast a temperament. Some of them have an abundance of vitality, at least of a mechanical kind, but nowhere does it break through the canonical modes of the School of Paris to assert a new independent personality—or an idea. Witness only the show of fruitless energy made by such painters as Judith Rothschild and Perle Fine. Of all the people present Fannie Hillsmith and Maurice Golubov, both of whom used to take from Klee but now appear to have parted company with him, demonstrate the most valid native talent, grasp the identity of a picture most instinctively, but both confine themselves to slight effects, effects they get without forcing. And the same can be said of the other painters who show respectable works at this show: Maurice Berezov, Eleanor de Laitre, Irving Lehman, A. D. Reinhardt, Max Spivak, and the sculptor Harold Krisel. Not one is bold, extravagant, pertinacious, or obsessed. Like American poets and critics, they are mortally afraid of making fools of themselves. Politeness covers all.

The League of Present Day Artists, whose thirty-odd members showed recently at the Argent Galleries, are not so polite by half, but small good it does them. If the A. A. A. are like the Kenyon and Sewanee Reviews, the league is like Kenneth Patchen and Henry Miller in his so frequent off moments (I assume my readers are more familiar with literature than with art). Nothing sinks so low as revolt for the sake of revolt—especially when the opposition has succumbed decades ago. The A. A. A. takes off at least from cubism, whereas the League of Present Day Artists begins from—Vlaminck, Rouault, Franz Marc, Schwärmeri. This is the lamentable backwash—refuse-laden and inexplicable, talentless, pointless—of the expressionism that flowed past the point where we are now standing twenty-five years ago. One wonders how these artists deceive themselves—can't they see how much better-packaged this tripe is at any Whitney Annual? I would like, however, to save the names of Pennerton West, a painter, and Harvey S. Weiss, a sculptor, from the morass that surrounds them. Compromised as they are by their company, they have enough innate talent to keep their heads above the general muck.

Ivan Mestrovic, the Yugoslav sculptor and, according to the release of the Metropolitan Museum, where his latest work is now being shown (through June 1), "one of the world's most famous artists," hardly belongs in any discussion of modern art—and will, eventually, belong in the discussion of no art whatsoever. Mestrovic may have been a better sculptor in the past; his bronze pieces have at least a sort of cuteness. But his stuff is also one of the sources of that awful archaeological, archaic, stylized, ornamental, decorative nonsense which is the bane of contemporary stone and bronze sculpture. A lot of modeler's talent has been put into the expressive distortions and simplifications of Mestrovic's bronze studies for his "Job," but it is just so much talent invested to keep Madame Tussaud's Waxworks going. Anybody from Rockport or Provincetown could show him how to make it "art."

ON THE additional London Decca records that I have heard are several familiar works: Strauss's "Don Juan," performed by the National Symphony under Sidney Beer (Set ED-15; $5); Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, performed by the same orchestra under Stanford Robinson (Set ED-9; $7); and Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony, performed by the same orchestra under Albert Coates (Set ED-21; $13). These are works I enjoy; and the performances of "Don Juan" and the "Nutcracker" Suite are good; but the one of the "Pathétique" is very bad. On a wide-range phonograph their recorded sound has the spaciousness and remarkable depth and roundness in space of the first English Deccas that I discussed—the "Don Juan" being especially fine; but the sound is also brash, with the violins veiled and sharp-edged—this also being especially true of the "Don Juan." On a limited-range machine (4000-5000 cycles) the sound lacks the brightness it should have, but is richly sonorous and pleasantly smooth.

Among the unfamiliar works are Benjamin Britten's Introduction and Rondo alla Burlesca Opus 23 No. 1 and his Mazurka Elegiaca Opus 23 No. 2 for two pianos, played by the composer and Clifford Curzon (Set ED-17; $5). The first of these is, for me, noisily pretentious and uninteresting; the second, in its quiet way, more impressive. They are well-performed and excellently recorded.

Franck's "Le Chasseur maudit" is excellently described by a reader as "a symphonic poem that might almost be by Saint-Saëns if Saint-Saëns had taken it into his head to copy Franck's harmonic mannerisms—something he was doubtless quite capable of." In other words, a work of little consequence, which is well-performed by the London Philharmonic under Franz André (Set ED-20; $5). No more consequential are Tchaikovsky's "Opritchnik" Overture, well-performed by the National Symphony under Fistoulari (K-1291; $2), with a good performance of Bellini's Overture to "Norma" on the reverse side; Schubert's Overture in Italian style Opus 170, well-performed by the same orchestra under Unger (K-1327; $2); and Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brilliant Opus 22 for piano and orchestra, well-performed by Moura Lympny with the same orchestra under Boyd Neel (K-1191; $2). The recorded sound of all these is like that of the other orchestral works—with the violins clearer and sweeter in the Franck piece than in the others on a wide-range machine, and with the "Norma" and "Opritchnik" overtures confused at times by reverberation.

A reader who agrees with me about the beautiful sound of the English recording of "The Messiah" recently issued here by Columbia adds: "Don't the American record people listen to what they import and repress? Are they deaf? Don't they know that if they turn this stuff loose here the American public will have a standard of judgment?" All rhetorical questions, of course, to which he provides the answer: "They probably count (and probably correctly) on the fact that the American public will turn the treble control down to the bottom and the bass control up to the top, and will never know the difference between good and bad."

I still get occasional inquiries about the unreleased recordings of Beethoven's Sonatas Opus 111 and Opus 109 that Schnabel made for Victor in 1942, and that I mentioned in the 1943 edition of my "Music on Records"; and a few readers have passed on to me Victor's reply to their inquiries: that the "records in question were never approved by the artist nor by this Company," and that "there are a number of reasons, which we are not at liberty to discuss at this time, why the recordings . . . have not been released." That the recordings were not approved is true; but it is only part of the truth and gives an incorrect impression. The complete truth is that, as usually happens, certain sides had turned out unsatisfactory, and that approval was withheld until these sides could be, as such sides normally are, recorded again by the artist. In September 1942, when I heard the test-pressings, the man then at Victor who was handling the Schnabel recordings expected the unsatisfactory sides to be remade as soon as the Petrillo ban was ended, and the recordings then to be released. And what "we are not at liberty to discuss at this time" is the reason why, when after two and a half years the Petrillo ban was ended, the new people at Victor decided not to do anything more with those Schnabel recordings.

The conclusion I reached about the reason was that these people had no regard for and interest in Schnabel's playing (if I appreciated Toscanini, one of them said to me, I should appreciate the same things in Horowitz's playing). This was hotly denied: the reason, it was contended, was the pressure on Victor's recording-time and equipment from its own artists who had waited for recording to be resumed, and the fact that Schnabel was under contract not to Victor but to H. M. V.—which led Victor to decide to let him make recordings in England which it would, as in the past, then press and issue here. But only people with no interest in his playing would have made this decision, in disregard of his age, of the years that already had been lost, and of the fact that in 1945 he still had no prospect of getting to England. And the fact is that although Schnabel did finally record for H. M. V. last summer, and imported pressings of at least one of the recordings—of Mozart's A minor Rondo—have reached this country, Victor still hasn't given any sign of pressing and issuing them here. (The recording of the Mozart Rondo was broadcast by WQXR recently: it seemed to me a beautiful performance of this marvelous work. As for the new recording that Schnabel made in England of Beethoven's G major Piano Concerto—presumably because of justified dissatisfaction with the performance he recorded for Victor in 1942—I should not be surprised if we never hear it—if, that is, Victor not only doesn't press it here but prevents its importation.)

In September 1942 Victor also expected the unsatisfactory sides of the recordings that Toscanini had made with the Philadelphia Orchestra to be remade, since he was to work with the orchestra again that year. But in 1945 he was no longer working with it; and the decision was to make a new start with the N. B. C. Symphony. This has given us some fine things; but the loss of those wonderful performances with the Philadelphia is something to mourn over, especially since their imperfections are negligible by the side of the defects of some of the recordings Victor has released—the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 3, for example.

IT IS DIFFICULT TO FOLLOW THE MENTAL processes of the large House majority which passed the foreign-relief bill only after cutting down the original appropriation of $350,000,000 to $200,000,000 and adding a lot of restrictive amendments which will tend to defeat the purposes of the bill. In some quarters the vote is cited as evidence of a resurgence of "isolationism." However, many of those who voted for reduced relief are expected to approve the bill for aid to Greece and Turkey—hardly an isolationist measure, whatever else may be said against it. So perhaps we must accept Arthur Krock's explanation that the legislators acted (a) from motives of economy, and (b) from a desire to protest against the "inconsistency" of the Administration when at one and the same time it gets tough with Russia and offers aid to Russian-dominated countries. On this point it seems to us that the logic of the State Department is better than that of the Congressional Republicans. The denial of relief to Poland or Hungary on the ground that it would indirectly serve to bolster the Soviet economy appears a sure way of reinforcing Soviet propaganda in such countries. On the other hand, expenditures to relieve suffering should prove, as the New York Herald Tribune has put it, "powerful missionary arguments in precisely those areas where we most want to make good our case." As for economy, Congressmen should know that the policy of checking the western advance of communism, which we have adopted, cannot be carried out cheaply. We shall get more for our money, however, if we spend it in ways that promote economic recovery than if we invest it in arms for corrupt and inefficient governments.

FOR A MAN AS COOL IN TEMPERAMENT AS he is reputed to be, Senator Robert A. Taft is behaving with surprising rashness. His dogged efforts to make the labor bill as punitive as the Senatorial traffic will bear may look to him like a good risk, but his arrogance toward the American Federation of Labor seems more like self-indulgence than smart politics. Federation leaders thought they had an understanding with Taft last fall whereby they would have a measure of influence in the framing of a moderate measure. Pained over the apparent double-cross, they called on Taft last week and were told in effect that the Senator was delighted to have their opposition. He hoped that, in their anger over the draconian House bill, the A. F. of L. men would not fail to train a gun or two on his own slightly milder proposals. Taft's tactics, if they are calculated at all, are hard to understand. Last November the Republican Party enjoyed considerable labor support, without which it would certainly have lost in a good number of the industrial districts its candidates carried. Taft and his colleagues appear to be under a strange compulsion to kick this support away in exchange for nothing at all, the anti-labor vote being theirs almost by definition. A measure of Taft's folly is the mournful reaction of William L. Hutcheson, conservative president of the Brotherhood of Carpenters and the man who headed the G. O. P.'s labor committee in the Hoover and Landon campaigns. Hutcheson is said to have complained in private: "It's getting so a labor man can hardly vote Republican any more."

SENTIMENTS LIKE MR. HUTCHESON'S GIVE more than a passing news value to the strained but none the less dramatic get-together of Federation and C. I. O. leaders. What John L. Lewis likes to call "accouplement" may still be far in the offing, although, with industrial unionism an accepted principle in the A. F. of L., there are fewer obstacles today than in previous attempts. But thanks to Senator Taft, the conference had other implications. Aside from confronting the vengeful lawmakers—and we do not apply the adjective to those who would honestly correct admitted abuses—with an unprecedented labor solidarity, the meeting suggested some interesting political possibilities. It is no secret that a sizable proportion of the A. F. of L. vote went to Thomas E. Dewey in New York last fall. Will an effort be made now to smoke out the Governor—or will he be allowed to sit back and let his rivals for the G. O. P. nomination take the risks while he enjoys the fruits in non-committal silence? Some of the Federation men who called on Taft last week are almost duty bound now to pay a visit to Albany. Then, too, should an all-out joint campaign against the combined Taft-Hartley bill be climaxed by a Presidential veto, old wounds might magically be healed. It is worth noting that while Lewis has cried "Murder!" at Secretary of the Interior

AS OUR WISCONSIN READERS WILL SURELY point out, we were wrong last week in citing the forthcoming special election in the state of Washington as "the first test of Congressional strength since last November." Just after going to press we learned the results of the special election in Wisconsin's Second District, where Democratic candidate Carl Thompson lost to Republican Glenn Davis by the exceedingly narrow margin of 84 votes. Thompson's remarkable showing is doubly significant. It represents, first, a notable shift in the political wind since last fall. The Democratic candidate at the time polled only 36 per cent of the vote; Davis won 45 per cent. Second, it underscores the blunder of the La Follette in seeking a haven for their following in the Republican Party. Thompson, a rising leader of the Progressive Party, refused to go along on this suicidal policy. He has been proved right. Whereas the G. O. P. denies the Senatorial nomination to Bob La Follette, the Democrats have made Wisconsin liberals like Thompson very much at home. He was induced to run in the first place by a Democratic national committeeman, and his excellent showing is credited to the party's willingness to work with cooperatives, trade unions, and Americans for Democratic Action, which sent an organizer into the district. The combination promises to restore to Wisconsin politics the dignity it has lost under the thumb of Republican boss Tom Coleman.

WHILE THE AMERICAN DELEGATION TO THE Geneva Trade Conference is trying to sell the world on the need for fewer trade barriers, Congress is busy adding new bricks to the American tariff wall. The Senate recently rushed through a bill, introduced by Senator Robertson, a Wyoming sheep rancher, providing for continued support of domestic wool prices by government purchases and for sales of Commodity Credit Corporation wool stocks at the market, even though losses are incurred. But this plan for transferring some $75,000,000 of taxpayers' money to the sheep herders seems insufficiently generous to the House Agriculture Committee, which is proposing to amend the Robertson bill by adding to it authorization for the imposition of a 50 per cent ad valorem "fee" on imported wool and wool products. This charge will be, of course, in addition to present tariff duties, which in the case of raw wool amount to about 34 per cent on the finer grades and in respect to woolen and worsted fabrics, range upward of 50 per cent. The bill, if it becomes law, will add heavily to the cost of clothes and blankets, and on that ground alone it ought to be rejected. But even worse is its likely effect on the Geneva conference. For how can our delegates hope to convince other nations that we are sincere in our proposals for freer trade in the face of such Congressional actions? How, in particular, can America hope to persuade the British Empire, the world's chief producer of raw wool, to moderate its preferential tariff system? If the Administration does not take immediate steps to challenge this iniquitous bill, the Geneva conference seems doomed to smother in Western wool.

PRESIDENT MIGUEL ALEMAN OF MEXICO WAS greeted in Washington last week by the biggest crowds to turn out in the capital since the visit of General Eisenhower or the British royal family. His visit, of course, followed hard on President Truman's trip to Mexico City, where public enthusiasm made a pretty picture in the newsreels and any adverse comment failed to reach the public prints. Behind the fanfare is a hard-headed Washington calculation of which Mexico is taking full advantage. In policy-making circles in Mexico City, just before Alemán's departure, what was being freely discussed was not Mexico's leadership in the hemisphere-defense program, to which both countries are committed, but just how much the United States can be made to pay for it. Exact figures are not available but in Washington $40,000,000 was mentioned as a possible contribution from the Treasury's Stabilization Fund to bolster the peso, with another $50,000,000 from the Export-Import Bank. Mexican estimates go as high as $100,000,000 for industrialization, $50,000,000 for highways, and $25,000,000 for tourist facilities. In general, the present Mexican government would prefer United States government money to private loans, although the latter are not ruled out. Mexico has become shy of foreign capital partly because of old, unhappy memories of Standard Oil imperialism and partly because of a natural reluctance to become involved in the United States business crash which Mexicans confidently expect.

MEXICO'S WAR-TIME SPENDING SPREE LEFT the country in confusion. Little of the profits went to the government. The present administration contains an overwhelming number of comparatively young business men and is going all out for efficiency and public-works construction. Just before Alemán left Mexico City he got blank-check support from Vincente Lombardo Toledano's labor movement, in spite of the fact that Lombardo has been the most vocal opponent in Latin America of the Truman plan for hemisphere defense and the Clayton plan for low-tariff multilateral trade. The grounds for Toledano's present support are that Alemán is "carrying through the bourgeois democratic revolution" and that his program is, therefore, broadly progressive. Both the government and the left are frightened by the growing strength of the frankly reactionary right, mainly of the highly organized National Action Party (P. A. N.), with its strong Catholic ideology. P. A. N., with some aid from Chambers of Commerce and the Synarchists, has been able to unseat four state governors in eighteen months. Against this right-wing threat the government Party of Revolutionary Institutions and the labor movement are comparatively weak and divided. In this situation the "bourgeois democratic revolutionary" government must carry out its ambitious schemes for industrialization even if it is not too enthusiastic about the source of funds. Washington, at the same time, is so anxious to clinch Mexico's support for its new plan for a Pan-American arsenal of democracy that it is prepared to give substantial support to Alemán's "progressive" schemes for industrialization.

FOUR DAYS BEFORE THE BALTIMORE AND Ohio Railroad filed a petition in bankruptcy as a preliminary to its financial reorganization and the extension of a large loan from the RFC, a vice-president named Snodgrass wrote the following letter to Arthur H. Dean, a partner in the law firm of Sullivan and Cromwell, who served as special counsel for the B. and O. for its re-financing program:

I am inclosing a copy of a plant and of the bud which was grafted on it with a view to producing a flower, lily white in color, bold in design, and seductive in fragrance, instead of the burrs and beggars' lice which the plant was intended to bear.

When Mr. Snodgrass was called before the Senate Banking Committee—it is investigating what one reporter called "the railroad's affairs with the RFC" but what sounds to us more like an affair with Jesse Jones—he said and said again that he just didn't know what he had meant by the plant and the bud, the lily and the lice. Since Mr. Snodgrass seems to have no idea of the meaning of his flight of fancy, perhaps a more prosaic witness should be called to figure it out. We suggest that the committee subpoena Mortimer Snerd. Meanwhile we are trying vainly to recall—our memory, like Snodgrass's, has gone to seed—the name of that soap which is supposed to be good for a malaise of which the name escapes us, except that it contains the letters B and O.

NAPOLEON AND UNCLE ELBY HAVE RECENTLY been involved by their creator, comic-strip cartoonist Clifford McBride, in a most distressing experience. It seems that a neighbor, Bessie Bigotry, has succeeded in restricting the neighborhood against occupancy by mongrel dogs, a classification which she insists includes Napoleon. When a notice is tacked on the kennel that Napoleon must go, Uncle Elby at first resorts to subterfuge and attempts to hide the crestfallen mongrel under his ample coat-tails. But Bessie Bigotry is not the type of lady to be put off by such a clumsy stratagem and the sheriff is promptly summoned. But, lo! Napoleon has been painted with lovely black spots and is now a pedigreed thoroughbred Dalmatian, entitled to reside in a restricted neighborhood. When rains wash away Napoleon's aristocratic spots, Bessie Bigotry is, once again, aroused to take action in the name of the Anti-Mongrel Neighborhood Association. But when she reappears with the sheriff, the ingenious Uncle Elby has prepared a pedigree certifying that Napoleon is not of mongrel blood. "A pedigree," opines Uncle Elby, "is, after all, merely an exercise in penmanship." While Bessie Bigotry has been frustrated for a moment in her efforts to drive Napoleon from his kennel, who knows what diabolical devices she may yet invent in her fight to rid the neighborhood of mongrels? Whatever she does, however, one may rest assured that Clifford McBride will not permit either Uncle Elby or Napoleon to be caught offside.

Remember Mr. Hoover!

Washington, May 1

THE program, the handouts, the press releases, all proclaimed the event to be the thirty-fifth—not the fifteenth—annual meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce. The dates all read 1947—not 1927. Yet at times it seemed there must have been a mistake somewhere, somehow.

There was, for instance, Dr. Rufus S. Tucker, economist of General Motors, with his resurrection of the "trickle-down" theory of prosperity. "Mere money in the hands of consumers—whether wage earners or others—does not give rise to production but only to price inflation," said Dr. Tucker. The problem of distributing the product of expanding industry opens up three choices. You can pass on the increased benefits in the form of higher wages—a bad choice since it would just increase prices, "prevent innovating business men from increasing their profits by hiring more labor," and, indeed, cause them to discharge workers and create unemployment. The second choice is price reduction. This, Dr. Tucker conceded, is more equitable "and would increase sales but not profits and therefore not employment. It would also discourage further innovations." The third choice represents the real "road to ever-expanding prosperity": Let the benefits of higher production "accrue in the first instance to the management and stockholders."

This is an incentive to progress and expansion, would create a greater demand for labor and higher wages, and, as competitors adopt the new methods, lower prices. "In a few years the benefits are wholly passed on to labor and to consumers." Meantime, business men and investors have been cheered by the good profits and encouraged to continue innovating.

Well, what was good enough for Hoover and Mellon is good enough for Rufus S. Tucker.

President Truman's appeal to business men to reduce prices captured No. 1 place in the C. of C. Stink Parade. The delegates responded with a resolution that demonstrated that when bigger bushes are better beaten about, the United States Chamber will still be champion. The resolution agreed that there was at present an opportunity to apply the formula of more goods at lower prices, but it should be applied to everyone, not just business men. The latter would cut prices "where and when business costs permit." Applying to the price situation Dr. Tucker's argument against raising wages, price reductions "cannot be taken out of profits because profits are too small."

One by one they lined up to take a poke at the Truman proposal. William S. Street, chairman of the chamber's Committee on Economic Policy, asked with a rhetorical smirk: "Is the President's suggestion that in order to avoid a recession now all we have to do is to raise wages moderately and reduce prices generally an adequate solution of this problem?" Busy at the chamber's foresighted game of building an alibi in advance, Street asked two more leading questions: "Because of a widespread fear of declining prices, could the President's request to reduce prices result in a withdrawal of purchasing power and a wholesale cancelation of forward plans of American business as well as the consumer? Could this, if so, lead us into a greater downward spiral than anticipated and could it bring on the very thing the remedy is designed to prevent—namely, a recession?"

Yes, sir, look what that Truman has gone and done—talked us right into a recession.

Earl O. Shreve, the chamber's new president, recognizing a good line when he heard it, picked it up in his inaugural speech: "Talk alone will not bring prices down, nor will the American people be fooled by attempts to make business men scapegoats and to blame business alone for the wage-price spiral."

The chamber zipped through its list of resolutions—including one on labor policy that paralleled the Hartley bill on every point. They displayed admirable dispatch and unanimity until they hit the resolution on displaced persons. It was harmless enough, favoring American membership in the International Refugee Organization and then, along with a monumental string of hedging reservations, suggesting that just for a few years America make "temporary adjustments in our quota allotments" to permit acceptance in this country of a reasonable number of displaced persons.

But even this was too much for James S. Kemper, one-time president of the chamber, a great reader of the Chicago Tribune, the man who in 1940 doubted "that the United States should trouble itself about anything except North America and the Panama Canal" and in April, 1941, deplored the "hysterical derangement of our normal production" in order to speed up defense. Using a tactic said to be a favorite with groups he presumably loathes, Kemper waited until most delegates had gone to lunch and then persuaded the rest to send the resolution back to committee, where it will languish until next year.

The Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill took a beating from delegate Norman P. Mason, president of the National Retail Lumber Dealers' Association. He took time to explain why residential building had fallen off so badly in the first three months of this year. It seems that government propaganda was mainly to blame. The results of the slogans: "Don't build now. Don't take essential building materials away from the veteran. Costs of building are too high," were "exactly what might have been expected. People who could afford to build have been talked out of it."

But something even more sinister is involved. "Thoughtful people in our industry," said Mason, "are beginning to ask to what extent this propaganda may have emanated from sources interested in overturning the established living habits of the American public. It has frequently been said that persons with foreign ideologies have gazed longingly at the control of housing as the first step in controlling the economy of the nation. Can it be that they have hoped, through hamstringing the private building industry in its efforts to provide housing, to produce a crisis giving them an opportunity to gain this control with a program of publicly built and operated housing? Can it be that the policy of forcing these new higher-priced houses upon the veterans, while permitting the stay-at-home war worker to continue to rent an apartment at 1940 prices, was done with the full knowledge that this situation would sooner or later result in bankrupting those veterans and bringing another crisis—another chance to overturn the government?"

Can it be, indeed? I mean, can it be 1947?

A Working Plan for Palestine

THE events of last week at Flushing Meadows are discussed on another page of this issue. Their significance is not to be found in the inevitable pulling and hauling among the conflicting interests represented there, nor in the long wrangle over the question whether the debate should be limited to the original question—the appointment of a committee to investigate the Palestine problem and report to the regular session in September—or be extended to include the Arab demand for the immediate independence of Palestine. What was more important than these detailed disputes was the sense, underlying the whole discussion, that the hour of final decision has arrived. Out of the proceedings of the General Assembly now and in September must come a solution for Palestine.

In no other issue that has been presented to the United Nations are the interests at stake so immense or the decisions to be reached of such consequence to the peace of the world. As usual in such debates, this struggle for power was lightly veiled with innumerable expressions of lofty principle. Human rights rather than oil or empire were the overt subjects of concern. But the real issue involved several much more concrete questions: Will Britain continue to hold the balance of power in the Middle East, and the fate of the Jews and Arabs continue to be subject to the varying dictates of British foreign policy? Or is the United States now to take over the defense of Western interests; and if it does, will it apply new methods to the old job, making full use of the energies and progressive ideas represented in the Zionist development in Palestine, or will it revert to the British tactic of subverting reaction and curbing Jewish settlement and enterprise? Or will the Arab case win out, will British rule give way to a "democratic" Arab state in Palestine in which a new feudal oligarchy will provide another area for great-power intrigue and rivalry? It is perhaps not necessary to say that the chief loser in such a situation would be the Jews; the chief gainer, Russia. Jewish institutions and even Jewish lives would be under constant threat; Jewish immigration into Palestine would end. And a depressed economy would offer to the adherents of the Communist system an irresistible invitation to stir up the miserable population against its rulers. Luckily the Arab solution is not likely to be accepted in its pure form, for the West can hardly be imagined subsidizing Russian interests so generously.

There is one other solution, which would meet, in part, Arab demands for independence, Jewish demands for a National Home, and even the legitimate demands of the big powers. This is the creation in Palestine of independent Jewish and Arab states. The Nation has advocated partition many times as the one available plan, admittedly a compromise, which might bring peace to Palestine and provide at least an approximation of the freedom and control both peoples demand.

Which of the possible solutions will emerge from the inquiry the United Nations is about to launch we cannot even guess; at this stage we want only to urge the most careful consideration of the idea of partition. At least it would have the immense virtue, if carried out intelligently, of preserving the Jewish institutions, permitting Jewish immigration into a Jewish state, and at the same time giving the Arabs, within an agreed area, a similar opportunity to pursue their own way of life in freedom. While this system was being established, the interests of both communities as well as those of the British should be guarded by the United Nations, which should assume temporarily the responsibility of maintaining order and supervising the territorial and political reorganization of the country.

It may be asked how the conflict of power in Palestine is to be solved or avoided through this solution. The answer is that partition would at least reduce the area of internal intrigue by satisfying the minimum demands of the two peoples involved, while at the same time giving scope for the progressive enterprise of the Jews. It would, or should, also mitigate international tension by eliminating the control of a single interested power and substituting the authority of the United Nations. British rule should be eliminated from the start; otherwise the plan would be rejected by Palestinians of both persuasions.

Partition, to be successful, would have to be linked to a broad program of regional development which would benefit both states and adjoining areas as well. Such a program should be carried through under the U. N., which should also, as a condition of granting membership to the new states, assume responsibility for the protection of religious and national minorities in both—a protection which should, in fact, be extended to include the whole Arab world if considerations of sovereignty were not an obstacle.

Last week the Nation Associates submitted to the United Nations a memorandum outlining the problem and the point of view we favor and at the same time providing the factual material necessary for an informed decision. The document was signed by a group of representative Americans who share our concern and our ideas about Palestine: Philip Murray, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations; Henry A. Atkinson, secretary of the Church Peace Union; Raymond Swing; James G. Patton, president of the Farmers Educational and Co-operative Union; Frank P. Graham, chairman of the advisory council of the Nation Associates; and Frank Kingdon, co-chairman of the Progressive Citizens of America. In the next issue of The Nation, an abridged version of the memorandum will appear as a supplement. Interested readers will, we believe, find it a valuable handbook as well as a statement of policy.

Arabian Nights in Flushing

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Flushing Meadows, May 5

ONE week is not enough to prove the United Nations a failure on Palestine. A problem so old and so suffused in the politics of oil and strategic bases could hardly have been tackled at the outset with that determination and clarity of purpose the situation required. Those who, out of impatience with the evident maneuvers going on, spoke of "farce" and "bankruptcy" rendered no service either to the United Nations or to their own cause. But a week of deliberations has offered a preview of the attitude of the powers; and a sober analysis of their behavior so far provides an inkling as to whether or not in handling this important issue they will measure up to their responsibilities.

What must be avoided is the self-deception practiced at Geneva which ended in the downfall of the League.

At Geneva on innumerable occasions the very people responsible for ruining the League spoke of it as of a strange lady in whose immoralities the pure gentlemen of the Council and the Assembly had no part. There never was an abstract League of Nations. There was only the League as it was fashioned by the Britain of Sir Samuel Hoare and Neville Chamberlain, by the France of Pierre Laval and Georges Bonnet. To recall these names is to realize that shame and failure were inevitable.

The same with the United Nations. It is not the institution itself, not the Flushing Meadows in their spring-time beauty, not Mr. Lie or his secretariat, which can be held to account for the mistakes which may be made. What will count are the nations themselves and above all, in the present situation, the big powers.

The most disturbing thing last week was to see the greatest of the big powers apparently unable to make effective use of its greatness. It was not that the United States for one reason or another preferred to remain in the background. On the contrary, the United States showed in every one of its acts a desire to assume leadership—but only to demonstrate that it could not lead.

Dr. Charles Malik

The performance of the American delegation was the more incomprehensible in view of the almost clear record of the United States on the Palestine question and Senator Austin's warm sympathy for the Jewish case.

If there is one question on which every Administration has been agreed since 1917, it is the question of Palestine. From Wilson to Truman, every President and every political party has subscribed to the Balfour Declaration and its purposes. Since the end of the war the successive demands of President Truman for the admission into Palestine of 100,000 Jewish refugees have been among the most popular moves of the Administration. Between the two major political parties there was perfect agreement on the question of Palestine; President Truman and Governor Dewey agreed on it; even PM and the Daily News agreed on it. And just at the moment when the United States had a chance to render the greatest possible service to the Jews, the American delegation chose to range itself on the side of Great Britain in a battle which nearly succeeded in pushing the Jewish Agency out of the present discussions. This despite the fact that five Arab states had already made more than a dozen speeches attacking the Zionist position.

In the lobbies on the opening day one heard some caustic comments on the presence of the State Department's oil expert, Haydn Raynor. This not very discreet appearance was countered, however, by private assurances to the Jewish Agency from members of the American delegation. The test of these assurances came when the Americans took the lead in opposing a motion by the Czech and Polish delegations to admit the Jewish Agency in a consultative capacity to the plenary session of the Assembly.

A reversal of the roles previously played by the American and Soviet delegations developed in the course of the week. In the past the British have defended their course in Palestine, even against American criticism, as necessary to appease the Arabs. Last week it was the Americans who played to the Arab gallery. And last week, to the discomfiture of those who insisted that the Soviet Union was tied to the Arabs in a secret deal, the Russians emerged as the outstanding champion of the Jewish Agency and of its appearance before the General Assembly.

The fact that the Czech-Polish resolution was defeated in the General Committee and again in the Assembly is only half the story. Without the initiative of the Czech and Polish delegations and the support of Russia the admission of the Jewish Agency even to the Political Committee could not have been accomplished. History has a way of repeating itself. As in the case of Spain, the United States came around to a democratic position only after the initiative had been seized by others.

It is not difficult to guess why the Americans did not wish to have the Agency appear in the Assembly, despite its professions of sympathy. Probably the reasons were two: first, fear lest the appearance of the Agency would precipitate the whole discussion they had tried to avoid; second, fear of creating a precedent which at some later time might permit the appearance of the Chinese Communists in an eventual discussion on China, or of Korean opposition groups were Korea to come before the United Nations. Just why the fears of the American delegation should be diminished by the appearance of the Jewish Agency before the Political Committee, which is really a committee of the whole, is hard to understand.

The appearance of the Jewish Agency before the Political Committee now seems assured, although the American resolution is studiously vague about the status the Agency representatives would have if allowed to express their views on the Palestine question.

It is expected, however, that they will have full opportunity to be heard on all questions relating to the terms of reference of the commission of inquiry and its composition. If there were no other more fundamental reasons to justify the participation of the Agency, the behavior of the representatives of the Arab states in the United Nations makes its appearance imperative. In the meetings of the Political Committee and on the floor of the Assembly itself the Arab states have abused their privileged position by their endless harangues and their demands for the immediate establishment of an independent Palestine, which is to say, an Arab Palestine. At first they gave the impression of an able, if prejudiced team. Very soon, however, they overplayed their hand, and by the time the acute president of the Assembly, Oswaldo Aranha, called them to order, everyone had been surfeited with Arab protestations.

Sir Alexander Cadogan

Sketches made from life

Now the stage seems to be set for another exposition of the Arab case, this time by representatives of the Palestine Arabs. In order to balance the appearance of the Jewish Agency, the Arab Higher Committee for Palestine may also be summoned, although it has no similar international status.

The British maneuver that brought this about was not a very subtle one. Just after the introduction of the American resolution which would have referred to the General Committee all requests for representation, one of Sir Alexander Cadogan's staff went over to the Arab delegation and inquired whether the Arab Higher Committee had asked to be heard. When he learned that no request had yet been presented, Sir Alexander promptly introduced an amendment to the American resolution providing that the General Committee should consider not only applications already received, but similar applications received at any time during the session. This amendment was amiably accepted by the American delegation. Other maneuvers by other delegations in the day to come are likely to play still more directly into the hands of a group of men whose chief claim to attention is their unblemished record of pro-Axis intrigue—a record that should have sent them to Nürnberg rather than to Flushing.

In fact, it would be only mildly surprising, once an invitation to the Arab Higher Committee is approved to find the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem appearing on the rostrum of the United Nations as the newest spokesman of democracy. Or if his democratic credentials be questioned, Haj Amin el-Husseini could at least qualify as an expert in methods of liquidating the Jewish problem. Thus the Mufti, or his nephew Jamal Husseini, both former accomplices of Hitler, could by their appearance give to the United Nations that quality of "universality" which was so earnestly invoked when fascist Argentina was voted in at San Francisco.

Civil Rights—Fresh Start

BY ROBERT BENDINER

NINE months have passed since a band of Georgians stopped a car on a country road forty miles from Atlanta, dragged out two Negroes and their wives, and riddled all four with a volley of rifle bullets and gunshot. The country was properly shocked, as it always is over such demonstrative savagery, but its reaction followed a time-worn and futile pattern. Editorials blazed up, even in the most conservative papers, urging federal action if Georgia failed to do its duty. Georgia failed. Northern members of Congress redoubled their efforts to put through an anti-lynching bill. They lost. Justice Department officials sent agents down from Washington to see what could be done. They doubted that the civil-rights statutes applied. So far not one of the twenty-five or thirty killers has been arrested. What is worse, the whole gang could be rounded up tomorrow, with almost no chance that anyone would go to jail, much less pay the usual penalty for murder. With a few exceptions the country forgot the whole affair.

One of these exceptions was Tom Clark, a Southerner himself and not the most vigorous prosecutor who ever sat at the Attorney General's desk, but a man completely sold on civil liberties. Genuinely concerned over the frustrating limitations of federal law in this field, Clark went to the President and urged action. Truman was receptive, and early in December a White House release announced the creation of the President's Committee on Civil Rights. Accompanying the appointment was a strong—and little-appreciated—statement acknowledging that "all parts of our population are not equally free from fear"; that "in some places, from time to time, the local enforcement of law and order has broken down, and individuals—sometimes ex-service men, even women—have been killed, maimed, or intimidated." The Constitution, President Truman argued, places on the federal government "the duty to act when state or local authorities abridge or fail to protect" constitutional guarantees, but the government "is hampered by inadequate civil-rights statutes." It must be provided "with the tools to do the job."

The committee charged with designing the tools, and with broader approaches to the problem as well, was selected with skill and an eye to pertinent sectors of the population. Referred to by the irreverent as Noah's Ark, it includes two corporation heads and two labor representatives; two Jews, two Catholics, and two Protestants, (in each case one clergyman and one prominent layman); two college presidents; and two Negroes. Fif-enth and odd man in the group is Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr.

Meeting early in the year for its first session, the committee was sent on its way by the President with a ringing denunciation of the Ku Klux Klan and its imitators. The problem would grow worse, he told the members, if unemployment developed. They were to go as far as necessary in their inquiry and could count on complete cooperation from the Executive department. Concrete results were wanted.

Impressed by the President's obviously deep feeling, the group proceeded to divide itself into three subcommittees, following the three chosen lines of attack. The first of these is charged with making a study of existing federal law and bringing in recommendations for new legislation. Its members are the Right Reverend Henry Knox Sherrill, presiding bishop of the Episcopal church; Francis P. Matthews, former Supreme Knight of the Knights of Columbus and a Papal Chamberlain; Dr. Frank P. Graham, president of the University of North Carolina and formerly a member of the War Labor Board; John S. Dickey, president of Dartmouth College; and Mrs. Sadie T. Alexander, assistant city solicitor of Philadelphia, a director of the National Urban League, and a member of the Inter-Racial Committee of that city.

The second subcommittee, whose job it is to "consider the broader social, economic, and educational aspects of promoting the cause of civil liberty," is composed of Charles Luckman, the dynamic head of Lever Brothers Soap Company; the Most Reverend Francis J. Haas, Catholic bishop of Grand Rapids and once chairman of the Fair Employment Practices Committee; James B. Carey, secretary-treasurer of the C. I. O.; Channing H. Tobias, director of the Phelps-Stokes Fund and prominent Negro leader; and Rabbi Roland G. Gittelsohn, holder of the navy commendation medal for his services as Jewish chaplain with the marines at Iwo Jima.

The purpose of the third subdivision is to look into the work of private organizations whose activities affect vital civil rights. In this group are Morris L. Ernst, lawyer, author of "The First Freedom" and professional civil libertarian; Mrs. M. E. Tilley, active in social-relations work for the Methodist church in Atlanta, Georgia; Boris Shishkin, economist for the A. F. of L.; and Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., chairman of the Housing Committee of the American Veterans' Committee. Ex-officio members of all three groups are Charles E. Wilson, General Electric, who is chairman of the entire committee, and Robert K. Carr, its executive secretary. Carr is particularly well chosen. Chairman of the Department of Government at Dartmouth, he has spent the last two years on a grant-supported leave studying the whole problem of civil rights and particularly the role of the Department of Justice. So much for personnel.

NEW DIRECTIONS

The committee has just settled down to work, and it is much too early to predict with assurance the line of its recommendations, but new directions may be looked for. As one of the members insistently points out, there has been no new "social engineering" in this field for generations. Reliance has been placed on the criminal law, which is technically inadequate, as I intend to show, and impotent in any case where local mores make jury convictions improbable. New ideas are in the air.

In the field of discrimination itself—which is a social rather than a legal problem—several fresh approaches are sure to come up. One of these is recourse to the government's taxing power. Suppose, this theory runs, the Treasury were empowered to rule that contributions to organizations would in the future be deductible only if such money were to be spent without discrimination as to race, color, or creed? This would not seem to be far-fetched, since every such deduction is in a sense a burden on all taxpayers.

Similarly, the spending power of the government might be used as an indirect method of discouraging Jim Crow distinctions. This would apply to hospitals, to colleges now receiving G. I. funds, and to all other institutions that get occasional shots in the arm from Washington. The federal government would merely be saying in effect that the institutions of, say, Mississippi were free to indulge their beloved mores to the limit—but not with the aid of the national treasury. At least one member of the committee feels that this pocket-book method, vigorously and uniformly applied, would be far neater and more effective than resort to the criminal law, besides circumventing the whole messy issue of states' rights. In the same indirect pattern is the proposal, agitated in some quarters for a number of years, that printed matter sent through the mails be required to bear full disclosure as to its source, and as to its financing as well. Advocates of this approach believe that the worst of the crackpot organizations could not long survive this regulation, since fascist-minded millionaires have a delicate reticence that generally keeps them from taking public credit for the support of shady operations.

Almost certain to be recommended will be a set of local ordinances banning Jim Crow from the District of Columbia. The thought here is that the capital of the nation might well be made into a model for the rest of the country—no doubt in the hope that the contagion would spread. Well-disposed Congressional committees on the District in both House and Senate could go far in this direction, forbidding segregation in theaters, restaurants, and concert halls, and otherwise promulgating policy intended for emulation elsewhere. The peculiar attractiveness of this approach is that in no way could the argument be muddled by the moth-eaten appeal to states' rights.

It is not to be supposed, of course, that any or all of these novel devices for encouraging respect for civil liberties could take the place of an adequate law to protect minorities from violent outrage or to insure them a fair economic opportunity and their full political rights. To these ends the committee is certain to review at length the prospects of getting anti-lynch, anti-poll-tax, and FEPC legislation past the Senate of the United States. But I gather that even in the matter of legislation new ways will be tried. Particularly, an effort is likely to be made to blanket as much as possible under one large and general statute, on the theory that such a measure can more readily be dramatized and would stand a better chance of passing.

The President's recent order calling for machinery to probe the loyalty of government workers is not on the committee's agenda, disturbed as some of its members may be over the dangerously loose nature of that document. The issues involved in the proposed loyalty investigation are considerably removed from the committee's chief concern, and it is naturally unwilling to jeopardize its chances of success by plunging into a controversy so highly charged with politics.

STATUTORY FOSSILS

The group's main line of attack is likely to be directed against Sections 51 and 52 of Title 18 of the United States Code, the two archaic and loosely drawn statutes on which the Department of Justice has been forced to rely in civil-rights cases. These are the pitiful remnant of what was once a whole series of civil-rights acts, passed with more enthusiasm than legal astuteness in the days of Reconstruction. All the rest have perished either by repeal or at the hands of the Supreme Court.

To understand why Tom Clark's men would be unable to do much about the lynchers of the four Georgians even if they managed to get witnesses to testify against them, it is necessary only to glance at these curious laws. Section 51, stripped of its legalisms, provides penalties "if two or more persons conspire" to bar a citizen from the enjoyment of his constitutional rights. Thus no one member of a mob can be convicted unless conspiracy is proved, which is always difficult. The committee will very likely recommend placing responsibility more directly on the individual. Note, too, that this law protects only citizens, and that their rights are not enumerated, which leaves far too much margin for interpretation. And, finally, the penalty is so drastic—ten years and/or a $5,000 fine—that jury convictions are all but impossible to get.

Section 52 is directed against state officials who "under color of any law . . . wilfully" deprive a person of his constitutional rights or impose on him punishments different from those provided. This was obviously designed to get at police officials who administer extracurricular penal treatment to prisoners, especially where a difference in race is involved. But the catch is in the word "wilfully." The outstanding example of the weakness of this statute was the case of Screws vs. United States, a matter involving the fatal beating of a handcuffed Negro prisoner by a Georgia sheriff and two of his deputies. The officers, mirabile dictu, were convicted by Georgia juries, only to be freed by the Supreme Court. The decision took seven months, and came in the form of four separate opinions, totaling some 25,000 words; but the crux of the matter was that the trial judge had failed to instruct the jury on this point of wilfulness. The jurymen should have been told that in order to convict they would have to find that the slugging officers not only had "a generally bad purpose" but specifically "had the purpose to deprive the prisoner of a constitutional right, for example, the right to be tried by a court rather than by ordeal." Three of the justices—Roberts, Frankfurter, and Jackson—referred to Section 52 as "a dead letter" and even thought it unconstitutional.

It is apparent that these existing legal reeds are far too frail to lean on. And while no one on the committee would suggest such a thing, this is politically a good time to replace them with stronger ones. A Republican Congress—for both geographic and historical reasons the G. O. P. is generally more sympathetic to such legislation than the Democrats—might feel the need to push for much-needed reforms in a pre-election year, the season when minorities are traditionally cultivated.

The Tragedy of De Gaulle

BY LEON BLUM

Paris, April 29

ONE day in April, 1946, I was in Canada. I held a press conference at Ottawa. I explained to the journalists present, to the best of my ability, the state of our industrial equipment, our need for coal, our commercial balance. One of the reporters asked me point-blank: "What future do you see for General de Gaulle in the political life of your country? Does he consider his retirement final?"

I was embarrassed, and my first reaction was to avoid the question. I could have done so: it was quite off my subject, outside my mandate. Then I said to myself, Why this embarrassment? Why should I remain silent? I am here in the country which of all the world feels perhaps closest to France. I need not hide what I think of General de Gaulle—past, present, or future. And so I answered my interrogator.

I have not saved the text of that reply, but I remember the sense of it very precisely. I said to my indiscreet confrère that in my opinion General de Gaulle did not consider his job finished, that the post-war world was difficult and uncertain, that the General could, without great effort, imagine a perilous situation arising in which the nation would instinctively rally around him. I did not believe, I went on to say, that such a chain of thought would be foreign to him, but that was pure hypothesis, and if I was not sure of what he would do, at least I believed I was sure of what he would not do. He hopes, I said, to remain a national figure, a symbol of the unity of the nation: he will thus deny himself any step which might make him the head of one party opposed to other parties, and most particularly the head of reactionary parties opposed to the parties of popular democracy.

A Gaullist party, however, now exists. General de Gaulle has become head of a party opposed to other parties. What are the forces which have rallied to his name, to his person? All the forces of reaction—of political reaction and social reaction. It is these which constitute the bulk of the army, its only stable and disciplined element. The Radicals quickly recognized their mistake; how could they conceal from themselves any longer that the undertaking was bound to lead to personal power? The M. R. P. (Mouvement Républicain Populaire), precisely because it has no republican traditions, cannot allow itself to be absorbed into a coalition in which it would inevitably lose all the distinctive characteristics which are its raison d'être. If its refusal causes the defection of certain elements, they will be the elements of the extreme right, which it has been trying to screen out for a long time.* Thus, sooner or later, General de Gaulle will have no organized forces behind him except those of the right.

And whom will he be against? Against all the living forces of democracy.

What is now happening is exactly that which, in my innocence, I believed impossible. What could have caused such a change? What counsels, what compulsions could have acted upon General de Gaulle to bring about his metamorphosis into a different man? Loving his country to the point of wishing to incarnate it in himself, why did he resolve to embroil it in an era of dissension, of struggle, of suspicion, which will not easily be ended, alas—and this makes the situation so serious—by vote of the Assembly, or by referendum, or by elections?

General de Gaulle's effort will fail; of that I am convinced. But the failure will leave in its wake a division, a sickness, a menace, which will continue to trouble and obstruct public affairs. It is impossible that a mind like his has not foreseen this consequence. How can he accept it with an easy conscience or, in any case, as a lesser evil?

I do not believe he is easily influenced, and I for one do not impute to him any self-interested or sordid motives. I am certain that neither ambition nor wounded pride has played a part in his decision. The only explanation I can think of is that General de Gaulle, with his pessimistic view of the international situation, sees France in such extreme peril that the concentration of authority in a strong hand has become a matter of life or death.

But all the dictatorships in history have attempted to justify themselves with this argument of le salut public. Moreover, I myself do not believe that catastrophe is inevitable. I am convinced that it can be avoided. I am convinced that it will be warded off. If the danger does exist, our duty is that much greater to maintain the civil and moral unity of the country by preserving our free institutions. To throw France into discord just so it may better meet an uncertain peril is like throwing oneself into the river to save oneself from a storm.

Who Should Rule the Sudan?

BY ROBERT HENRIQUES

FOR the last forty-eight years a patchwork area of eastern and central Africa has been called the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. It is now the subject of an appeal by Egypt to the Security Council. The problem is complex, but the real question is simple: "Who in the Sudan is to be the real boss?"

To hide this simplicity there have been minted for distribution many legal phrases whose deliberate obscurities seek to restrict, qualify, diminish the weight and relevance of the term "sovereignty." Yet whatever "sovereignty" may convey to an international assembly, it is translatable into Arabic, the language of Egypt and the lingua franca of northern Sudan, only by the word seiyada, whose precise meaning is "boss"—in its harshest, least compromised significance.

Egypt wants to be boss of the whole Nile Valley, on which its life most literally depends. The Sudanese, at last becoming politically conscious, are learning to want to boss themselves. Britain—behind the constitutional façade of a condominium and beneath the illusive pretense of twin British and Egyptian flags that flutter over the (British) Governor General in Khartoum—is boss now. When the Sudan is politically adult, Britain has promised to walk out. The year 1966 is its proclaimed estimate. In the meantime no power so immature, so irresponsible, and so weak as Egypt can be left to sit alone on the airways to Middle Eastern oil. Not all of this will be said at meetings of the United Nations.

Much of it will be concealed behind British equivocation and Egyptian propaganda. The recent inanities of Whitehall were clearly meant only to be meaningless. But the spate of pronouncements from Cairo and its pan-Arabian slogans, official, indiscriminate, and brash, extend the issue to one of world import: "the indissoluble unity of the Middle East" (applied generally); "in the name of Arabism" (applied to the Sudan); "Sudan, land with a future, land of wealth!" (referring to British greed). In retort, British diplomacy has dug in smugly on the status quo.

Egypt is now developing a four-pronged attack—legal, historical, ethical, and ideological. Legally it has alternative pleas: first, that at the time of the Anglo-Egyptian Condominium Agreements (1899) it was under British domination, so that the condominium was imposed on it by force and is not valid; second, on the basis of acceptance of the condominium, that Britain has consistently declined its proper implementation. Historically Egypt claims that for sixty years of the nineteenth century the Sudan belonged to it by right of conquest. Ethically it asserts that the Sudan would be the better for Egyptian sovereignty and administration, and that Britain has no right to thwart this natural and beneficent evolution. Ideologically Egypt proclaims the geographical, ethnological, linguistic, and cultural unity of the Nile Valley, the kinship of the lands served by the great river, whose twin streams thread Abyssinia, Uganda, Kenya, Tanganyika, the Belgian Congo, the Sudan, and Egypt.

A fifth and covering argument, a sort of general barrage contributed by both sides, is that whoever commands the Nile dams of the Sudan commands Egypt.

COLONEL ROBERT HENRIQUES served in Egypt and the Sudan from 1925 to 1930 as an officer in the British Royal Artillery. In World War II he was lent by Headquarters, Combined Operations, to the United States Army, with which he took part in the North African and Sicilian campaigns. He is the author of "No Arms No Armor" and "The Voice of the Trumpet."

and whoever commands Egypt commands the Middle East. Thus with the evacuation of British troops from Egypt, the Sudan acquires a new strategic stature. In an age of air power it is desperately significant.

THE QUEEN OF SHEBA'S NILOTES

This Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, as an entity, is a purely political creation of haphazard exploration and seizure. Circumscribed by no geographical or ethnological frontiers, its various parts are without mutual affinities, are in fact mutually antipathetic. Half of the peoples concerned are not naturally affected even by the Nile itself.

The whole Sudan is about the size of Europe, or a third the size of the United States; it supports a population less than that of London or New York, for the country has little natural wealth and no mineral resources. Its inhabitants sprang prehistorically from a blending of Caucasian and Negro. They speak some fifty or sixty different tongues of three main linguistic families—Semitic, Hamitic, and Sudanic.

In religion and culture they are equally diverse. Arab infiltration between the seventh and tenth centuries was extensive, but the Islamic variations which now preponderate in the north have never touched the 90 per cent paganism and the 10 per cent primitive Christianity of the south. Here, for instance, are a million Nilotes—cited for valiance by the Queen of Sheba in "Isaiah"—belonging to six main sub-species, but mostly tall, dark, conservative, unsociable folk with whom the Egyptians would not really care to claim cultural or ethnological unity. Their tribes, until their recent education, were ruled by hereditary rain-makers whom they buried alive on loss of virility. Separating these peoples from the Islamic north, about Latitude 12, runs one of the few natural but unmarked frontiers of the continent.

This invisible frontier dividing Africa from the Middle East was more or less ethnologically stabilized about 2,000 B. C. From then until seventy years ago it was crossed from the south only by those in the slave trade, a commerce which reached its most profitable heights during the Egyptian occupation of 1821-82. In the first few years of that misrule the annual slave hunts instituted by the Viceroy of Egypt netted over a quarter of a million head; and until a few years ago the Arabic word sudani, meaning literally a "black," was synonymous, in Egypt and the northern Sudan, with "slave."

KITCHENER AT KHARTOUM

The sixty-one years of nineteenth-century exploitation is the only period of modern history in which Egypt has ever exercised any sort of exclusive sovereignty over any part of the Sudan. This occupation was emphatically ended in 1882 by the religious rising of the Mahdi, the "Divine Guide to Salvation," who speedily expelled the Egyptian government and garrison troops.

In that same year the Egyptian government in Cairo collapsed into chaos under general insolvency, incompetence, riots, the mutiny of its unpaid army, and the Alexandria massacres. European intervention was declared inevitable. Britain stepped in, restored order, raised and trained a new Egyptian army—and stayed for forty years. During that time it was the paramount power in Egypt, which remained, until 1914, under the nominal suzerainty of Turkey. Then, when Turkey joined Germany in the war, Egypt was declared a British protectorate. In 1922 it was granted independence—for the first time since the Pharaonic era.

In renouncing deeds that were done in its name between 1882 and 1922 Egypt acts therefore on reasonable grounds. During that period it was not its own master. On the same grounds, however, Britain claims that without British intervention all legal and constitutional interest of Egypt in the Sudan would have been finally extinguished. Britain recalls that when Egypt was actively threatened with invasion by the Mahdi's successor, the Khalifa, it was Kitchener who led a force of one-third British troops and two-thirds British-trained Egyptians to reoccupy Khartoum and to hoist there, side by side, the British and Egyptian flags. It was under this same token of joint sovereignty that he and his British successors proceeded to quell and annex the Khalifa's various provinces.

In these ventures Kitchener barely forestalled the French. Coming in from their colonies in the west, they had already reached Fashoda, one hundred miles from Khartoum on the Nile itself. After what is now known as "the Fashoda incident," they were induced to withdraw. And a few years before that, the Italians from Eritrea and the Belgians from the Congo had entered the Sudan from east and south. Had it not been for political action by Britain at that time, and for its armed intervention between then and 1899, the Sudan would have been portioned among the other powers of Europe, most of it becoming a French colony.

CONDOMINIUM

Britain made the Sudan into a condominium rather than a British colony because by then its imperial appetite was satisfied—Gladstone had said, "We have got enough"—and because the country was too poor to be an appetizing dish. In the imperial sanctimony of those times a condominium seemed both liberal to Egypt and just. Its creation was partly a gesture of good faith. This, however, did not deter the lawyers from making a good job of it.

The salient and relevant points of the Condominium Agreements were two: first, that joint sovereignty was incontestably established; and, second, that while Egypt was to participate in the administration, British control of the administrative machine was firmly assured. Under Articles III and IV the Governor General was to be nominated by the British and formally appointed by the Egyptian government. He was granted unlimited powers and could be removed only with British consent. Constitutionally, therefore, the exercise of Egyptian sovereignty was in practice restricted to the creation of an impasse—by a refusal to appoint as Governor General the British nominee. This might well be Egypt's next step today.

The legal effects of the condominium were established in 1910 by a notable case in the Mixed Courts of Cairo. This was an international tribunal with European and Egyptian judges and proceedings conducted in French. On this occasion a contractor suing the Sudan government "joined" the Egyptian government on the ground that the Sudan had never ceased to be an integral part of Egypt. A large sum of money was involved, and the Egyptian government pleaded in defense that "by the agreement of 1899 the Sudan government was constituted an autonomous government absolutely separate and distinct from the Egyptian government." The court upheld this plea.

Legally, then, the best Egyptian case lies in admitting the validity of the condominium but alleging British neglect to implement it justly. Although British administration in the Sudan has been almost above reproach, Egypt has been allowed only the most limited participation. Until 1924 its officials held only subordinate posts, but when in that year they organized rebellion in the Sudan—Egyptian nationalists murdering the Governor General while he was on a visit to Cairo—they were sent home and replaced by newly educated Sudanese.

THE TREATY OF 1936

In 1936 a fresh Anglo-Egyptian treaty was signed—to expire in 1956. It was at least overdue, for although Britain had granted Egypt independence some fourteen years earlier, it had not yet withdrawn its troops. This matter was rectified by the new treaty, and a twofold promise was made concerning the Sudan. First, Egyptian troops, which had been expelled from the Sudan after the rebellion of 1924, were to return. Second, all administrative posts for which suitable Sudanese could not be found should be open equally to British and Egyptian candidates.

The first promise was fully kept. By 1940, when the Italians invaded the Sudan, impressive Egyptian forces were there to meet them. They refused to open fire. Egypt was not at war with Italy. It was the Commonwealth which not only repelled the invaders but defeated Rommel in Egypt at Alamein. In all these operations Sudanese volunteer units played a valiant part. With the Eighth Army they advanced from Egypt to Tripoli. Meanwhile, Egypt declared its formal neutrality.

If the second promise was kept, it was only to the legal letter. A certain number of Egyptian officials have been appointed to administrative posts, but no Egyptian has yet been allowed to sit on the board that selects them. Some sort of justice may in fact have been done, but it does not appear so to the Egyptians. Nor can they accept the British proposition that such measures are already obsolete: that progress toward self-government in the Sudan has gone so far that there is no longer room for Egyptian middlemen, and that the country to be administered is by now more democratic than Egypt itself. This may or may not be true, but the fact remains that a negotiated treaty has not been honored—at least in spirit.

"BRITAIN MUST GO"

On these grounds alone Egypt would be hard to beat. But the redress of this legitimate grievance would not content it today. Britain, it says, must go. Until the last few months it had the Arab nations behind it. Behind them lay Russian sympathy. Palestinian troubles remain a pan-Arab stimulant.

While the support of the Arab states remained sure, no Egyptian claim was too absurd or audacious to be staked. "The visitor to the Sudan," says a pamphlet issued by the Egyptian government, "can clearly see that the standard of living is generally very low compared to Egypt's." In fact he will see the reverse. The poverty, feudal exploitation, and disease now seen in the Egyptian peasantry disappeared from the Sudan in the first decade of the century.

A further fiction is the alleged Sudanese support for Egyptian aspirations. Apart from the traditional hatred and contempt that the Sudanese tribes breathe toward Egypt, the adolescent politics of the towns are vociferously diverse. Less than 1 per cent of the population have actual political affiliations, the remainder confining their interest to local and provincial affairs. There are three political parties: the Patriots, or Umma (literally "nation"), who seek autonomy divorced from both Britain and Egypt; the Blood Brothers, or Asbigga, mostly of Egyptian or semi-Egyptian descent, who seek autonomy under the Egyptian crown; and the Center Party, now growing apace, which indorses for the moment the present administration but demands that progress toward self-government must be speeded up. As a background to politics it must be remembered that the Arabic word for the Egyptians, Masreen, remains a current and universal term of Sudanese abuse. It can be heard in any marketplace as the climax of unprintable epithets.

British response to this new Egyptian imperialism and its impact on Sudan politics has been remarkably inept. Bevin's lawyers found him a formula that they thought to be meaningless and on January 27 he spoke in the House of Commons of a "symbolic dynastic union between Egypt and the Sudan . . . without change in the existing order of administration." This would have been a fair enough diplomatic negative if he had not put into the draft protocol—which Egypt has rejected—the phrase “within the framework of the unity between the Sudan and Egypt under the common crown of Egypt.”

“To the ordinary man this means everything that the British Foreign Office does not. And it was explosive stuff. Lawyers in London set great store by the opening—“within the framework”—maintaining that it materially qualified the rest. It is, however, scarcely translatable into Arabic or any of the Sudan dialects. The length and breadth of the Sudan picked the words “unity . . . crown . . . Egypt.” Police had to quell the protests.

The fire is smoldering. If the north wind that brings ease to this torrid land carries many more rumors of Egyptian sovereignty, the flames will leap again—as they did in the days of the Mahdi. And this time there will be blood to the debit of the British diplomats.

Election Day in Santo Domingo

BY ALBERT C. HICKS

JUST seventeen years ago this May the former pimp, forger, and cattle rustler Rafael L. Trujillo, using the terroristic methods of a military gangster, made himself President of Santo Domingo. In the years that followed he turned the country, only a few hours from Florida by air, into a chamber of horrors hermetically sealed off from the rest of the world.

In 1930 Trujillo chose May 16 to declare himself President because it was the national election day. Leaders of the opposition were dead or in hiding. Few votes were cast, although a record number were recorded—all for Rafael Trujillo. Since then three national elections have been held in Santo Domingo, each cut to the same pattern.

But the world has changed and Trujillo, to a degree, with it. On May 16 this year the Americas are to be treated to a pallid mockery of democracy at work in Santo Domingo. For the first time since the coup d'état of 1930 the ballots in the national election will name more than one candidate; two men will oppose the incumbent President, both of them handpicked by him. The innovation is an obvious attempt to quiet outside criticism of the totalitarian regime and to disarm politically the exiled oppositionists. But such democratic trappings only make the farce more obvious.

Trujillo started his present political maneuvers in the spring of 1945, when he announced that political parties would be free to organize in opposition to his own Partido Dominicano. He even supplied the money to finance opposition parties—and then picked the men to head them. As chief of the Republican Party he named his former revolutionary supporter and vice-president Rafael Estrella Ureña. Estrella mistook Trujillo's gesture for the real thing and loosed some mild criticism of the regime. He was immediately obliged to go into hiding. After some weeks he returned to the political scene as a silent oppositionist, and a few days later died very suddenly, the victim, it was officially announced, of a “burst appendix.”

Dr. Wenceslao Medrano, chief of the Dominican army's medical corps, was placed at the head of the so-called Workers' Independence Party. Rafael Espailat, Secretary of Agriculture in a previous administration, who had seized the tail of Trujillo's kite in 1930, was chosen to lead the new National Democratic Party. Both these men, after observing Estrella's misguided flare-up, announced that the planks in the platforms of their respective parties had already been fully realized by the efforts of the President.

The Republican Party died with Estrella Ureña. In 1946 Trujillo invited the Communists to organize an opposition party. The Communists were all in exile or in hiding, but on hearing of the invitation they came out of the woodwork and began to clout the government—from soap boxes, in a hastily published newspaper, and with slogans on placards publicly displayed in organized demonstrations. Trujillo forthwith smashed the Communist Party, killing several of its leaders and throwing others into prison.

By March of this year there was another change in the political scene. The Workers' Independence Party headed by Dr. Medrano had disappeared and been replaced by the Labor Party, which named as its president tial candidate Francisco Prats Ramirez. Prats Ramirez is a journalist-columnist formerly on the staff of La Opinion. In his writings he has expressed unreserved praise of Trujillo and his regime. Rafael Espaillat has been on a mysterious mission with the Dominican embassy in Washington. He was recalled by Trujillo early in March to run for the presidency against him.

Estrella Ureña in 1945 and the militant Communists in 1946 taught Trujillo the wisdom of having fool-proof safeguards against oppositionists, even those hand-picked from among his friends and political associates. So late last March laws appropriate to the situation were rushed through the Dominican Congress.

Law 1387 was passed by the Chamber of Deputies on March 26, by the Senate on the twenty-seventh, was signed by the President on the same day, and was published in his newspaper, La Nación, on the twenty-eighth. Article I of Law 1387 states that any person of Dominican nationality who with the purpose of defaming the republic or its institutions spreads false and malicious news among foreigners residing in or passing through the Dominican Republic, or who transmits such news abroad by any means of communication, will be condemned to from two to three years in prison. If this offense is repeated, the offender is liable to the maximum penalty of the law, which is five years in prison.

An amendment to Article 26 of Law 1384, also signed by the President on March 27, reads: Anyone in Dominican territory found receiving or trying to obtain cooperation from any foreign state or its agents, or any foreign institution, or any individuals in a foreign country, for the purpose of war against the republic or its government, or of manifesting any hostile feeling against the republic or its government, will be condemned to thirty years at hard labor. Another paragraph of the amendment was designed to intimidate Dominicans abroad, chiefly, of course, the political exiles. It forbids Dominicans anywhere to seek any financial help, official or private, for political activities against the government. The penalty is thirty years at hard labor.

Such is Trujillo's current version of democracy in Santo Domingo.

Several factors have forced Trujillo into decorating his political display window with a few spurious concessions to democracy. One is that Spruille Braden's anti-totalitarian policies have met with far greater acclaim in Santo Domingo than in Argentina. More important is the growing opposition both within and outside the country. Trujillo hopes to be able to say to the world at large and Washington in particular: See, I have been duly elected by the people of this republic! Then, he imagines, his critics at home and abroad will be silenced.

The feeling against Trujillo has become so widespread that he may even decide his only hope of retaining power is to relinquish his cherished title of "Presidente." He set a precedent for just such a maneuver in 1938, when his butchery of some 15,000 innocent Haitians outraged the world. In total disrepute Trujillo withdrew from the 1938 elections and had the title of Presidente pinned to a puppet. But he remained the Benefactor, the Savior of the Republic, the Generalissimo, and became a greater power than ever.

In 1942 two political parties put forward a candidate for the presidency—Trujillo's established Partido Dominicano and the newly formed Partido Trujillista. After the balloting the government announced that 391,708 votes had been cast for the Partido Dominicano's candidate, Trujillo, and 190,229 for the Partido Trujillista's candidate, Trujillo. The total of 581,937 was almost one-third of the nation's population and almost four times as many votes as were ever cast in a free Dominican election. Since women did not have the vote in 1942, the number of eligible voters was probably not more than 150,000.

If Trujillo decides upon a retreat in the manner of 1938, he will have to act before May 16, ostensibly retiring from the political scene on the plea of illness. His megalomania will never allow a rigged election to produce a majority of votes for another candidate. Late in March he apparently had every intention of seeing the election farce through to the end. Attired in all the splendor of an admiral out of Gilbert and Sullivan, he boarded the flagship of the Dominican navy and toured the coast cities of the country, some twenty small and large craft trailing behind. Wherever the Trujillo party disembarked, bands played, soldiers paraded, and the President addressed the populace, declaring that he, the Benefactor, would see that they had more of the same "benefits" after his reelection. While the Generalissimo talked through the gorgeously plumed hat of the Admiral, the opposition candidates repeated that the planks in their respective platforms had already been realized by the Benefactor.

The final election figures will no doubt be arrived at some time before election day, at the very latest on May 15. How they will read depends upon how well Trujillo can control his megalomania. He would be well advised to have it appear that he won merely by a fairly comfortable margin, for that might silence some of his foreign critics. Trujillo must certainly realize the advantage of making such a concession to probability and is probably even toying with the idea, but no one should be surprised to hear that he was "unanimously" elected for the fourth consecutive time.

If he allows the official figures to show a fair-sized vote for the opposition, and Dominicans are thereby encouraged to exhibit their distaste for the regime, the Benefactor will be prepared for any emergency.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The Vanishing Building Boom

THIS is the season when the thoughts of realtors turn to subdivisions and the construction industries normally swing into their most vigorous stride. But this year many builders are looking at rows of unsold homes and putting their blueprints back in the files. Of course, there is still plenty of demand for their product—but not at current prices.

Among the industries which have been pricing themselves out of the market since the OPA was abolished last fall, those manufacturing builders' supplies take a foremost place. The Federal Housing Authority's index of building materials (average of 1935-39 equals 100) rose from 153.8 in November, 1946, to 177.9 in February, with the cost of lumber alone jumping 44 per cent. This advance, coming on top of a long steep rise from pre-war levels, seems to have broken the back of the market for the time being. It means that a two-bedroom house with a minimum number of amenities is now in the $10,000 class, requiring a purchaser who must have a weekly income of at least $90 if carrying costs are not to overburden his personal budget.

In 1940, according to Business Week of February 22, a home seeker in a Kansas City suburb could buy for $10,500 a brick-and-frame house on a corner plot a lot and a half wide. It had six rooms, including three bedrooms, two baths, and a basement recreation room. In the same development today the same money will buy only a five-room, two-bedroom frame bungalow with one bath and space for a basement game room. And it will be on an inside lot. Even families whose incomes can swing a proposition of this kind are unlikely to be tempted, since they fear that within a few years its resale price will be several thousand dollars lower. Unless their in-laws are unbearable, they will go on "doubting up" and wait for costs to come down.

A considerable fraction of the emergency demand for new homes seems to have been satisfied last year. At this time there are several thousand completed houses in New York City and its suburbs for which purchasers at present prices cannot be found, and similar stories are coming in from other centers. As a result, some builders are offering small price cuts—big ones would ruin them—while others have stopped building. In January 73,273 permits were issued for new houses, in February 47,512, in March 33,551. During the same months actual residential building fell 20 per cent below government forecasts. Consequently official estimates of housing expenditure for 1947 have been drastically revised from the original figure of $6,000,000,000 to something between $4,250,000,000 and $4,800,000,000.

Nor is residential building the only branch of the construction industry which has been perceptibly slowed down in recent months. The latest four-week daily-average figure of engineering construction awards published by the Engi- neering News-Record stands at $18,936,000, compared with $22,341,000 a year ago. In March privately financed industrial construction was 18 per cent below the October-November peak. Business interests, for all their dislike of buyers' strikes, are in fact staging one of their own, and only concerns desperately in need of larger space are contracting for new plant. With costs 100 per cent or more above pre-war levels, they too are sitting back and waiting for prices to drop.

The combined slump in residential and business construction is a pretty serious portent for our economy as a whole. Today the share of construction in total national output is far less than it was in the booming twenties, and unless this ratio is improved we are likely to see a decline in capital formation below the level needed to sustain our present high national income.

It may not be too late to save the day if a really effective reduction in costs can be achieved in the near future. One good sign is a softening in lumber prices, and a builder friend tells me that various subcontractors in the New York district are beginning to trim their rates. On the other hand, the attitude of so important a firm in the building-supply field as Johns-Manville is not encouraging. Just the other day the chairman of this company, deploring the Washington "ballyhoo" that was leading people "to expect too big a reduction in prices," said: "There is not much room for lowering prices of Johns-Manville products, and I don't think we will lower them." In the next breath he added, "We are in a position to lower them if we have to in the event of a recession."

There can be no doubt that manufacturers of building supplies are making plenty of money. The April issue of the National City Bank Letter provides the following comparison of 1945 and 1946 earnings:

	Net Profits
	1945	1946
24 lumber companies	$20,165,000	$43,764,000
17 paint and varnish	20,675,000	43,764,000
23 cement	4,634,000	17,186,000
37 stone and clay products	29,047,000	61,819,000
64 building heating, plumbing . . .	42,359,000	62,051,000

Returns for the first quarter of this year show an accelerated upward trend, with profits of individual companies two, three, and four times as large as in the first three months of 1946.

Such profits are obviously the fruits of near-capacity production, which will not continue for long if potential consumers of houses and factories refuse to buy. Yet, my builder friend tells me, a moderate reduction in costs—20 to 25 per cent—would almost certainly bring back the now wilting demand to a vigorous growth. The potential market for housing, at any rate, remains enormous. According to the tremendous survey of "America's needs and resources" just published by the Twentieth Century Fund, 16,000,000 out of a total of 37,000,000 dwellings in the United States need replacement or major repairs. The satisfaction of these needs would make possible a sustained housing boom, but until all factors in the industry—suppliers, contractors, and labor—make a concerted effort to reduce costs, that is likely to remain an idle dream.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

I RECENTLY READ an interesting if gloomy account in Horizon for January of the behavior, since the defeat, of German writers who remained in the Third Reich. It was written by Heinrich Fischer, whose name is not familiar to me but who seems to be very well informed. According to Mr. Fischer, "Grotesque confusion reigns. . . . It is so grotesque that one is often scarcely able to distinguish which of the German writers was a criminal accomplice of Hitler and which was one of Hitler's victims."

In his opinion the roots of this confusion were imbedded in pre-Hitler Germany.

In other countries the creative writer sets the intellectual fashion; in Germany the fashion creates the writer. There have been cases where German writers, within a single decade, have changed not only their political convictions but also their style, and their whole approach to literature and life, and changed them not only once but three or four times.

He cites Gerhart Hauptmann and Hans Carossa as extreme examples, and says that the "easy, automatic conversion" to National Socialism of most of the writers who remained in Germany after Hitler came to power was only a new and terrible manifestation of an old tendency.

After the defeat writers who had collaborated with the Nazis unblushingly offered their services to the victors—as if National Socialism had merely been another unsuccessful fashion. They apologized for their "weakness" but in terms which gave no indication that they would not be "weak" again if the occasion arose. Mr. Fischer quotes as example the apology, or rather the apologetics, of Otto Flake, one of the fashionable authors of the Nazi years.

We yielded to pressure. Certainly we yielded to pressure, but that was in innumerable cases with the significance of the Chinese philosophy of Tao—to bend, not to break, but to survive. In Germany we have learned the lesson that one should develop one's personality in fields other than political. The example of Goethe is still our persuasive teacher [the italics, I assume, are Mr. Fischer's, and no wonder].

Thomas Mann's refusal to return to Germany—his refusal, as he put it, "to set myself up as the standard bearer of what seems to me at the present moment at any rate an entirely fictitious modern German movement"—gave rise to a wave of apologetics all over Germany. (Mann's refusal was contained in a letter, of which Mr. Fischer prints the important passages, written in response to Walter von Molo, who appealed to Mann in an open letter printed in the press to come back and be the leader of the German intellectuals, "to march forward in the very forefront of the battle.") It was a novelist, Frank Thiess, who hit upon the theory of the "inner emigration." He and other writers who had continued to function under the Nazi regime were, he said, "secret émigrés," and although their books had brought them credit and cash, the internal suffering of their souls had been indescribable as they thought how powerless they were to ward off the inevitable fate of having to sign up as members of the Goebbels Chamber of Culture.

The worst of it was, as Mr. Fischer says, that "the language of these new champions" expressed the "same old divorce from reality," the "isolation of mind," the "nebulous mysticism" which he considers to have been the bane of German writers for a generation at least and one of the elements that made it possible for Hitler to come to power in the first place. Witness this passage from Thiess's reply to Thomas Mann:

We know not from what heights, nor from whose hands, the seed will fall which is to make fruitful the German soil, but suffering also is seed and springs up transformed from the dying grain of wheat up to the light. . . . A God, who led this people into the deepest hell, etc., etc.

Which might be described as full of sound and Führer and signifying exactly nothing.

A few writers, says Mr. Fischer, have sharply criticized this "pseudo-metaphysical mush." He notes that the Austrians have shown more sense of reality than the Germans; and he quotes a rather crude but telling comment by the Viennese Alfred Polgar on the "involuntary Hitler authors."

All these artists of the Hitler Reich had to—force majeure!—enter the Literary Chambers, the Culture Chambers, the Theater Chambers, or the Press Chambers. But I cannot bring myself to weep for them with all my heart. My sympathy is reserved for those who had to enter the Gas Chambers.

SOME WRITERS who remained in Germany, as Mr. Fischer is careful to point out, did pursue the path of "inner emigration." One of these was the East Prussian novelist Ernst Wiechert, who was consistently anti-Nazi and was interned for a time at Buchenwald. And he is also one of the few who, since the defeat, have spoken plainly to his fellow-Germans, including writers, about their responsibilities and obligations.

Knowing this I picked up with a good deal of interest a novel by Wiechert, "The Girl and the Ferryman," which has just been published here by the Pilot Press ($2.75). The jacket makes much, understandably, of his consistent opposition to the Nazi regime. It has this to say about the novel itself: "Some may see in the clear lyrical outlines of 'The Girl and the Ferryman' a symbol of the plight of a humanity which nearly loses its way in its struggle with evil."

I was disturbed to discover a tale of a strong simple peasant and of a girl who comes into his life and transforms it; to find evil personified in a sex-obsessed Mormon preacher—he wreaks his will on innocent female converts, and his influence, we are led to believe, brings on a series of natural disasters. However, being predisposed to Mr. Wiechert, I let this pass, and having been urged to read significance into the tale I conscientiously tried to do so. The Mormon Maclean must be Hitler. among the present prosaic communicants of that religion, the device of using an early archaic Mormon as devil seemed a bit far-fetched, but I reflected that an anti-Nazi in Hitler's Germany should be allowed a good deal of license.) The girl must symbolize the German people.

It was only when I had read a good many pages that it occurred to me that the novel had nothing at all to do with recent German history and was probably an early work of Wiechert's—he is now sixty—which was being published here now on the strength of his present reputation as one of the few German writers in Germany who managed to survive honorably.

The writing shows talent. It is lucid and "lyrical" as publishers say. But though the vessel is translucent, the contents are murky. The book is permeated by that crude and utterly humorless "mysticism" which we have come to think of, alas, as Germanic and which Hitler exploited.

Upon inquiry I learned that "The Girl and the Ferryman" was first published in 1932. I think that fact should have been clearly stated on the jacket and in the book. For I suspect that most readers will get the impression, as I did, that this is a recent book out of the "new" Germany and will be interested in it for what it may reveal of the present, and possible future, of that unhappy land. And they may well conclude that if this is what an anti-Nazi writer has to offer after twelve years' experience of Hitler's rule, they are justified in feeling pretty hopeless about the German future.

AS ONE WHO ENJOYS and often perpetrates puns and plays on words I resent the way they are being done to death for commercial purposes by the writers of advertising copy. Eventually the public prints will come to have a resemblance, strictly coincidental, to the pages of James Joyce, and a form of verbal play which is fun as long as it is spontaneous will be utterly discredited. Moreover, puns unspontaneously arrived at are dangerous to those who spin them. Not long ago I met a copy writer who literally conversed in puns and plays on words. It was evident that he found it as trying as I did, but it was also evident that he was powerless to control a habit probably had its beginnings in an advertising conference when it was up to him to produce a punch line. The copy writer who thought of calling a dress a "Sunday supplement" and went on to murmur something about "a month of Sundays" had better take himself in hand.

Advertising in general, it seems to me, is reflecting more and more that frenzy of the copy writer in the competitive society who knows that he must find a new way of praising a product or find a new way of making a living. The advertisements for perfumes have long since gone berserk in their efforts to prove that a whiff of this or that fragrance will cause even men of distinction to go berserk. The most recent example I've seen of this genre shows two lovers floating and embracing in mid-air in the vicinity of a slender tower in a background suggesting fairyland. It did seem to me that they had gone too far, and that it was too bad they didn't have a more secure and private place to repair to until the fumes were off.

Observing another advertisement for perfume, I was rather pleased to see, for a change, not a scene of artificially induced passion but the head of a pretty girl with spring flowers in her hair. But they were not in her hair, they were her hair. What's more, two delicate tendrils formed her brows, and her eyes and mouth were really two blue-birds and a scarlet tanager.

What intrigues me most, however, is the advertising that fastens on a quality which is completely irrelevant to the uses of the product. The outstanding example is the claim for the ball pen that it will write under water. I am now awaiting the appearance of an advertisement which tells me that another unique feature of the ball pen is that a man who manufactures them recently flew around the world in seventy-eight hours and fifty-five minutes.

SOMEONE HAS HANDED me a copy of the Contemporary Writer, a small four-page bulletin. The main headline announces that Fast (Howard) and Caldwell (Erskine) have been elected chairmen of Contemporary Writers, an organization, and half of a column is devoted to this news. The rest of the column deals with the recent barring from public-school libraries of "Citizen Tom Paine" by Howard Fast. The author of the month, featured on page two, is Julius Fast. On page three is a letter from Howard Fast saying that he is extremely happy that he has been chosen as one of the chairmen of Contemporary Writers. On page four a novel by Barbara Fast is listed with a number of other books and stories. There is also a report saying that "CW's new co-chairman, H. Fast, hasn't gone Hollywood, but two of his books have." At the bottom of this page is a coupon for those who wish to join CW, which starts off with "Dear Howard Fast and Erskine Caldwell." In the correspondence column is a letter signed Luke Faust. Must be a typographical error.

Apologia for the White Paper

PALESTINE: STAR OR CRESCENT?

By Nevill Barbour. The Odyssey Press. $3.

NEVILL BARBOUR'S book is, as I read it, an attempt to prove that the Jews have very little historical connection with the land of Palestine, and that "the existing population of Palestine should be formed into an independent state." It is, in brief, an apologia for the notorious White Paper of 1939, for under existing conditions an independent state would mean of course simply another Arab state. Worldwide Jewry should have learned by this time that minority guaranties mean very little in the Arab world.

Mr. Barbour deals in gentle terms with Haj Amin el Husseini, the former Mufti of Jerusalem. This is the way he describes the Mufti's activities in Jerusalem: "Rashid Ali, the Prime Minister, who headed the rising, together with Haj Amin and other leaders, found his way to Germany, whence the two principal leaders indulged in radio propaganda against Britain." Actually the Mufti took an active and leading part in the campaign for the extermination of European Jewry. His files, which were captured with him in Germany at the end of the war, show conclusively that he broadcast repeatedly from Berlin urging that the Jews be killed. For example, on November 3, 1943, in one of these numerous exhortations to the Arabs, he said, "The Treaty of Versailles was a disaster for the Germans as well as the Arabs, but the Germans know how to get rid of the Jews."

Mr. Barbour contends that the Palestinian Arabs were "inclined to sympathize with the democratic rather than the Fascist powers, in spite of the propaganda in which the latter indulged." He goes on to say that they not only abstained from any action which might hinder the war effort, but also "contributed quite substantially to military and labor forces recruited locally." Actually, as the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry unanimously found, the Arab community of Palestine showed itself largely indifferent to the outcome of the war. Out of a population twice as large as the Jewish, only 12,445 Palestinian Arabs were recruited for military service as compared with a total Jewish recruitment of 27,028.

Mr. Barbour's book has the outward appearance of careful scholarship, but it contains many statements such as those I have described which are in conflict with the facts as the Committee of Inquiry found them. His book does, however, point up the desperate need for a definitive American policy, not only in relation to Palestine, but to the entire Middle East—a policy of which Palestine must be the center, for it is only in Palestine in the whole of the Middle East that one finds democracy in action, a dynamic, positive democracy in the everyday life of the people.

It is true that Palestinian Jewry has been so deeply concerned with the matter of simple survival that it has not been able to do as much as it would like to raise the living standards of the Palestinian Arabs, but a real start has been made in spite of the opposition of colonial officials who have little sympathy with this great experiment of the Jewish National Home.

BARTLEY C. CRUM

Shakespeare as Theater

PREFACES TO SHAKESPEARE. Volume I. By Harley Granville-Barker. Princeton University Press. $5.

IT IS arguable, I think, that Granville-Barker has contributed more to our understanding of Shakespeare than any other commentator of this century. If he has, it is because he has put to the test of the theater all the enormous burden of suggestions about the plays which has accumulated in the last hundred and fifty years. An unhappy, obsessive concern for particular aspects of the plays has characterized commentary since sometime in the eighteenth century, say when Morgann began to weave his fancies and Doctor Johnson's saving common sense went out of style. What Morgann did by way of fanciful elaboration of a single character is child's play, of course, to what the literary specialists of an age of specialization have been able to do; we have been bullied in turn by all of them, from Stoll to Knight.

Nor has it been an easy thing to bring all these suggestions to the test of the theater. One of the important reasons why the study of Shakespeare has withdrawn from the theater is the incredible persistence—exceptions like Macready have been rare—with which the theater has concentrated on everything that does not matter. The judgments of people like Lamb and Bradley, as Barker points out in the revised section of his "Lear" preface, are based on the assumption that this stupid disregard for the end object of the drama which has characterized the commercial theater from the time of Lamb to Miss Webster is inherent in the medium. The assumption is absurd of course; Shakespeare's plays were written for the theater by a very practical man of the theater; there could be no better evidence of the potentialities for greatness possessed by the medium. But to achieve the kind of knowledge both of medium and dramatist which will allow you to bring Shakespeare to the test, not of "theater" in the Broadway or drama-school sense, but of the theater in the best sense, is not easy. That knowledge Granville-Barker, perhaps alone in our time, had. (How he got it is shown, at least in part, in Shaw's recent tribute in Harper's, so characteristically called Barker's Wild Oats.)

The result of his systematic application of this knowledge is the disciplined development of sensitivity to Shakespeare's plays in the only direction where to go to the extreme is not to become absurd. Barker always sees a Shakespeare play in a possible production. This production is idealized in the sense that it assumes, just as we assume when we are talking about music, the maximum skill in the performers; it is not idealized in the sense that it assumes effects which are not possible at all within the medium. Thus all the viable insights which we owe to the closet critics, from Coleridge to the present, are visualized for us in a possible production in which, at every step, the inner intent of the play is being realized by characters in action. Few things, I believe, can be more exciting to a lover of the theater than to see how Barker works through to the heart of a play's intent, and then discusses with his wonderful and persuasive insight the precise way in which each scene—and, where there is space, each speech, each piece of business—can make its contribution to that intent in performance. He draws out, speech by speech, the ebb and flow of feeling and attitude beneath speech and gesture in such a scene as the meeting of Caesar and Antony (II, ii), or—and how different a scene it is—in the concluding scene of "Cymbeline"; he never lets us forget the significance of what he calls the "physical aspect of a play's action"—the revelation of character in the almost silent Hamlet who listens to the player king, the effect of Portia's and Nerissa's watching as Bassanio "comments on the caskets to himself," the complete rightness of Cordelia's strained silence as she watches the newly awakened Lear for signs of sanity ("No cause, no cause"); he shows us the hints of tempo, tone, and manner which a producer learned in the Elizabethan stage and practiced in the theater can see. Everything of this kind is laid before us with the easy persuasiveness of a man who wears his learning lightly, never rides a hobby, and knows that the theater is not just a gregarious art but a great one too.

It is a credit to the Princeton Press that they are at last making these prefaces available in America. Five of them are in this first volume: the long "Hamlet," "Lear," "The Merchant of Venice," "Antony and Cleopatra," "Cymbeline"; and the rest are to follow in a second volume. Mr. Conkwright has made a handsome and manageable book of this first group of prefaces, despite their length, and I wish the footnote on page 77 referred to the proper page in this edition instead of to the proper page in the English edition.

profession with one-sided information about the economic problems of medical care and the course of events in this country and abroad.

This handy little volume reviews the technical advances which have made medical services much more effective than formerly but also much more costly. It summarizes the social and economic changes in American life which have made it more difficult for most people to meet these costs. It recapitulates the problems of medical care in urban and rural areas; of needed extensions of public-health services and tax-supported medical care; of medical education, hospitalization, nursing, preventive medicine, and group medical practice. Neither the facts nor the ideas presented with them are original contributions. But they are compounded here in polished capsules, with all the rough edges removed and under an attractive label, so that they will be digested by a great many doctors, dentists, administrators, and lay hospital trustees, to whom the same dose in the pages of The Nation would be wholly unpalatable.

The committee's recommendations sum up to two: extend group medical practice as a means of improving the quality of medical care; promote voluntary health insurance as the chief means of making it easier for most people to pay for it. Government should help in various already accepted ways and might subsidize voluntary plans, but governmental health insurance would be a dangerous experiment.

These recommendations are essentially the same as those which were made by the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care in 1932, and which the Journal of the American Medical Association then damned as "socialism and communism, inciting to revolution." Today the American Medical Association and many of its state medical societies are themselves committed to the extension of voluntary health insurance, and group practice gets official lip-service.

Unfortunately the Academy committee does not even explore the really difficult problems of public subsidy to private health-insurance plans, a rapidly emerging issue to which a real contribution might have been made. Today the issues of medical charity versus health insurance and of compulsory versus

All Done with Words

LIFE AND THE DREAM. By Mary Colum. Doubleday and Company. $3.50.

THE varieties of autobiography are nearly as numerous as those of religious experience. There is the autobiography which is designed to show the narrator in all his or her nakedness, with the faults made into glories; such as the work of a Casanova, a Rousseau, or, on a very different plane, a Peggy Guggenheim. There is the anonymous autobiographer who for the benefit of posterity notes down his reminiscences of those he has known who were great, though he himself may be negligible—Henry Crabb Robinson with his diary and his inquisitive nose. Then there is the autobiographer who becomes an artist and succeeds in creating a mythology in which everyone, great or little, plays a definite part; it is to such books, written, say, by Benjamin Robert Haydon, W. Graham Robertson, or Elizabeth Bowen, that the reader returns again and again.

Mrs. Colum's memoirs are of this third class. She does not retail scandal or presume upon her friendship with the well-known to indulge in witticisms at their expense. When she disapproves she does so out of her own strong-mindedness and not to catch the pennies of her readers. This is to say that her book is an honest and a valuable one. Naturally, as the friend of such figures as Elinor Wylie and James Joyce, her book will become a source for information about them, but even if she had known nobody of importance, "Life and the Dream" would have been a book to read and remember. Its picture of an Irish childhood is as brilliantly observed and written as anything by Maria Edgeworth.

To find fault with such a book may appear ungrateful, but I cannot refrain from making one protest: I think that Mrs. Colum is less than generous to Harriet Shaw Weaver, who ran the New Freewoman, a suffragette periodical which later became the Egoist, serializing both Joyce's "Portrait of the Artist" and Wyndham Lewis's "Tarr." Miss Weaver gave Joyce a very large sum of money and she gave it to him in a lump; Joyce certainly enjoyed this temporary feeling of extreme wealth and behaved as if the money was elastic. But to blame Miss Weaver for her kindness seems hardly fair; what fault there was was on Joyce's side, though it is difficult to condemn a man who had known such poverty for suddenly blossoming into a spendthrift.

However, this is the only point at which Mrs. Colum seems to be unjust; her treatment of Elinor Wylie, who was a difficult and intolerant snob, is more than kind. Her picture of the Irish Celtic revival is sympathetic and carefully observed, and she weaves a pattern out of the characters and their idiosyncrasies that will be a great help to any student of the period.

Perhaps the key to the charm of "Life and the Dream" lies in a phrase which Mrs. Colum uses about one of her stories: "Like a lot of my countrymen, I had fooled the Englishman with words." She knows how to use words to make her writing vivid, and is sufficiently skilled in spell-binding to convince at least one reader that today the minstrel boy would not need to go to the wars to find fame—the publishers of London and New York would arrange it for him.

WITH deep regret I must postpone my attempt to review Chaplin's "Monsieur Verdoux." I cannot hope to do it justice, but I do prefer to discuss it a little more coherently than I have been able to, to date. In case this leaves any doubt of my opinion of the film, let me say that I think it is one of the best movies ever made, easily the most exciting and most beautiful since "Modern Times." I will add that I think most of the press on the picture, and on Chaplin, is beyond disgrace. I urge everyone to see "Monsieur Verdoux" who can get to it.

Well, to resume my skulk through the alphabet. I was down through I as in Ivan. Meanwhile a B, three C's, and a particularly fragrant E have sprung up behind me.

Christ. God, Man or Myth?

Did Christ himself write down any record of his life? If so, where are these writings today? Do they exist in any museum or library or sacred shrine? Can you find a trace of them in the vast and mysterious subterranean archives of the Vatican in Rome? The answer is NO! Nowhere has any man been able to discover a single word that Jesus wrote!

Who, then, wrote the Christian Gospels? And when were they written? By some historian after the death of Christ? Or are these Gospels merely myths and legends handed down to us from a civilization that existed long before the time of Christ?

At last you can get the FACTS about Christ and the Christian Church in a startling new book just off the press called "A Shield Has Two Sides" written by the eminent author, scholar and historian Wallace Stockwell.

Here is a book for people who are not afraid to look reality in the face! A book for men and women who refuse to wear mental blinders! It reveals TRUTHS about the Christian Church of today—both Catholic and Protestant—that will shock many. For it pulls no punches and presents facts known to but few.

"A Shield Has Two Sides" is not sold through bookstores for reasons you will readily understand after you have read the first few pages. But the Publishers will gladly send a copy on approval to any sincere seeker of knowledge, over 21, who seeks unbiased facts about the Christian Church and how it functions today. Dramatic illustrations. First editions, which well may become collectors' items, are priced at $1.00.

agliavini (Almaviva), Tito Gobbi (Figaro), Italo Tajo (Basilio), and their competent and attractive Italians. The sets are rather pathetically flea-bitten, the sound is not awfully good, the lighting is drab; you watch the conventions of opera through the most transparent of movie conventions. I suppose it is rather dull, but I liked it.

"Carnegie Hall" is about the thickest and sourest mess of musical mulligan-soup I have yet had to sit down to, a sort of aural compromise between the Johnstown flood and the Black Hole of Calcutta. I have an idea that some of the music was well done, but I was exhausted by suffering and rage that I can't possibly be sure of what. However, as a gnarled mirror of American musical taste at its worst, and as a record of what various prominent musicians look like under strange professional circumstances, it is a permanently fascinating and valuable show. There is, for a single instance, the protected spectacle of Stokowsky—shot from the floor—who seems to be undergoing for the public benefit an experience, while conducting a portion of Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, which men of coarser clay wish exclusively on women, or perhaps on albums of prefabricated trade-union folk songs. I am sorry to be writing this way about "Carnegie Hall," for I can't avoid feeling that some rather good intentions were involved in it. But then I can't doubt that Hitler had good intentions. He and I just didn't see eye to eye.

"The Captive Heart," a British movie about prisoners of war, has been greeted as a masterpiece by some of the reviewers who, only too literally, couldn't "see" "Monsieur Verdoux." So now we know what a masterpiece is: something that isn't either really bad or by any generosity really good; another of those group-as-hero stories, a dangerous cliché in the first place, in which each member of the group is just one more cliché; and something truly creative for Michael Redgrave, a Czech who for self-protection is forced to take on a dead Englishman's identity and to write the widow love letters—with his left hand, of course, in order not to tip his mitt. This decent, mediocre film is sincerely but often cornily written and is in general honestly acted. It all takes its measure—about ankle high—against a number of beautiful shots which were made in a camp in North Germany. These shots are made in a style closely related to the style which is called archaic, or worse, when Chaplin uses it; and Chaplin uses it all the time, for incomparably richer and subtler purposes.

"Carnival in Costa Rica" is a Technicolor musical with a score by Lecuona. I liked the score, some fine Costa Rican backgrounds, a medium-good solo by Massine, who designed the generally uninteresting dances, and the dancing and acting of Vera-Ellen. I even liked Dick Haymes. I was also interested to see that Ann Revere, as a Kansan, was shown to be happily married to J. Carroll Naish, as a thoroughly Costa Rican coffee planter. If this sort of un-American propaganda takes decent hold in Hollywood, the day will come when the husband of a high-bridged daughter of the Confederacy will shag into the scuppernong arbor playing ootchmagootch to a slice of watermelon and reciting "Ballad for Americans," between spat seeds, in an Oxford accent.

"The Egg and I" asks you to believe in, and laugh at, Fred MacMurray and Claudette Colbert as nauseatingly clownish city people who try their hands at poultry farming. Marjorie Main, in an occasional fit of fine, wild comedy, picks the show up and brandishes it as if she were wringing its neck. I wish to God she had.

AN ENGLISH critic, Martin Cooper, writing in the Spectator not long ago, characterized Delius as "an artist with a vein of unquestionable originality, a musician-poet with an exquisite sense of orchestral color and a haunting sense of the evanescence of beauty"; described "the process familiar in his orchestral works by which any melody . . . that appears immediately becomes a melisma, an ornamental phrase varied and repeated but never growing or developing into a melodic line"; and contended that "the static and amorphous quality of his inspiration absolutely disqualifies him from the larger forms," but enables him to produce "the beautiful and original miniatures for orchestra."

The truth of his statements is demonstrated by two works that have just appeared on records: on the one hand the monotonously amorphous Violin Concerto, well-performed by Sammons and the Liverpool Philharmonic under Sargent, and beautifully recorded (Columbia Set 672; $4); on the other hand the hauntingly lovely "Walk to the Paradise Gardens" from "A Village Romeo and Juliet," well-performed by Goossens with the Cincinnati Symphony, and excellently recorded (Victor 11-9493; $1)—though my copy wavers in pitch and has bad surfaces.

But even as a composer of miniatures Delius has a stature, and his art has a magnitude, that one begins to appreciate, if one hasn't done so before, when one hears a piece like Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia"—another miniature, and certainly lovely, but so slight in comparison with the Delius piece. It is well-performed by Constant Lambert with the Philharmonia Orchestra and well-recorded on a Columbia single (71956-D; $1).

As for Victor, it offers, among other things, a set (1106; $3.85) of Brahms's Sonata Opus 120 No. 2. This is a work for clarinet and piano, which Benny Goodman and Nadia Reisenberg recorded for Columbia; but Brahms also made a version for viola and piano, which Primrose and Kapell have recorded for Victor. In either form the work is one of the many of Brahms that I find mechanically contrived and boring; and if I prefer the viola-and-piano version it may be only because both musicians play it with vitality whereas in the other performance Goodman's playing was lifeless, and in this music even Primrose's excess of vitality—which has Kapell overwrought at times—is preferable to none at all. The Victor performance also is more richly recorded than the Columbia; but I recall wavering pitch on at least one side of the Victor set.

There is a large Brahms public, and a Brahms cult for things like this sonata; but what has led Victor to expend on Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony the recording and production it cannot afford for Schnabel's performances of Beethoven and Mozart is beyond my comprehension. The uninteresting work is well-performed by Beecham with the London Philharmonic (Set 1104; $4.85), its high point being the beautifully contoured inflection of the cantilena of the brief Andante movement. And the recorded sound of the performance is spacious and rich, except on the first side in my set, where it is unresonantly dull. Also the surfaces of my copy are noisy.

On a single (10-1278; $.75) are two spirituals, "Poor Me" and "Hold On!"—well-sung by Marian Anderson to piano accompaniments by Rupp that are, as always, unique in the way they create continuous life around the voice even when they are no more than a few quiet and widely spaced chords. On another single (11-9519; $1) are Horowitz's mannered performance of Chopin's Valse Opus 64 No. 2, which is not clear in execution as it comes off the record, another mannered performance of Mendelssohn's Elegy Opus 85 No. 4, and a surprisingly straightforward performance of his Spring Song—the two Mendelssohn pieces being well-reproduced, but the surfaces of my copy being poor. And on still another (11-9263; $1) are the Barcarolle and Elle a fui, la tourterelle from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann," sung poorly by Novotna.

Picasso Appeals

Dear Sirs: The following is the text of a cable just received from Pablo Picasso in France. Picasso has recently been appointed UNESCO delegate of the Spanish Republican government.

The Spanish Aid Advisory Committee, with administrators of the Unitarian Service Committee, has examined the situation of numerous Spanish Republicans with tuberculosis, in France. The percentage of deaths from tuberculosis has increased enormously here as a result of war sufferings, and the number of beds available for tubercular cases has diminished. There are now one-fourth less than before the war. The problem of the ill Spaniards becomes more and more agonizing. Establishing of sanitariums for them is an urgent task. We appeal to the generosity of our American friends to help us meet the tragic situation of tubercular Spanish Republicans.

PABLO PICASSO

In America the Spanish Refugee Appeal bears the main responsibility of these people. Funds raised on Tag Days, May 8, 9, and 10, will be used exclusively for the maintenance and expansion of medical facilities for them. I proudly join Picasso in appealing to the "generosity of our American friends." The address of the Spanish Refugee Appeal is 192 Lexington Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

A Challenge . . .

Dear Sirs: Nothing is more important today than to understand what the Soviet Union is all about, because peace depends mainly on American-Soviet understanding. The clearest possible example of how not to attain understanding or peace is Sidney Hook's review of my book, "Soviet Philosophy," in The Nation of February 15.

His method is to dwell exclusively on Soviet sins. . . . I believe this approach is just as absurd as that which would claim that the Soviet Union represents the embodiment of social perfection. The point is, we are all living in sin, but all major powers must join together in the effort to build peace. We and Russia can do this if we pay at least as much attention to our areas of agreement and our community of ideals as to our respective sins and our differences of methods.

The approach I recommend would be impossible in the case of Nazi-Fascism because its philosophy teaches that the values of war are superior to those of peace, that war is desirable in itself, and the highest form of personal and national conduct. Soviet philosophy teaches the opposite. That is why there is philosophical basis for peaceful cooperation with the Soviet Union. That basis should be further explored. Isn't that sense? . . .

If anyone still seriously believes that Soviet philosophy is essentially identical with Nazi-Fascist philosophy, I should be glad to disprove it in detail. Let us not fool ourselves. If the Soviet Union were as bad or as similar to Nazi-Fascism as Hook seems to imagine, we ought to prepare for war, and we would be justified in invoking armed force. I challenge Hook to deny this.

It is amusing to see that his lengthy "review" contains not the slightest analysis of the vast majority of themes taken up in the book: the social theory of historical materialism; the concept of Soviet democracy as applied to problems of economics, education, race, war, and religion; the ethical theory of socialist humanism; the ontology and logic of dialectical materialism. Yet these are central. Why his silence?

As to what Mr. Hook does say, I have seldom seen so much misinformation, misinterpretation, hearsay, and gossip so abusively expressed. . . . Hook, oddly enough, speaks of honesty. I challenge him to affirm, in good faith, those ideals of Soviet philosophy with which we can cooperate and those accomplishments of Soviet Russia which we can respect. If he is honest, and wants peace, he must be willing to do this.

JOHN SOMERVILLE
New York, April 16

. . . and a Response

Dear Sirs: Mr. Somerville's political tirade in reply to my review is completely irrelevant to the criticisms I made of his book. I cited evidence that he had misstated the theory of Soviet philosophy as expressed in its authoritative writings and that he had suppressed the relevant facts about its practice. These are serious charges. Instead of meeting them on their own ground, he introduces a whole school of malodorous red herrings to distract the reader from noting his failure to answer a single one of my specific criticisms. His apparent view that we must sacrifice the truth in the interest of what he conceives to be good foreign policy reinforces my judgment that his book is not an objective analysis of Soviet philosophy and practice but a shabby piece of apologetics.

Mr. Somerville is no more accurate in his references to my review than he is in reporting the state of Soviet philosophy. I did not maintain that "Soviet philosophy is essentially identical with Nazi-Fascist philosophy"; I asserted that in respect to the denial of democratic freedoms, particularly their practices toward those who disagree with the state philosophy, they are the same. The expressed philosophies of Franco, Hitler, Mussolini, and Tojo differ, too, but their practices are substantially the same. In my review I wrote that Mr. Somerville is "guilty of the elementary logical error of assuming that because two things are not identical, none of their features or relations can be the same." In repeating this error in his reply Mr. Somerville reveals that his deficiency of logical sense is incorrigible.

In evaluating the political and social practices of a country we cannot rely on its professions of ideals. The governments of Franco and Salazar both invoke the noble ideals of Christianity. But we quite properly judge them by their fruits. Why should we proceed differently with the Soviet Union? We don't mitigate the conduct of the Bilbos and Talmadges by pointing to the existence of democratic constitutions on paper. Why should the existence of the Soviet constitution—which actually provides for one-party rule—blind us to the absence of freedom and democracy in Russia?

The notion that criticism of the theory and practice of Soviet philosophy is prejudicial to peace is utterly preposterous. It is also insincere, for those who hold it never assert that criticism of Spain, Argentina, and other non-democratic countries is war-mongering. Nor do they ever make similar charges against the Soviet Union, whose press—and an official press at that!—is full of vitriolic criticism of our own country. Mr. Somerville's theory of how to live in peace with the Soviet Union, if logically carried out, would lead to the complete abrogation of democracy as we know it in the United States.

Fortunately for the state of future relations between the Soviet Union and the United States, Mr. Somerville is no more adept in foreign policy than in technical philosophy. It was not criticism of Nazi philosophy and practice that brought war but Hitler's invasion of Poland. It was not criticism of Japanese despotism that brought war but Pearl Harbor. And if war breaks out between Russia and the West it will not be the result of criticism but of concrete actions. And what sensible person will argue that Hitler invaded Poland because of our criticism of Nazi philosophy and practice? In 1941 no criticisms of Nazi policy were permitted in Russia but only praise. Did this deter Hitler? Is the Soviet Union's record of broken treaties, its refusal to accept a plan for effective inspection of atomic plants, its use of a worldwide fifth column the consequence of our unsympathetic criticism?

What the foreign policy of the United States should be in relation to Russia and other countries is an important question, which I have discussed at length in the January issue of Partisan Review. But whatever foreign policy the United States adopts, it has a better chance of preserving the peace of the world if it is based on a frank recognition of the truths concerning Soviet theory and practice than if it is based on the deceptions peddled by fellow-travelers of the Communist Party line.

With Open Eyes

Dear Sirs: Many good Americans feel that it is disloyal not to indorse unquestioningly the Truman Doctrine. Could anything be more "un-American" than saying, like the Germans, "My Führer, right or wrong"? Sincere patriots felt free to criticize Franklin Roosevelt even when he was at the height of his prestige and power and not a President-by-accident. We must see to it that the same essential freedom of thought and speech is preserved now.

The Truman Doctrine is in effect a declaration of war. I am a lover of peace, but not a pacifist. It may be that the Third World War is inevitable and even righteous. But it involves a responsibility so tremendous that it should not be assumed without serious discussion.

The Truman Doctrine is a complete reversal of a policy as old as the Republic. To maintain a king on his shaky throne is decidedly not in line with American tradition. I am not a slave of tradition myself. But we owe it to our founders not to deviate from their reasoned policy without the most searching consideration.

The Truman Doctrine is a misnomer. It is—and we have known it for years—the Mussolini-Hitler-Franco doctrine. On this point, again, we have the right to alter our course: perseverare diabolium. But let us know clearly what we are doing, and why, and what it implies. If the Truman Doctrine be true, then, when the Great Crusade is won, we must raise expiatory monuments to those martyrs, the Duce and the Führer, who perished in its service.

NUMBER 20, PART I

The Shape of Things

THE NATION'S SUPPLEMENT ON PALESTINE, which makes up Part II of this issue, outlines the complex scheme of Near East relationships within which the Palestine problem is set. The supplement is an abridged version of a longer memorandum presented to the General Assembly of the United Nations. In the meetings at Flushing and Lake Success attempts were made to restrict the discussion to the central task for which the special Assembly was called: to select a Commission of Investigation and define its terms of reference. However, as the debate proceeded, it became increasingly difficult to separate substance from procedure. Many of the issues dealt with in the supplement have already been injected into the discussion—the terms of the Mandate, the claims of the Arabs to an independent Arab state in Palestine, the connection between Palestine and the Jewish refugees still in D. P. camps, the case for a Jewish National Home. Moreover, the United Nations sessions fought to the surface some of the underground currents of power politics that have bedeviled the attempt to reach a permanent solution of the Palestine problem. As we go to press, it appears that the terms of reference will be sufficiently broad to allow the commission to do its job effectively. We earnestly suggest that when the field is surveyed and all claims have been examined, the solution recommended to the General Assembly in September should follow the lines laid down in the Nation memorandum and supplement: a plan of partition that will allow a fair basis of economic and political existence for Jews and Arabs; an interim plan of trusteeship under a United Nations High Commission; and the immediate facilitation of immigration into the Jewish area of Palestine for the Jewish population now in the camps of Europe. This scheme will not satisfy completely all or any of the elements in the conflict, but given a spirit of tolerance and the firm backing of United Nations authority, we feel it can be made to work.

THE WILDCAT STRIKE IN THE NATIONALIZED Renault factory, which precipitated the French political crisis, was supported by left Socialist and non-Stalin Marxists, but was originally condemned by the Communists. When the strike assumed major proportions, the Communists, in order to avoid being outflanked on the left, did an about-face. They backed the workers' demands for increased wages, thus threatening the anti-inflation program of the coalition government based on frozen wages and lowered prices. Because this issue vitally affected the material interests of French workers, the Communist deputies were unable to repeat the tactics used in the debates on Indo-China and Madagascar when they opposed the government's policy without breaking the coalition. Instead, they refused a vote of confidence and also refused to quit the coalition, forcing Ramadier either to resign or take the responsibility of a rupture. Ramadier, having won the vote of confidence, chose to eject the Communists. The crisis has clearly exposed the weaknesses inherent in government by party coalition instead of by a parliamentary majority. But its main significance is the split between the two big Marxist parties. The Socialists remain faithful to the "Blum experiment," while the Communists now prefer to exploit the widespread discontent arising from the ineffectiveness of the government's efforts to lower prices. French economic life and reconstruction are utterly dependent on dollar imports. Any further weakening of the franc as a result of increased inflation will doom the Monnet plan. The Communist tactic in the present crisis required that they accept this risk in order to strengthen popular backing at the expense of the Socialists—although the Communists, hoping to have their cake and eat it, hated to leave the government.

BUT THE SOCIALISTS ALSO FEEL UNEASY. Premier Ramadier's decision to drop the Communist ministers was approved in the Socialist Party Congress by a very narrow margin, and among those who voted against it were some of Blum's most faithful followers. They expressed anxiety lest the government's shift toward the center might later oblige the party itself to move in that direction, risking the loss of a good number of its affiliates and much popular strength. It should not be forgotten that since the Congress of Montrouge a year ago the party has twice reaffirmed its policy of collaboration with the Communists, or that its leadership, including the able Daniel Mayer, was ousted as a result. This time Guy Mollet, who succeeded Mayer, led the opposition to Ramadier. He answered Blum's argument that hesitation would play into the hands of those "who

THE AMERICAN MILITARY TRIBUNAL

Nürnberg is to try twenty-four top officials of I. G. Fa-ben, the giant German chemical trust, on charges of menting and waging aggressive warfare, mass mur-plunder and spoliation. A 20,000-word indictment fil-on May 3 by the chief war-crimes prosecutor, Brigadier General Telford Taylor, backs these charges with a folmidable bill of particulars. It will be difficult for defense to claim that Farben was just an ordinary bu-ness which did no more than obey the instructions its government. The indictment shows that, even befo-Hitler came to power, the directors of Farben had reach-an agreement with him for mutual support. From a ve-early date every phase of the trust's production was synchronized with the plans of the German General Staff.
Its world-wide organization was completely integrate-with the Nazi foreign-propaganda and espionage agencies. Its cartel arrangements with more than 2,000 major industrial concerns in the United States, Britain, and other countries were used to obtain the benefits of foreign patents for the Nazi war machine and to prevent or lim-the production of strategic materials in those countries.
"No German government could have planned and wage war without the full, wholehearted, and unstinted cooperation of Farben," the indictment declares. And in return for this cooperation the trust reaped rich rewards.
Between 1932 and 1942 its profits rose from 71 million marks to 571 million. It shared the loot of the conquered countries. It profited from the exploitation of slave-labor, building a synthetic-rubber plant to employ inmates of the Oswiecim concentration camp, a plan where "sometimes over 100 persons died at their work every day from sheer exhaustion."

FARBEN'S STORY WOULD BE INCOMPLETE without reference to its agreements with American corporations and we are glad to note that General Taylor not neglected this subject. "Farben's pre-war activities" we are told, "were carefully designed to weaken the United States as an arsenal of democracy." Specific instances are cited of its arrangements with Alcoa and Du Pont, with Standard Oil of New Jersey, and with other companies. One illuminating instance mentioned was a "loan" of 500 tons of tetra-lead, used for high-octane gasoline, which Farben received from the Ethyl Export Corporation just before Hitler's march into Czechoslovakia. According to the statement, the purposes of this deal were "misrepresented." That we can well believe, but the deception of American businessmen in this manner, at a time when Neville Chamberlain's eyes had been opened, suggests an almost wilful innocence on their part. In fact, the only reasonable excuse that Farben's American collaborators can offer is that they were hoodwinked and deceived. However, this plea would be damaging to their honor and prestige, and some of them are still hoping to get away with bland denials. Robert T. Haslam, vice-president of Standard Oil of New Jersey, declares that his company had no cartel arrangements with Farben, but merely agreements for the purchase and exchange of patents—a fine distinction, indeed, considering Farben's activities in suppressing competition. Willard H. Dow, chairman of Dow Chemical, is reported as saying: "We never had any contract with Farben." In view of the evidence turned up by the Truman and Bone committees on the Dow-Farben agreements limiting Dow's magnesium sales in Europe, this is an amazing statement.

MUTINY IN THE BATTLE FOR PEACE COULD be designated a crime, Representative Taber and his supporters in the House Appropriations Committee would have under indictment. On the meanest of pretexts they have brushed aside Secretary Marshall's able appeal for the State Department's Information and Cultural Service. They have decided that the Voice of America must be abandoned, that American libraries of information abroad must be scrapped and that the program of telling the world about the United States through radio, motion picture, graphic arts, and student exchanges must be ended. They have long suspected the economy group in Congress of possessing minds so moronic as to be incapable of appreciating the simplest elements of American culture. It is in an age when the new mass media have stepped up the efficiency of international propaganda, we find it incredible that even this group should be willing to leave the Russians, the British, the French, the Arabs, and the Argentines the responsibility of explaining American foreign and domestic policy to the world. If Mr. Taber's proposals are sustained it will mean that the nation which contributed $330,000,000,000 to victory in war is prepared to surrender its claim to leadership in the battle for peace in order to "save" $31,000,000. The House has one more opportunity to redeem itself. By voting for Representative Mundt's bill, now in a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee, it can authorize the Senate to restore the foreign-broadcast fund to the State Department's budget.

AN UNCONFIRMED QUOTATION WITHOUT quotation marks is a journalistic phenomenon to be handled with care, but if Ford Frick's sermon to some St. Louis baseball players was nearly as pithy and as courageous as the statement attributed to him by the New York Herald Tribune last Friday, the president of the National League is highly to be praised. "If you do this, you will be suspended from the league," Mr. Frick is reported to have ordered owner Sam Breadon to tell a group of his St. Louis Cardinals who were fomenting a players' strike against the presence in the league of Brooklyn's Negro first baseman, Jack Roosevelt Robinson. And then he is said to have added: "I do not care if half the league strikes. . . . All [who do] will be suspended and I don't care if it wrecks the National League for five years." For the president of a multi-million-dollar industry thus to imperil his own security in the interest of decency is, to say the least, remarkable. "This is the United States of America," Frick's reported declaration continues, "and one citizen has as much right to play as another. The National League will go down the line with Robinson, whatever the consequences. You will find, if you go through with your intention, that you have been guilty of complete madness." Madness, indeed—for, transcending ball parks, paranoia lies at the root of all race prejudices. Those who would fight to eliminate this insanity from where it least belongs, the realm of sport, earn our unqualified admiration. While congratulating Mr. Frick—we hope not prematurely—we extend our compliments to Stanley Woodward and the sports staff of the Herald Tribune for breaking the full story. Ford Frick's words, as paraphrased by Mr. Woodward, might well be set in bronze in baseball's Hall of Fame at Cooperstown, N. Y.

"IT OCCURS TO ME AS I LOOK OUT OF THE window"—we are quoting from a letter, dated May 7 and addressed to John Taber, Republican chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, which was deposited on our desk by the north wind—"that if your committee really wants to save the government's money it might cast a weather eye on the Weather Bureau. The bureau's record for the past six weeks has been unimpressive, to say the least. One had only to read the forecasts and then prepare for the exact opposite. (You may have noticed yourself that at least every other day it has prophesied good Republican weather but all we've had has been Democratic or worse.) What is needed is a return to first principles and the methods of weather forecasting on which this great nation was founded. The Weather Bureau should be abolished. Then the government should make it compulsory for every citizen to put up a weathervane and be his own prophet. This would step up production, foster artistic talent, and insure more accurate forecasts. No one in this country is so untutored as not to know that when the wind blows hard enough to make the leaves turn their backs outward it is going to rain. And no one is so poor, so ill-housed, or so unemployed—the more unemployed the better—as not to be able to go out of doors, lick his finger, hold it up in the air, and determine which way the wind is blowing. (Lacking a finger he could use the nearest politician.)”

New Coalition for Old

IN THE gloom of last November we took what hope we could from a comforting political law, to wit, that winners make tactical blunders and losers make coalitions. The blunders were forthcoming from the start, and now the second and more constructive half of the expectation is beginning to take substance. For at least six of its twelve years, the Roosevelt Administration was harried and blocked by a coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats in Congress. Together they made up a majority and constituted an opposition Congress in all but name. The Republicans found an easy unity in the common desire to discredit their opponents, while the Democrats suffered the splits that go with responsibility. Now the shoe is on the other foot.

The Senate's rejection of the proposal to curtail industry-wide bargaining is not the first defeat for the Taft leadership—confirmation of Lilienthal had that distinction—but it is the first instance of a split in Republican ranks on an issue involving broad policy. It is too early to speak of the combination of forces that beat the G. O. P. leadership as a coalition, but the vote on this crucial aspect of the Senate labor bill indicates a fundamental division of opinion among the Republicans, and one that will inevitably show up again.

Leading the revolt against Taft were Senators Morse of Oregon and Ives of New York. With Aiken of Vermont and Tobey of New Hampshire they constitute the core of the Republican contingent in the potential coalition. To this nucleus are attracted the two Massachusetts Senators, Saltonstall and Lodge, who recently pleaded in private with his fellow-Republicans for “national” thinking rather than partisan; Thye of Minnesota, who represents Stassen much more reliably than does his colleague, Senator Ball; Knowland of California; North Dakota's erratic Langer; and Cooper of Kentucky, who was elected with the support of the liberal Louisville Courier-Journal. For the purpose of defeating the labor amendment were joined by five others, none of whom can be counted on to stay with the contingent consistently. Vandenberg, who supported Taft in this instance, may be expected to vote with the Democrats on foreign issues and lean backward to support his own party domestically in the hope of compensation. With only eleven Democrats in the G. O. P. on the Taft amendment, it will be that the new grouping could wipe out the Republican six-vote advantage and ironically give the Administration more support in the Senate than it enjoyed in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

One cannot assume that this will happen as a matter of course, or that such a coalition would be nearly as effective as the Northern tory-Southern bourbon alliance of years ago, lacking as it does the common target for hostility that Roosevelt so generously provided. But it should make up in shifting personnel what it lacks in consistency. The Hickenloopers and Smiths will join it on issues of common decency, such as the Lilienthal affair; the Vandenberg, Lodges, and Balls will join it on matters of foreign policy; and at least some of the Westerners, their colleagues in the House, can be counted on to join in when the party madly tries to cut the heart out of public power and reclamation projects. The cast is shifting, but the play will go on.

From this circumstance the Administration may draw several heartening conclusions, at least as far as the future of the party is concerned. One is that it need not depend on the support of the Southern Democrats for its social legislation on such naive arrangements with opposition as the Wagner-Ellender-Taft housing bill. Elsewhere in this issue Charles Abrams shows how fatal—indeed how fatal—such alliances can be. If the President and his lieutenants on Capitol Hill want to pass legislation, they would do well to let Taft bury his compromise measure, as he plainly intends to do, and go off all deals, and fight for a housing bill that will really mean something. The same goes for the health, education, and other social legislation bearing the Taft trademark.

Another conclusion to be drawn is that while a possible liberal coalition may not be firmly cemented, the G. O. P. has much more to fear from it than the Democrats had to fear from the reactionary one that plagued Roosevelt. It is not so easily put aside. No matter how alienated Southern Congressmen may have been by this or that aspect of the New Deal, their constituents were bound to remain faithful to the Democratic Party and Roosevelt at election time. Taft cannot afford to be cavalier, because Republican legislators can be kicked around by the party leadership only up to a point before serious repercussions are reported in the home districts. After all, Republican voters, except perhaps in Maine and Vermont, always have an alternative.

The Mufti's Henchmen

A Who's Who

THE appearance of the Palestine Arab Higher Committee at Lake Success was probably inevitable as soon as the Jewish Agency had won the right to participate in the debate. Although the Arab case had been argued exhaustively by the five member Arab states, nobody challenged the propriety of hearing from representative Palestinian Arabs as well. It was a different and most questionable matter, however, to convene a special sitting of the General Assembly in order to renege the invitation to the Arab Higher Committee in a form which would invest that body with the same diplomatic status as the Jewish Agency. The two organizations are totally dissimilar, and the distinction between them should have been recognized.

The functions and representative character of the Jewish Agency were established in the Palestine Mandate; they have been crystallized in twenty-five years of governmental experience. The Agency is an elected body, democratically controlled by Jewish organizations in and out of Palestine. By contrast, the Arab Higher Committee represents nothing more stable than a deal among leaders of the various Arab factions in Palestine—and the will of the Grand Mufti. It has suffered several oppressions, revivals, and reorganizations; only last summer it broke into two rival parts which were later welded together under the absolute control of the Mufti after his mysterious return to Cairo. The Arab Higher Committee has no legal status, no administrative or other governmental functions, no representative character, and the maneuvers that finally landed it on the same juridical level with the Jewish Agency have created a precedent which may cause plenty of trouble later on.

For the legal aspects of the matter cannot be disentangled from the political ones. Once we establish the fact that the Arab Higher Committee is not a representative body but a selected group of Arab politicians, we have to examine the political nature of the men themselves. And when we do this we discover that the Arab Higher Committee is an almost exact equivalent, in Middle Eastern terms, of the cabal that ruled Hitler's Germany.

If this sounds far-fetched, we urge our readers to turn to the record. The story of the Mufti has been widely published, at least in outline. An explicit but condensed account is contained in the memorandum to the General Assembly which appears as a supplement with this issue of The Nation. A much fuller account, documented from the captured files of the Mufti himself and of the German high command, has just been submitted to the General Assembly by the Nation Associates. The documents included in the report are from a collection of many thousand found at the end of the war by the American military authorities in Germany. Most of the originals are in the possession of the Department of State. They substantiate to the last detail the charge that the Mufti not only was an Axis agent throughout the war but was himself largely responsible for the Nazi policy of exterminating the Jews of Europe.

The membership of the Palestine Arab delegation to the Assembly was announced, not in Palestine, but from the Mufti's headquarters in Cairo. The persons named were the following: Emil Ghouri, Henry Katan, Wasef Kamal, Rajai Hussein, Isa Nakhleh, Rasam Khalidi. Among these delegates, four are known as intimate associates of the Mufti in his pro-Axis exploits. It is interesting, however, that the man chosen to present the Arab case last week, Henry Katan (spelled Cattani in the New York press) is the delegate least closely connected with the Mufti. Though less notorious than their chief, these men have dossiers fat with crimes and violent acts of all degrees. We print below a brief "Who's Who" of four of the appointed delegates. It shows better than anything else the political character of the Arab high command. For the record of the Mufti himself, turn to pages 597-600 of the memorandum.

Jamal Hussein, nephew of the Mufti and his right-hand man. Jamal Hussein has been head of the Palestine Arab Party, the Mufti's party, since 1935. He helped the Mufti organize the 1936-39 uprisings in Palestine and in 1939 joined his chief in Bagdad. There he organized the pro-Axis fifth column which brought about the Iraqi rebellion of 1941. With the Mufti he fled to Teheran, but was captured there and interned in Rhodesia on account of his pro-Axis activities. He was finally released in February, 1946, and allowed to return to Palestine, where he became vice-chairman of the Arab Higher Committee.

Emil Ghouri has long been active in extremist politics in Palestine. During the Iraqi revolt he was in charge of propaganda for the Mufti. A British Intelligence report in 1941 cited Ghouri as one of a group "who are responsible for propaganda, intrigue, and subversive activities inside and outside Iraq." After his return to Palestine Ghouri became a member of the Arab Higher Committee, although he had been forbidden to take part in political activities. He is the organizer and political leader of the underground Arab army and is alleged to be one of those responsible for internal terror against Arab opponents of the Mufti and Arabs who sell land to the Jews. He advocates that all Jews who came to Palestine after 1918 be regarded as foreigners and be deprived of rights in an independent Arab Palestine.

Rasem Khalidi, a member of a well-known Jerusalem family and a former Palestine government official, has been a close associate of the Hussein family and particularly of the Mufti. In 1936, at the outbreak of the Axis-sponsored Arab uprisings in Palestine, he was a member of the most intimate inner circle of Haj Amin el Hussein. In 1937 he was a member of an underground committee which directed Arab terrorism in Palestine. After his arrest in 1938, he fled to Syria and then to Iraq, where he joined the Mufti in organizing the Iraqi rebellion of 1941. After its failure he escaped to Ankara and thence to Italy and Germany. In the midst of the war, in 1943, he served as an announcer on the Axis-Arabic radio station in Athens. Since 1944 he has been a member of the Mufti's personal entourage, first in Berlin and later in Paris and Egypt. He has recently been refused an American visa by the State Department.

Wasef Kamal, a teacher by profession, is known for his extremist propaganda among his students. He was a member of the Arab National Committee in Nablus and played an active role in the organization of the 1936 riots. Arrested in that year, he soon escaped to Transjordan and later to Iraq. With the Mufti, he played an important role in the Iraqi rebellion of 1941 against the British.

From Iraq he escaped to Turkey, where, during the early part of the war, he served as a paid agent of the German Secret Service. In 1943 he went to Italy and Germany, where he continued his work as one of the closest collaborators of the Mufti. He returned to Syria in April, 1946. He was one of the few Arab leaders excluded from the amnesty of November, 1946, because he was regarded as so dangerous.

In April, 1947, Wasef Kamal was appointed by the Arab Higher Committee a member of a propaganda delegation to the United States. He has been attending the sessions of the United Nations.

Such are the men who claimed—and have received—recognition from the United Nations. Their acts establish their place among the worst of the Axis war criminals. Their legal credentials are pretty poor, but their political credentials are unspeakable. For the United Nations to accept these henchmen of the Mufti as official spokesmen of the Arab cause is to deal with its enemies and the allies of its enemies. The consequences will become even more evident in the months ahead.

We Need a Better Housing Bill

BY CHARLES ABRAMS

LAST week a death sentence was passed on the housing bill sponsored jointly by Senator Taft and by Democratic Senators Wagner and Ellender. Senator Taft has ruled that a G. O. P. policy committee will pass on all his social legislation and that he will "abide by the composite Republican decision." The chairman of the G. O. P. committee is Senator Taft himself. The composite Republican decision is that there will be no housing bill. Mr. Taft's health bill is ruled out, too. So is his education bill, which like the housing bills had liberal co-sponsorship. A curious alliance between liberalism and reaction to promote social legislation thus meets its end.

More is at stake than aid to housing, health, and education. The question today is whether the chief social issues of the last fourteen years will be properly drawn in the 1948 election. Unless the tactics of the liberals in Congress are shifted to point up these issues in their true focus, the movement for decent housing and for other social legislation will be lost by default and the American people will not even have had a chance to vote their protest.

The lesson, bitter as it is, must be acted upon before it is too late. The coalition must be ended. The Democratic Senators who sponsored the Taft legislation on housing and education should withdraw their names at once and offer measures that truly reflect the people's needs. They must no longer support rump reform bills, whittled down to win the Ohio Senator's co-sponsorship. His apostasy has released them from any obligation to stand by his dubious credo. Tackled properly and in time, this liberal misadventure can yet be turned into a G. O. P. boomerang. The circumstances behind the strange bedfellowship on housing should be made known to the American people.

The low-rent housing program that is the heart of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill is neither revolutionary nor new. It simply proposes another appropriation for slum clearance and housing such as was authorized in 1933, 1937, and 1938. Low-rent housing was never intended as a device for relieving a national housing shortage but was looked to as a means of energizing the economy during the depression and later on as a social reform designed to provide decent shelter for the one-third of the population that was "ill housed." The program was suspended during the war, but as victory drew near Senators Wagner and Ellender prepared to ask for an additional appropriation for local housing authorities. In the course of his own investigation into housing Senator Taft, after extensive hearings, veered toward favoring such a proposal if it could be held down to an experimental authorization.

A bill to provide additional public housing was then drafted and became the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill. The dominant purpose of the program was still to aid slum dwellers and to bolster the post-war economy, which was expected to hit a depression during the reconversion period. The depression, however, did not materialize; instead, the end of the war brought a housing famine. After demobilization eighteen million people were living led up, partly because they could not afford homes mainly because they could not find them. Yet in the of the most desperate housing shortage in American ry, the low-rent housing program was held down antially to the social program originally planned for expected slump. The Senator from Ohio would per- no more than a token appropriation under his name. field insurance" program was added, purporting to the needs of the long-neglected middle-income p by inducing lending institutions to build with a nment guaranty of profits, but little housing was expected from that quarter. Another provision au- zed mortgage insurance on homes costing $6,300 ss and reduced the required equity payment to 5 per this also became useless as building costs sky- eted. With a small authorization for housing re- h, slum reclamation, mortgage aid, and rural hous- included, the bill came to be known as a "compre- sive housing program."

he measure was a compromise. It was experimental, definitive. Its most important feature was its provi- s for clearing slums and providing 500,000 homes slum families in four years. As the only measure with ance of passing, it merited support, and received it h social and consumer groups throughout the country. nothing in the program made even a pretense of ing the veterans' housing problem adequately, ight down costs of home construction as the Wyatt gram sought to do, or took care of the housing needs the low- and middle-income groups on the scale hired.

Other measures were needed to supplement it, but e never received party support. One, introduced by representative Benjamin J. Rabin, would empower the ernment to continue the emergency war-housing pro- ; another, introduced by Representative Helen Ga- an Douglas, would authorize the local housing orities to build for veterans. Enactment of these bills vital. But liberal support for them might have meant ded support on the "comprehensive" bi-partisan bill. roover, since the latter had the approval of the Re- ublican and Democratic leadership as a "comprehen- e" housing program, no other bill had a chance of ssing. The Taft-Ellender-Wagner measure thus be- e a bottleneck as well as a banner, and for two rs the effort to put through a program suited to erica's critical housing needs had to be held under. t should not be charged that Senator Taft malevo- ly lured the liberal Senators into their present hapless ition. Nor should it be thought that the Ohio Senator s insincere in his sympathy for slum dwellers. After atinizing the grim facts of death, disease, and crime e the slums, he saw no other way to shelter the low- me family decently, and somewhat in the tradition Bismarck and the British Conservatives, he felt it was entirely realistic to make a token appropriation "for rea- sons of state."

But if Mr. Taft did not deliberately set out to trap the liberals into surrendering their most dramatic polit- ical issue, he could not have rendered a nobler service to the reactionaries in his party than he did by holding down the Democrats' demands and then throttling them. Having taken the wind out of the liberals' sails, he scuttles his ship and leaves his mates tangled up with the jetsam. An issue with the greatest public appeal has been suppressed and devitalized, and the liberal cause in America has been deprived of what might have been one of its most valuable props in the drama of 1948.

The failure of President Truman to give housing the support it needs and his desertion of Wilson W. Wyatt and his program played directly into the hands of Sena- tor Taft and his associates. Any support the Taft-Ellen- der-Wagner bill has received has come from the liberal Democratic Senators and a small group of enlightened Republicans led by Senator Tobey who have insisted on bringing it to the floor. Mr. Taft is now seeking to entomb his own bill.

A housing program to satisfy the nation's minimum needs should be framed immediately. Essential provisions are (1) that the appropriations for public housing con- tained in the Taft-Ellender-Wagner legislation be quad- rupled; (2) that the government be authorized to build housing for all veterans not taken care of by the private builder, at prices they can afford. With mortgage inter- est reduced to government rates and the amortization period extended, many veterans will at last be able to buy a home. The Rabin and Douglas bills should be adopted or incorporated in a comprehensive measure.

A long-range program must also be prepared. With housing top news today, the American people are pre- pared to move ahead. There should be a plan to clear every slum within a prescribed period. The defunct home-building industry should be put on a sound footing so that it can meet the demand for homes and fulfil its vital role in the national economy. The Wyatt program, which was a start in that direction, should be revived and expanded by order of the President. A planned, full- scale, federally aided building program sponsored by local housing authorities would help to standardize speci- fications and make possible quantity building.

Our housing needs in the next fifteen years will be greater than half the present housing supply. If new developments are properly planned, we can have cities worthy of our wealth, our energy, and our culture, cities fit to live in and work in.

Lack of confidence in the housing program of Great Britain's Conservative Party helped to bring about its un- expected overthrow in the wake of its military victory. The same issue, properly presented to the American people, may turn the political tide in America.

Behind the Viet-Nam Revolt

BY MICHAEL CLARK

Paris, May 2

NOTRE politique a cessé d'être claire," and Daniel Halévy in the days of the Third Republic. The Journal de Genève, commenting on Holland's difficulties in Indonesia, recalls this remark and adds, "A slackening is taking place in public opinion which signifies indifference, laissez aller, lassitude; the controversy yields to enigma and imbroglío." If this is true at The Hague, how much more is it true in Paris with regard to the fighting in Indo-China. It is symptomatic of the present ideological disarray of the French that the problem of Indo-China has become confused beyond words, an issue so controversial that it has rocked the government, while in the country at large one finds only apathy and doubt.

And yet, seen against the background of other events in Asia, in Africa, and on islands overseas, the meaning of Indo-China is almost painfully simple. The nineteenth century was a European century. Respect for property, national sovereignty, the balance of power, and the prerogative of dispensing "civilization" among lesser peoples—these were the assumptions upon which the power of Western Europe was built. But two wars in a single generation have shattered the stability that seemed so permanent. The white man, pitted against himself in ruthless slaughter, has lost face in the eyes of the yellow, black, and brown; he has become bankrupt in lands where with magnificent self-assurance he once bore his "burden." As Paul Reynaud said the other day in the National Assembly, "the two greatest powers today do not possess colonial empires—or have theirs at home—and are hostile to the fact of colonies." The satellite is replacing the colony; and the old empires, instead of yielding to an international order, are falling beneath the blows of new nationalisms.

Indo-China must be looked upon as deriving partly from India and partly from China. Western Indo-China, comprising the provinces of Cambodia and Laos, has for centuries been menaced by aggressive neighbors, the Siamese to the west and the Annamese to the east; the Cambodians and the Laotians have therefore remained mostly loyal to the French, whose protection they need. The eastern part is more Chinese; Viet-Nam, indeed, means "Land of the South"—that is, south of China. The majority of its inhabitants are Annamese conquerors of about two centuries ago who pushed the indigenous population, the Mols, into the mountains.

Since the 1860's, when the French established control over Indo-China, new patterns have been superimposed on the old. A whole population of half-bred the Eurasians, has grown up. At the turn of the century Indo-China supported barely 17,000,000 natives, 13,000 whites, as compared with 23,000,000 natives, 100,000 Eurasians, and 35,000 French civilians today and the population has virtually doubled since 1860. Study of the physical changes is beyond the scope of this article; still, the importance of the transformation can best be told with a few figures: In 1860 Saigon exported less than 60,000 tons of rice a year; in 1935 it exported 1,700,000 tons. The rice fields of Cochín-China, which covered 250,000 hectares in 1865, now cover 2,300,000 hectares. In addition, the country has acquired 3,000 kilometers of railways, 32,000 kilometers of roads, and a maximum electrical supply of more than 80,000,000 kilowatt-hours a year.

All these changes are stamped in the very soil of the country; they cannot be conjured away by propaganda theory. It is begging the question to say that the French colonials are criminals and exploiters, just as it is to claim that the Annamese are butchers and assassins. Indo-China, like any other country, presents a complex design, with large patches of right and wrong clearly discernible.

In reviewing the present situation in Indo-China, the observer is bound to recall certain salient facts, the first of which is that the troubles are a direct outgrowth of the war and the Japanese occupation. In the Orient where loss of face always has immense consequences of defeat and humiliation such as those suffered by the French will inevitably be paid for dearly. The wound is not that the resentment of the Annamese exploded when it did, but that the upheaval was not even more violent. The reason may lie in the fact that the Annamese, despite the best efforts of the Japanese, were never fully united against the French; the bulk of them, particularly in the south, like peasants everywhere, were relatively immune to nationalistic agitation, while the more conscious elements were divided into factions. The Viet Minh, in fact, early in 1946 was obliged to eliminate its political rivals, notably the pro-Chinese parties of Cong Minh Hoi and Viet-Nam Quoc Dan Dong, before it could effectively organize resistance to the French.

Mystery surrounds the exact nature of the Viet Minh's relations with the Japanese. The Viet-Namense always heatedly maintain that they were as anti-Japanese as anyone; at the recent Asiatic Relations Conference in New Delhi Dr. Thach, Viet-Namense delegate, denied the presence of Japanese elements in the National ed forces. The truth seems to be that Viet Minh hostility to the Japanese was never very effective. It is at any rate, that on August 18, 1945, when the Japanese abandoned their puppet government in Hanoi, they were careful to instal—for although they had tolerated, their unbeaten army still held sway in Indochina—the Viet Minh in its place. If the French on their arrival were faced with a political fait accompli, as the work of the Japanese. Moreover, the French found a number of Japanese among the Viet-Namese prisoners they have taken.

As soon as the Viet Minh's leadership in the resistance against the French was established, the movement quickly assumed a national character. And the French, trying to build an Indo-Chinese federation within the framework of the French Union, recognized the Viet-Nam Republic and invited its President Ho Chi Minh, Paris. At this distance it is quite impossible to know how representative the Viet Minh really is. The movement undoubtedly has a powerful appeal, but as long as it indulges in terrorism among the Annamese themselves, and particularly among the Cochinese, the extent and sincerity of its backing will remain unknown. The scorched-earth policy so often applied by the Annamese resisters automatically contributes to their length, because when you burn a man's house and the field he works you are in a position to force him to follow your cause. Only a popular plebiscite, free from threat and coercion, could give the answer; but that is obviously out of the question at present.

One thing is certain: Cochinese-China is the granary of the country; the other provinces, if cut off from Cochinese-China, would either starve or be dependent on supplies from abroad. The day Cochinese-China is incorporated into the Viet-Nam Republic, the Viet Minh will dominate the entire federation. The French, understandably enough, have tried to fortify the independence of Cochinese-China. The Viet-Namese, meanwhile, unable to count on the support of the Cochinese peasants, are doing all they can to carry the war to the recalcitrant territory. Their leading agitators in the southern province are one Pham Van Bach, a man with a very bad record as an informer, assassin, and master mind of the Cam-Tu ("Volunteers of Death"), and the revolutionary condottiero, Nguyen Binh, released from the Poulo-Condor prison by the Japanese and already a legendary figure. The control of Cochinese-China is the central issue of the struggle and one that will be extremely hard to settle by negotiation.

But the vital problem for the French is how to put an end to the war. The complete pacification of Indochina would take long, hard fighting and put a terrible strain on France's limited resources. Equally unacceptable would be complete withdrawal; no French statesman, not even a Communist, would suggest such a solution. There remains one alternative—negotiation. But with whom? France, it is true, recognized the Viet-Nam Republic but that was before the Viet-Namese, in defiance of their pledged word and without claiming any breach on the part of France, attacked the French at Hanoi on December 19 last. That the attack had been planned well in advance has been proved; tunnels had even been dug between houses so that the Viet-Namese might move freely from one part of the city to another. If General Morlière, getting wind of the attack a few hours before it was launched, had not, for a second time, sent his troops to their barracks, it is probable that the French would have lost the city in a bloody fight.

Dr. Thach, in New Delhi, produced documents purporting to show that the French had attacked first at Hanoi; he further claimed that the French troops had massacred a whole quarter of Hanoi on December 17. The best that can be said of Dr. Thach's charges is that they are untrue. On December 17 the French forces were still confined to their barracks. Moreover, General Morlière was in touch with Ho Chi Minh up to the last moment before the attack and on the very morning of December 19 had received a letter from the Viet-Namese leader in which nothing was said either of the destroyed quarter of Hanoi or of an impending rupture. It is inconceivable that a Socialist government of France would have authorized an unprovoked coup d'état against the Viet-Nam.

Whatever may be the truth about the events of December 19, it will be difficult for the French government to negotiate with President Ho. Various peace overtures, allegedly signed by him, have been proved to be forgeries. For weeks he was rumored to have been killed. At any rate he was out of contact with the French. But it remains a fact that the Viet Minh leader, if he is alive, is the one man who could probably bring the rebellion to an end.

A new High Commissioner, M. Bollaert, has recently arrived in Saigon, replacing Admiral d'Argenlieu. M. Bollaert, an eminent and highly respected civil servant, has been making strenuous efforts to break through the barrier of suspicion and continuing warfare and arrive at a settlement with the Viet-Namese. Latest Saigon dispatches say that envoys from President Ho Chi Minh are in touch with him, while one story gives what purports to be the substance of an "interview" with President Ho sent out from his secret radio station in the mountains of Tonking. In it he expressed his sympathy for "French democrats" and invited a French Parliamentary delegation to visit Indo-China. If M. Bollaert can find some basis for negotiation with the Viet Nam, France will have good reason to be grateful. The present tragic situation serves only the partisan interests of politicians and pamphleteers, both right and left.

Next Steps in China

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

WITH Secretary Marshall's return from Moscow there was bound to be an increased demand for a "clarification" of our China policy. President Truman's program of military aid to Greece and Turkey has already aroused considerable grumbling among right-wing Republicans. They argue that if it is essential to bolster up reactionary governments in the Middle East to check the spread of communism, similar action is even more essential in the Far East, where America's interests are more deeply involved. Moreover, it is asserted in some quarters that the reorganized Nanking government is essentially the kind of government that Marshall was working for, even though the Democratic League and the Communists do not participate.

A year ago most observers felt that with American aid China was well on the road to democracy and internal unity. The subsequent collapse of the Marshall mission represented a grave setback for post-war American diplomacy. But before embarking on a new policy, we should try to see just why our attempt at mediation failed.

There is abundant evidence to support General Marshall's contention that a "dominant group of reactionaries" within the Kuomintang skilfully sabotaged all his efforts. The Communists also, in recent months at least, have shown little disposition to compromise. It would be easy to conclude therefore that Marshall's efforts were foredoomed to failure. Some right-wing critics, indeed, have insisted that his program was unsound from the beginning, that an effort to set up a coalition including the Communists was as ridiculous as a similar effort would be in this country.

The most direct answer to this contention is the fact, attested by all responsible observers, that the Chinese Communist Party has an immense amount of popular support. As long as it is barred from participation in the government, there will continue to be, for all practical purposes, two Chinas. The new government, despite the inclusion of some representatives of the Young China and Social Democratic parties, is dominated not only by the Kuomintang but by those elements in the Kuomintang which Secretary Marshall described as "reactionaries." When T. V. Soong was dropped, the one significant progressive influence was eliminated.

Whether Marshall's efforts ever had any chance of success will never be known. Marshall himself was highly regarded by both sides, but American aid to the Kuomintang spoke louder than his scrupulously impartial words. Some estimates place its value at $3,000,000,000—including the cost of training and equipping fifty-seven Kuomintang army divisions which have been used in the civil war. President Truman made it considerably less in his statement of December, 1946; his figures indicate a minimum of $1,491,000,000 in American aid to the Kuomintang since V-J Day and a little more than half that amount during the war. This excludes UNRRA assistance, which, though entirely non-military, has gone almost exclusively to Kuomintang areas and has been used in part to bolster up the tottering Kuomintang fiscal and economic structure.

Much of our aid was given, or arranged for, before General Marshall went to China. The transportation of Kuomintang troops to Shanghai and North China and the intervention of American marines were planned by Ambassador Hurley and General Wedemeyer as part of their policy of supporting the Kuomintang against the Communists. But this aid did not cease when Marshall became ambassador: he himself seems to have furthered the transportation of Kuomintang troops to Manchuria and the establishment of MAGIC, the American Military Mission which is still helping the Nationalists' army. Although Marshall subsequently held up the $500,000,000 American loan and brought about the withdrawal of the marines, the continuance of support to the Kuomintang long after the government showed it had no intention of accepting the January agreements caused the Communists to doubt American sincerity. The Kuomintang at the same time was convinced that we would support in any eventuality as a potential ally against the Soviet Union. As long as the notion persisted among Kuomintang and Communist supporters that the Chinese internal struggle was inextricably bound up with the large American-Soviet struggle for world influence, Marshall's role as a mediator was an impossible one.

The present American policy toward China is essentially no policy at all. We have abandoned our efforts at mediation because there was nothing else to be done. Our marines are being withdrawn because they were achieving nothing and were a source of constant irritation. The $500,000,000 loan is being held up because would clearly be of no more value than water poured down a drain in stabilizing China's desperate political and economic situation.

SHALL WE SUPPORT CHIANG KAI-SHEK?

aced by an ever-widening civil conflict and an ever-widening economic crisis in China, the United States has three possible courses of action: (1) we could openly choose one side or the other in the civil war and utilize economic and military resources to force a quick decision; (2) we could withdraw completely and allow China to settle its own problems; or (3) we could seek Soviet and possibly British cooperation in a new attempt at mediation.

Senator Vandenberg, spokesman on foreign policy for the Republican Party, has urged the first course of action. Speaking before the Cleveland Council of World Affairs in January, he asked for open support of the Chiang Kai-shek regime on the theory that this alone offers a route to "a strong and competent China." Other Congressmen have urged similar action to make our China policy consistent with our position on Greece and Turkey. It should be recognized, however, that this is not a new or untried policy. It was former Ambassador Hurley's policy at a time when the United States had substantial military forces in China which could be used to carry it out. The Kuomintang proved incapable of unifying or governing the country. No amount of aid from the United States can wholly make up for its lack of support among the Chinese people. If we want to perpetuate civil conflict in China and risk the possibility of its spreading to a world conflagration, we need only return to the Hurley policies.

At first glance it may be supposed that we have already adopted the second, or "hands-off," policy with respect to China's civil war. Unfortunately, this is not the case. Though the marines in Peiping and Tientsin are scheduled to be withdrawn, from one to two thousand will remain at Tsingtao, where the American navy is helping the Kuomintang build up a respectable naval force. The United States has already supplied the government with twenty-two large and medium landing craft and fifty smaller vessels, and President Truman has just announced that additional ships are being turned over, "accompanied by a limited complement of naval personnel." In addition, the American Military Mission at Nanking, consisting of 750 officers and men, is still training pure Kuomintang officers in the use of modern military weapons. Other units are stationed throughout China to facilitate the transfer of surplus military property to the Kuomintang. We should make our withdrawal absolute, terminate standing arrangements, and refuse to enter into new commitments until an all-party government has been established.

To abandon China at a time when the country's economy is utterly prostrate under the combined impact of war and inflation may seem to some an unnecessarily rash action. Undoubtedly millions of people will starve unless China gets aid from abroad. Yet the record of the past year should convince even the most soft-hearted that further aid to the Kuomintang will not in the long run save lives. Even international relief, when distributed by a government agency, may be utilized, as UNRRA workers have recognized, as a political and military weapon. Before governmental relief can be of value, the primary conditions which make for starvation—that is, Kuomintang corruption and civil strife—must be eliminated.

Meanwhile, China's suffering can be alleviated to some extent by private relief through such agencies as the United Service to China, the Industrial Cooperatives, and various other American charitable organizations. Assistance given through these channels reaches all parts of China, including the Communist areas, and may help to strengthen the various educational and social-welfare groups that constitute the most potent democratic force within the country—groups operating under unimaginable handicaps because of war conditions.

There is ground for hope that the cessation of American governmental aid will force Chiang Kai-shek to give up his plans for all-out civil war and resume negotiations. The Nanking government's financial position is precarious. Nearly half of its nine-trillion-dollar (Chinese currency) budget is earmarked for military purposes. The budget provides for a two-trillion-dollar deficit, which is to be covered by the issuance of paper currency, but the actual deficit is expected to be much greater. Because the exchange rate has been pegged at a point which greatly overvalues Chinese currency, exports from China have been negligible since V-J Day. Although China's foreign-exchange position was excellent at the end of the war, heavy purchases abroad without corresponding sales of Chinese goods have largely absorbed the war-time surplus and left the country in a critical situation. The vast surplus stocks of war supplies obtained from the United States have lost much of their value because China is unable to service modern equipment and keep it in repair. It is reported, for example, that the Chinese air force may have to be grounded in a few weeks owing to poor maintenance facilities and a shortage of spare parts. Crack divisions that have been trained and equipped by the American army are said to lose the greater part of their efficiency within a few months after reverting to the control of old-line officers.

OR TRY INTERNATIONAL MEDIATION?

The sudden cutting off of all American aid to both of China's parties should be accompanied by a program of international mediation. As we have seen, the prospects for further mediation by one country, such as was attempted by General Marshall, are very poor. However, if the United States, Britain, and Russia could reach an agreement under U. N. auspices for implementing the Moscow Declaration of 1945, it is difficult to see how any Chinese political group could hold out against their combined moral and economic pressure. A bi-partisan proposal for such an undertaking was made recently by Representative Mansfield, on his return from an extensive tour of China and other Pacific countries, and by Senators Murray and Flanders.

Most of the objections that have been advanced against this proposal stem from the fear that Russia and the United States could not reach an agreement and that the effort would create new tensions between them. It is a matter of record, however, that the two countries did agree to a general statement of policy at the last Moscow conference and that this policy is almost identical with that earlier set forth by President Truman. Because of its geographical proximity, Russia has a greater stake in Chinese stability than any other country, not excepting the United States. Regardless of its sympathies, which are not too clear, it has scrupulously refrained—as General

Marshall has attested—from giving material assistance either of the warring factions. And it acted long before the United States to carry out the Moscow commitment for the withdrawal of American and Soviet troops. This is reason to believe, moreover, that Russia is prepared to advance substantial aid, as provided in the Sino-Soviet treaty, to a unified democratic regime.

If it were clear that the United States, Britain, Russia were in complete agreement regarding China that there was no possibility of playing one against the other, the Democratic League and the other middle parties of China, which have a tremendous though organized following, would be greatly strengthened against the extremists. While these middle parties wholly incapable of ruling China under present conditions, they can, if sufficiently strengthened, exercise an effective balance of power and save the country from catastrophe that otherwise seems inevitable.

A Faith to Live By

III. "At the End of the Crisis, a New World . . ."

BY JACQUES MARITAIN

A FAITH to live by? I wonder whether these words satisfactorily present the question. What is necessary? What do we desperately need? A faith to live by? Or a faith to live for, a faith to live and die for? Just because our very life is at stake we are compelled to rediscover a faith to live and die for.

In the conception of many of our contemporaries faith, a faith to live by, far from being defined by any intrinsic and incontrovertible truth superior to man and human life, is merely something measured by human feeling or human needs, and destined to comfort human life's intellectual and social order, man's security in gaining possession of the earth and mastery over nature. From the time of Descartes and John Locke to the present, faith in God progressively became, for a great number of men, such a faith to live by. Finally, the religious feeling shifted to the cult of man. Our forebears undertook and pursued, with infinite hopefulness, a courageous, stubborn, and bright search for a faith to live by, which was a faith in man. This faith, during some decades, seemed all-powerful and produced splendid, though brittle achievements. The blunt fact, the irrefutable fact, is that we have lost faith in man.

If such a state of despair had endured, Hitler would have won the war. For the deepest trend of Nazism, burning lust, was to vilify man, to have man accept his own baseness and vacuity, to renounce humanity. Europe and the world saw this hell and are still wounded by its vision. Wittingly or unwittingly, in the hidden psychology of common life men are losing faith in man.

What is termed today atheistic existentialism is the clearest symptom of this fact. Kierkegaard's existentialism was the anguish of faith searching for incomprehensible and unspeakable reality. Even Heidegger's existentialism searches for the mystery of being through the heartrending experience of nothingness. But atheistic existentialism, such as has been heralded in recent years by writers who are but submissive mirrors of their time, does not reflect the anguish of man confronting nothingness; it reflects and declares the longing of man for nothingness. It expresses the temptation and desire not to be any longer. Yet this is impossible. Longing for nothingness and condemned to be, man abandons himself.

Communism, which is the ultimate vicissitude of anthropocentric rationalism, endeavors indeed to save faith in man and offers itself as the last hope of optimism. Its optimism, however, is the optimism of the titanic and coercive energies of matter and technique; its mission is totally subservient to the fate of history embodied social group. Faith in man, yes, but in what kind of man? However sincere and generous may be the faith in man of many Communists, they do not see that in their system the real man, the human being, is sacrificed to a mutilated image of the greatness of man.

JACQUES MARITAIN, the distinguished French philosopher, has specialized in the system of St. Thomas. He was visiting professor at Columbia University during the war and is now French ambassador to the Vatican.

Well, does despair, then, have the last word? Are we hemmed in by a tragedy?

As a matter of fact, reason demands that we have faith in man. Let us turn from the present world of man and look at the world of nature—I mean with an unsophisticated gaze. We see that, despite the all-pervading law of struggle and conflict, nature in its depths is permeated with an abysmal, supra-individual, and inescapable peace, which is the root goodness and the universal strength of being. And man, as part of nature, as an essence which is good itself. We see that the evolution of the cosmos and mankind is an interminable, though constantly thwarted, movement toward higher forms of life and consciousness, and that from the age of the cave man, the slow and painful progress of mankind testifies to energies in man which make any contempt of the human race childish and presumptuous. Consider with a little love any individual whatever in the anonymous common mass of poor humanity. The better you know him, the more you discover in him hidden resources of goodness that evil has been unable to destroy. Man's difficult condition comes from the fact that he is not only a creature of nature but also one of reason and freedom—elements which are weak in him and yet are his indestructible fortitude and tokens of his abiding dignity. No failures or stains can efface his original greatness.

Yes, we see that we must have faith in man. But we cannot. Our experience keeps reason in check. The present world of man has been for us a revelation of evil; it has shattered our confidence. We have seen too many crimes for which no just revenge can compensate, too many deaths in desperation, too sordid a debasement of human nature. Our vision of man has been covered over by the unforgettable image of the bloody ghosts in extermination camps. German sadism has let devils loose everywhere. Everything we loved seems to have been poisoned; everything in which we trusted seems to have failed. Science and progress are turned to our own destruction. Our very being is threatened by mental and moral atomization. Our very language has been perverted: all our words have become ambiguous and seem only able to convey deception. We live in Kafka's world. Where is our faith to live by?

Perhaps we have chosen the wrong road. Perhaps we would have done better to cling to a faith to live and die for, instead of seeking a faith to live by alone. Old pagan wisdom knew that man has his noblest, happiest, and most human aspect appendant to what is supra-human, and that he can only live by what he lives for and is ready to die for, and is better than himself. If our humanism has failed, it is perhaps because it was centered in man alone, and was utilitarian, not heroic; because it tried to relegate death and evil to oblivion, instead of facing them and overcoming them by an ascent of soul into eternal life; because it trusted in techniques instead of in love, I mean in Gospel love.

St. Paul says that faith is the assurance of things hoped for and goes on to say that it is a conviction of things not seen. Faith is an adherence to superhuman truth, an entrance into the realm of invisible and divine things; faith makes our whole life appendant to a living Whole which is infinitely better and more lovable than our own life; faith is a meeting with a Person who is Truth itself and Love itself, and to Whom the giving of oneself results in supreme freedom, and in Whom dying results in indestructible life.

Then we live for truth, and that truth for which we live is stronger than the world. Then we live for love, and that love for which we live has made the world and will finally renew and transfigure it. Then we are free, and nothing in the world can break our faith.

And this God Who is Truth and Love has made man to His image. He has destined man to share in His own life. His Son died to save man. Despite all the catastrophes that man's failures and refusals cause, He leads man's history toward godlike fulfilment and transfiguration. Such is the greatness of man. Here is the rock of our faith in him.

Thus faith in man revives if it is rooted in the supra-human. Faith in man is saved by faith in God.

Human history moves in a definite direction. It depends on both natural and spiritual energies, and among all kinds of conflicts it tends to the natural fulfilment of mankind—namely, the progressive manifestation of the essence and potentialities of man, the progressive development of the structures of his knowledge, his moral conscience, and his social life, mankind's progressive conquest of unity and freedom. And it tends also to a spiritual fulfilment which is supra-temporal and transcends history, and which the Christian considers to be the kingdom of God and the revelation of the sons of God. Though inseparably intermingled, these two trends of history relate to two thoroughly distinct orders, and often the weakness of man opposes the one while furthering the other. And contrary to them, evil also develops in history; so that a downward movement causes losses to increase at the same time as an upward movement causes the sap of the world to produce better fruits. In the happiest periods of history evil is at work in what is obscured. In the darkest eras the good is invisibly preparing unforeseeable conquests. And good is stronger than evil. Finally the saying of the Scriptures will be fulfilled: Tell the righteous that everything is well. In old Jewish apocalyptic writings it was stated that the age of the sufferings of the Messiah would be the age of his greatest victories.

In presenting his book, "On the Threshold of the Apocalypse," to one of his readers some thirty years ago, Léon Bloy wrote on the first page: "Cher ami, donnez-vous le peine d'entrer" ("Dear friend, pray cross the threshold"). It seems that, as a matter of fact, we did cross. Our age appears as an apocalyptic age, a liquidation of several centuries of history. We are picking the grapes of wrath. We have not finished suffering. But at the end of the crisis a new world will emerge.

Then experience—that very experience which jeopardized our faith in man—is transfigured. It assumes a meaning. It is not the revelation of the absurdity of existence but of the pangs and travail of history, not the revelation of the root baseness and contemptibleness of man but of his distress laid bare when he falls from his pride, and of the trials and catastrophes through which the abiding greatness of his destiny asserts itself.

A historical liquidation such as the one we are undergoing does not take place in one day. Time is necessary to make reason able to control the formidable material means which industrial and technological revolution has put in our frail hands. Time is necessary to stir up, from the depths of human bewilderment, the moral and spiritual revolution that is incomparably more needed than any other revolution. For nothing less is required than a terrestrial triumph of Gospel inspiration in the social behavior of mankind. We do not lose hope. The renewal of civilization that we hope for, the age of integral humanism, the time when science and wisdom are to be reconciled, the advent of a fraternal commonwealth and of true human emancipation—all this we do not await on the morrow. But we await them on the day after the morrow, at that moment which St. Paul announced would be the splendor and resurrection of the world.

Every effort made in this direction will finally bear fruit. I refer not only to the spiritual struggle of those who have heard, as Henri Bergson put it, the call of the hero, and who awaken men to evangelic love, but also to the temporal struggle of all those—scientists like Pasteur or Washington Carver, poets like Walt Whitman, Hugo, or Peguy, pioneers of social justice like the "radicals" called up by Saul Alinsky—who give themselves to the improvement and illumination of the brothers' lives, and who can know no rest as long as the brothers are in enslavement and misery. Even if the general state of the world and our stock of accumulated errors prevent such efforts from overcoming at present the evils which are streaming in from everywhere, they are preparing an era, under God, of greater dignity for man and of expanding love.

Such is the faith we live for, and, because we live for it, the faith we live by.

Europe This Summer?

BY HORACE SUTTON

SOME countries in Europe have been having a rather difficult time lately, deciding whether they shall invite or discourage America's eager travelers this summer. To be sure, dollar credits are greatly coveted, but a disgruntled tourist is a poor advertisement, and a hungry population may make an apathetic host.

Great Britain has released an official announcement that tourists will not only be encouraged but urged to go to Britain in 1947, and visas will be freely granted. But from London comes another voice. The British Automobile Association, like the British Caterers, has publicly expressed its opposition to visits by American tourists this year. It holds that some 70,000 Britons, wearied by years of sacrifices, would have to give up their own holidays to accommodate the visitors and that the accommodations and food would be meager in any case.

HORACE SUTTON will contribute monthly articles on travel to The Nation.

An invitation has come from Spain. "The Spanish government welcomes wholeheartedly the prospect of American tourists visiting Spain in the near future," says the official release. But only last month the government of Spain instructed an American newspaperman to turn in his credentials as the penalty for filing dispatches that deviated from the official line. While the ordinary tourist would not be bothered in this particular way, the atmosphere of the dictatorship would surely oppress a but the most thick-skinned. And travel conditions as described by recent visitors as impossible. Spain had even the first virtue of a fascist state: its trains do not run on time.

"Under existing conditions," says Sweden, "tourism can be accommodated only in limited numbers." Norway says, "Every effort is being exerted, etc." Denmark regrets; Czechoslovakia is still rationed; the Netherlands says anxiously, please, please, make advance reservation Belgium, on the other hand, with 40,000 rooms available, describes itself as "eager." And France, amid a the doubt, dissuasions, and admonitions, has dusted off the old red carpet and rolled it out to welcome 300,000 American tourists this year.

I dropped over to see the "director of public information" of the French National Tourist Office as he stepped from the boat last week. He is Norman Reader, a young and husky American with graying hair and quiet manners. A public-relations man in the Army Air Forces during the war, Mr. Reader managed to get himself "readjusted" in a job that has just required him to spend six weeks, expenses paid, on a tour of French resort centers from Paris to Chamonix and from Deauville to the Riviera. He asserts unequivocally that France could accept 300,000 tourists this year, but adds that shortage of transportation will cut this number to about 60,000. There are only nine passenger liners on the North Atlantic run—the America, Queen Elizabeth, Mauritania, Gripsholm, Drottningholm, Noordam, Westerdam, Veendam, and Stavangerfjord. Three American and four foreign air lines use sixty-seven planes for a total of fifty-five weekly flights each way. The ships are sold out in spite of overcrowding and high prices, and transatlantic plane traffic has recently taken a tremendous spurt.

Travel to France requires a passport, and if you are going for pleasure you must show confirmed round-trip passage before our State Department will let you go. Business travelers are not required to show return passage, but they must have a letter from their firm stating what their business abroad is. Everyone must have a visa, obtainable at any French consulate upon payment of a nominal fee. Francs are exchanged abroad at a legal rate of 120 to the dollar, and Mr. Reader says carry travelers' checks or a letter of credit. You may bring all the money you want, but it is unlawful to have bills in larger denominations than $20. France wishes that tourists would avoid the black market in changing their dollars. This will be easier to do now that the illegal rate has come so close to the legal one.

Mr. Reader's best piece of advice is to visit the small places in France first and then wind up your trip in Paris. The large, well-known hotels and night clubs are expensive, and unfortunately these are the ones Americans visit first. "It is going to be hard to educate Americans not to spend all their time in Paris," he says. Once Mr. Reader had a lunch for which he paid 325 francs. A clerk in his Paris office said, "That's about what I make in a day." It is possible, however, to eat in what we might call a white-collar luncheonette for as little as 80 francs. It is also possible—as Mr. Reader discovered—to have a bite at La Tour d'Argent, about the best place in Paris, for considerably more. His check was 3,000 francs.

In Paris do your traveling by cab in the morning. Where there were once 20,000 taxis, there are now only 8,000 in operation. The drivers work until their gas ration is exhausted and then quit for the day. Use the metro, Mr. Reader advises. It is intact, costs only four francs, and is infinitely easier for a New Yorker than the New York subway system. To learn where to eat and sleep in Paris, apply to the government information offices, which are preparing a list of moderate-priced hotels. The better-known restaurants, like Perifourdine, the Prunier, Relais de la Belle Aurore, all charge between 900 and 1,500 francs for dinner. Rooms in average Paris hotels are 450 francs a day; fancier places like the Hotel George V are 1,100 francs a day. The Paris theater is flourishing, and the biggest hit is "The Eagle Has Two Heads," a resounding flop in New York when it opened with Tallulah Bankhead.

Drawing by Duffy

Chateau of Vernet-les-Bains

At Deauville, where the seasons starts in June, literally every square foot of ground has been turned up in a search for mines. The theaters, gambling casinos, beaches, and golf courses await their first big year. The Riviera is in excellent condition, and good hotels in Nice charge about 400 francs a day for a room. There are pensions outside, however, where one can live, with food included, for the same price. In Lyons, Marseilles, and Bordeaux, ordinary hotels charge 150 francs a night for lodging.

Air-France operates a number of routes within the country, Mr. Reader reports, and the French railroads have done a miraculous job of rebuilding. Traveling conditions, he says, are pretty good though trains are badly crowded. In Avignon a young colonel in the French army invited him to lunch and topped off the meal with an especially prepared cake surmounted with an American flag. "Contrary to what a lot of Americans believe, the French are deeply appreciative of what Americans did in the war and they speak of it all the time," Reader says. In Normandy many streets are marked with names of American enlisted men. A sign will read: "Pvt. Edwin Crowe Road." No hotels are being built near the battlefields, which it is hoped will not be commercialized. Excursions are run from centers like Deauville. The cemeteries are beautifully kept, the graves well marked; many are set with flowers.

DIRTY DEALS IN SPAIN

TWO weeks ago I said that General Franco would never have dared challenge the United Nations with his cynical Law of Succession if he had not been encouraged by changes in the British and American attitude toward Spain. After months of very timid attempts by Anglo-American diplomacy to persuade the Spanish dictator to turn his job over to a kind of monarchist-military-clerical salvage brigade, London and Washington have swung back to their original policy of helping Franco stay in power. The Foreign Office gave the signal by signing a new monetary agreement with Spain on March 28. The State Department responded by sending to Madrid the able chief of its Division of Western European Affairs, Paul T. Culbertson. The department release of May 9 denying any change of policy toward Madrid was an inescapable consequence of the indiscretions of the Spanish press, which has been insisting that the Truman Doctrine was about to embrace fascist Spain. This statement, however, does not deny the many well-established reports of other and more indirect kinds of American help for Franco.

The White Paper announcing the Anglo-Spanish agreement was described by several British publications as a clear attempt—to use the words of the Observer—"to strengthen Franco's hand" in dealing with intensified guerrilla activities, pressing demands from the monarchists, and an economic collapse which was shaking the frail supports of the regime. In terms of direct British interests the deal makes almost no sense, yielding at best somewhere around ten million pounds. But for Franco, the British announcement of an agreement for reciprocal credits, no matter what the amount, was the best news since the end of the war.

For an entire week the Falangist radio entertained the country with comments on the accord. Actually it had no need to blow its trumpets. Throughout Spain, from Falangist headquarters to the jails, filled with new drafts of political prisoners in the worst wave of repression since 1939, everybody understood exactly what the agreement implied. By proclaiming its determination to back the fascist regime until further notice, the Foreign Office had extended an informal invitation to Franco to issue his latest decree ordering the death sentence for such crimes as "planning to carry out sabotage, kidnaping, or any act that might be construed as terrorism," or "belonging to a guerrilla band." This order is an omen of the horrid things to come. Even before it was issued, the persons executed since January 1 of this year numbered officially 107—I repeat, officially, for the real figures are much greater.

To receive a diplomat like Mr. Culbertson in Madrid has been another triumph for Franco. The immediate, logical consequence of this and the British move has been the renewal of diplomatic relations between Bolivia and Spain. The government press in La Paz quite frankly explains: "Since the great powers [Great Britain and the United States] have again begun to deal with Franco, there is no reason why the smaller powers should renounce such advantages." Madrid was prompt to suggest that Bolivia was only the first of the Latin American countries to "regularize" its relations with Spain.

Innumerable signs in the Spanish radio and press indicate that Franco now considers himself not merely a potential ally, as in the recent past, but a full partner in the Truman plan to mobilize all world forces against communism. Dressed in his new attire as the Cid Campeador of modern Spain, he is prepared, in the name of Christianity, to kill more Spaniards in the next few months than he has killed in the two preceding years.

Last December the United Nations adopted a resolution that committed them to action. Those nations that voted the resolution in good faith, with a sense of respect for the international organization and its decisions, are beginning to ask when Secretary General Lie is going to report on what has been done to carry out their decision.

When the question comes up, we probably shall hear Senator Connally or his successor again protesting in behalf of the "wonderful, proud, sensitive, patriotic, heroic people of Spain," who resent so greatly any foreign interference in their affairs. But before aggravating his support of Franco with a mockery of the Spanish people, the American spokesman should read what the liberal Catholic writer, Francis E. McMahon, said in the New York Post on April 30 just after his return from Madrid: "Before going to Spain I was half inclined to believe that outside pressures help the Franco regime, that the Spanish people resent interference by other powers to oust Franco. There had been talk about Spanish pride and Spanish determination to settle scores with Franco by themselves. I know better now. The anti-Franco elements of Spain want not less action from the outside but more." I could complete Dr. McMahon's remarks by saying that what the anti-Franco elements of Spain want is merely that the Western democracies stop their intervention in favor of Franco and fulfil their obligations toward the United Nations. Nothing more and nothing less.

Meanwhile violence in Spain is increasing. The strike in Bilbao, involving more than 50,000 men, was the first mass revolt since Franco took power. Its political character is clearly evident from the courageous statement of the strike committee: "The movement is mainly a protest against a corrupt regime, to hasten the fall of the tyranny which oppresses us all."

All Spain begins to feel that way. Only the other day I had a letter from an old Socialist friend in Spain with whom I have disagreed in recent years because he has favored a policy of compromise, even at the cost of the Republic, in order to avoid new slaughter. He now writes: "In the last few months I have been more and more revising my former position. Spain could have been made free without the spilling of more blood, and only those of us who have been here all the time know how strong was the wish that this might happen. But Britain and America have not wanted it. They are again for Franco, and they will oblige us to fight like cornered jackals. It's going to be terrible. But we shall fight."

DEL VAYO

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Prayer, Profits, and Pie

THE forty-fifth annual meeting of stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation on May 5 opened with prayer and ended with sandwiches, coffee, and custard pie. The prayer—a plea for divine blessings and guidance—was an innovation at these gatherings. It failed, so far as I could observe, to influence the tone of the proceedings, which was quite normally materialistic. The pie, a traditional bonus for Big Steel stockholders, undoubtedly has symbolic significance. Most of the three-hour discussion which preceded its consumption was concerned with the division of the corporation's production pie, and the sense of the meeting was that the stockholders' slice was far too small.

One stockholder who expressed this view—he described himself as a "Nassau County Republican"—suggested that the directors were so intimidated by the "Washington crack-pots" that even if the corporation earned $15 per common share in 1947, they wouldn't dare to pay out as much as $10 in dividends. He urged, therefore, that the stock be split four for one so as to increase the number of "tool-owners" interested in the business—a potential political-pressure group. On the present dividend basis, he pointed out, that would mean payment of $1 a share, which would appear much more modest than $4, and it might prove possible "to sneak another fifty cents onto it."

Earlier, Chairman Irving S. Olds, in the course of a lengthy review of the company's affairs, made it clear that he was not cooperating in President Truman's campaign to bring down prices. Proceeds from sales, he declared, must be sufficient to cover all costs, permit payment of fair dividends, and leave something for future capital needs: on this basis current prices were reasonable and profits not excessive. In fact, he hinted, if the newest round of wage increases led to a substantial addition to the cost of goods and services purchased by the corporation, it might be necessary to raise prices. On the other hand, it might well be argued that a reduction in steel prices would mean reduced costs for most industries, including many of those from which United States Steel purchases supplies.

An even more important consideration is the influence of prices on demand. At the present time there is a market for every ton of steel that can be squeezed out of the furnaces, and the industry is operating at very nearly 100 per cent of capacity. Consequently, overhead charges per ton, one of the major elements in steel costs, are being held to a minimum, with very favorable effects on profits. But the current demand will not be long maintained unless the gap between income and production generally is closed by the downward revision of prices for which the Administration is pressing. That will hardly be possible without a cut in the price of so basic a commodity as steel.

In this matter, however, the management of United States Steel seems to be adopting a thoroughly defeatist attitude. The corporation's annual report asserts that the long-term outlook is for the average use of about two-thirds of capacity. This would mean shipments of finished products at an average rate little higher than that for the years 1919 to 1942. And since there is a close correlation between steel output and total industrial production, this estimate indicates disbelief in our ability to maintain national income and employment at their present high levels.

Although the report thus indicated little expectation of future growth, Mr. Olds in his speech made numerous references to the need to maintain earnings at a level which would provide a margin for expansion. He did not explain this apparent contradiction. Instead he rebuked critics for not paying sufficient attention to the relation of profits to sales and invested capital. In 1946, he pointed out, although profits were higher than in any war year, they were equivalent to only 6 cents per dollar of sales, while in five peace years of comparable production they had averaged 10 cents. However, he admitted that in the first quarter of 1947 earnings were 8.26 per cent of sales. Projecting the figures over the whole year and allowing for the recent wage increase, returns at least as good as in 1946 seem to be indicated.

In the midst of all the talk about the cold arithmetic of steel a young man rose and reminded the stockholders of the human investment on which their profits depended. Announcing that he represented several stockholders and 4,000 employees, Samuel Neff told the story of a steel community under sentence of death. Ellwood City, Pennsylvania, is a one-industry town with 4,000 of its 15,000 inhabitants employed by the National Tube Company, a subsidiary of United States Steel. Some time ago the directors of the corporation decided to abandon this plant and transfer its business to Gary, Indiana, and Lorain, Ohio. Workers were offered jobs at these places but not transportation or housing. With restrained eloquence Mr. Neff showed how tragic this forced migration would be for the people of Ellwood City, 80 per cent of whom own their homes. The Steel Workers' Union, he said, had offered to cooperate with management in reducing costs but had been told that "the die was cast and nothing could change the situation." Nevertheless, he was appealing to the directors and stockholders to show that Big Steel was more than a "soulless corporation."

Mr. Olds replied with a proposal for a conference between Mr. Neff and the corporation's president, Benjamin F. Fairless, but offered no hope of reprieve. Ellwood City, he indicated, was a victim of progress: the plant was obsolete, and it was more economic to rebuild nearer the market for its products.

The 200 stockholders present had listened quietly to Mr. Neff's moving appeal. But they seemed anxious to forget the specter he had raised, and a few minutes later they were laughing at the feeble jokes and applauding the invective of a stockholder who in a rambling and often incoherent speech denounced unions and urged "collective bargaining for stockholders." Then they adjourned for pie. It would have been more appropriate, it seemed to me, to have closed the meeting with another prayer—for Ellwood City.

Children of Light

COMMUNITAS: MEANS OF LIVELIHOOD AND WAYS OF LIFE.

By Percival and Paul Goodman. The University of Chicago Press. $6.

ACCORDING to the best authority, that is, the blurb, Paul Goodman's work is "a ballet of ideas." His brother Percival is an architect with a special dislike of (American) efficiency. They squabble fraternally, both "hopped up with benzedrine." Out of their tussle emerges a synthesis worthy of Hegel himself, to the surprise and awe of the modest authors.

Frankly, the book is a circus, although soberness itself compared with some of Le Corbusier's. But I like circuses far better than I like bread. There is one paramount issue today: planning or chaos—with war as an unhappy medium. The Goodman brothers believe in planning, city planning, community planning. They are among the Children of Light.

They believe also in "surplus technology." In the United States, undoubtedly. I do not believe that the world as a whole has reached that point. Nor will it reach it if India and China keep pressing hard against the limit of subsistence. Malthus has been abundantly sneered at but not refuted.

There is a good summary of modern plans, liberal enough not to damn Sitte and his cult of the picturesque plaza, daring enough to consider the Radiant City, the Voisin Plan, antiquated. The brothers' own plan is arresting. In the center a cylinder a mile in radius, twenty stories high; rail and bus terminals in the basement, shopping and amusements on the first seven floors, light industries on the next six, offices on the last seven; an airport on top; hotels on the six-mile ribbed outer wall. Then a mile-wide ring for the university—rather a formidable campus. Beyond, residential quarters, arranged in squares which are complete home communities. Naturally, the scheme is only a "paradigm," as they call it. It has points.

Their sociological pattern is simplicity itself. Instead of pump priming, subsidies, relief, and all the devious ways of a mixed economy, let's frankly make minimum subsistence in food, clothing, and shelter a community responsibility. With modern technology these essential needs could be satisfied with a small fraction of mankind's total effort. All the spare time, all the unspent energy, could be devoted to luxury, where private enterprise would have a magnificent field. Dare we face the possibility of allowing men to die of hunger or cold? No. Then we might adopt the Goodman idea: on a sure communistic foundation rear as splendid a capitalistic edifice as you please. This, I am afraid, is a little too sane to appeal to our present rulers. All that they will see, in this witch-hunting season, is that "Communitas" has no fewer than eight letters in common with communism. The illustrations offer a blend of William Blake, the blueprint, and the comic strip that I found very attractive.

Southern Pastiche

THE WAY OF THE SOUTH. By Howard W. Odum. The Macmillan Company. $3.

HOWARD W. ODUM has now attempted a non-academic recapitulation of his scholarly contributions to the study of the South's malaise. Mr. Odum for many years directed the Institute for Research in Social Science at the University of North Carolina; his "Southern Regions" is an indispensable work in the literature of Southern regionalism, a school of which he has long been a leading figure.

The scope of "The Way of the South" is broad. Mr. Odum opens with a survey of Southern resources, briefly reviews Southern historical development, reexamines the "glory of the Old South," and so proceeds to a discussion of surviving Southern folkways, the position of the Negro, politics below the Mason and Dixon Line, and the resurgence, as he sees it, of North-South animosity since the early thirties. He winds up with a fairly technical analysis of the kinds of planning necessary for the full regional development of the South.

As a recapitulation the book must of course stand on its presentation of largely familiar material. It is precisely on this score that "The Way of the South" does its author a disservice. It mixes history and sociology, rhapsody and catalogue, impressionism and scholarly abstraction, in a totally unreadable pastiche. Explaining in his final section (headed Postscript and Preface) his own conception of the book, Mr. Odum writes:

If we have mixed the swing and rhythm of "Rainbow Round My Shoulder," "Wings on My Feet," and "Cold Blue Moon" [three novels by Mr. Odum] with the hard reality of regional development and social theory, this still reflects the mixtures of . . . "what all sights, North, South, East, and West, are," to recall again the universalism of Walt Whitman.

Unfortunately it recalls much more immediately the sententious double-talk of Norman Corwin's radio scripts. A good many pages of the opening section are given over to listing names: trees, fruits, nuts, rivers, flowers ("Of the families of . . ."), mammals ("There was the order of . . ."), birds ("Call the roll of other birds"), and so on. The generous doses of quotations include a number from Mr. Odum's own novels. This kind of thing can be effective if it is done with taste and, particularly, restraint—although even so it is more appropriate to sound track or radio delivery; here it breaks the back of what would in any case have been an uneasy, gnarled style.

Mr. Odum's principal point, that the problems of the South must be tackled with the fact of the South's basic regional differences from the rest of the country as a basic motivation, is one which very few serious Northern or Southern students would now care to dispute. On the subject of reawakened hostility between the North and South he is disappointingly sketchy.

Resistance in the Third Reich

GERMANY'S UNDERGROUND. By Allen Welsh Dulles. The Macmillan Company. $3.

MR. DULLES tells some thrilling stories in "Germany's Underground"—tales of daring conspiracies, of plots for assassination, and the weird accidents which brought them to naught. It is a book of facts, but of facts far more strange and exciting than the fictions invented by writers of mystery stories.

During the war Mr. Dulles was chief of the OSS mission in Switzerland charged with getting in touch with Hitler's enemies inside Germany. The material in his book is drawn from that experience. It is fascinating in its own right, but its principal significance lies in the fact that it confutes the experts who were so certain that practically all Germans were Nazis and that no resistance comparable to that of Frenchmen, Poles, or Norwegians existed or was to be expected in the Third Reich. Mr. Dulles's report not only proves the experts were wrong but also provokes the bitter reflection that V-Day might have come much sooner and cost much less in terms of blood, destruction, and post-war problems if Germany's underground had been recognized in time and had received the help accorded to the resistance in other countries.

Given his observation post, Mr. Dulles was not in a position to know much about the "unknown soldiers" in Germany's underground—the obscure and unimportant people who risked their lives doing the small things they were able to do: distributing leaflets, slowing down the work in war factories, helping Jews and foreign slave workers. He learned a great deal about the identity, the opinions, the plans and actions of another group, formed and led by conservative elements—army generals, high officials, civil servants—which continuously plotted the overthrow of Hitler. He reveals that Goerdeler, former lord mayor of Leipzig, and General Beck, former chief of staff of the German army, made serious attempts to liberate Germany from the Nazi regime long before the war started—and continued their attempts until both were killed.

One plan for getting rid of Hitler and preventing the war was set for execution in the days of the Czechoslovakian crisis. A military putsch had been prepared. At the crucial hour news came that Chamberlain and Daladier were on their way to Munich, and the orders were not given. After the attack on Norway the conspirators tried to ascertain the intentions of the Western powers in the event of a successful military putsch against Hitler. "An ambiguous, non-committal answer arrived," Mr. Dulles reports, "just as the offensive in the west began."

Plans for Hitler's arrest or assassination were made and tried, one after another, and on several occasions the Führer was saved only by the merest chance. The climax came with the dramatic putsch of June 20, 1944. Again through a chain of curious accidents Hitler survived. Very few of the conspirators escaped.

No doubt Germany's underground, though not lacking in heroism, owed its defeat as much to its own weaknesses as to the refusal of the Western powers to accept Germans as allies against the Nazis. Nevertheless, the resistance movement inside Germany did have some practical value. It appears for instance that the Intelligence Division of the German High Command, led by Ad-

Bathsheba's Lament in the Garden

Baring the mares'-nests that the pigeons set
To tangle with the wood-winds of the North,
October blows to wood . . . the fourth
Since David broke our vows
And married Abishag to warm him. Cold!
The pigeons bluer with it, since we met
Beside the lion-fountain, and unrolled
The tackle of our model boats. Our prows
Were sworded as the marlin, and they locked,
Clearing the mallards' grotto, half a mile
Up pond—and foundered; and our splashing mocked
The lion's wrinkled brow. My Love, a little while,

The lion frothed into the basin . . . all,
Water to water—water that begets
A child from water. And the jets
That washed our bodies drowned
The curses of Uriah when he died
For David; still a stranger! Not-at-all,
We called him, after the withdrawing tide
Of Joab's armor-bearers slew him, and he found Jehovah, the whale's belly of the pit.
He is the childless, the unreconciled
Master of darkness. Will Uriah sit
And judge? You nod and babble. But, you are a child;

At last, a child—what we were playing, when
We blew our bubbles at the moon, and fought
Like brothers, and the lion caught
The moonbeams in its jaws.
The harvest moon, earth's friend, that cared so much
For us and cared so little, comes again;
Always a stranger! Farther from my touch,
The mountains of the moon . . . whatever claws
The harp-strings with your chalky fingers. Cold
The eyelid drooping on the lion's eye
Of David, child of God. But I am old;
God is ungirded; open! I must surely die.

Taxes and Policy

TAXATION FOR PROSPERITY. By Randolph E. Paul. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $4.

THE place of taxation in full-employment policy is discussed with intelligence and common sense by Randolph E. Paul, former general counsel and tax expert of the Treasury Department.

During the 1930's economists who accepted the theory of Lord Keynes that government fiscal policy should be used to stabilize business cycles placed primary emphasis on the expansion or contraction of spending for public works. In 1932, when United States internal revenue was only about $1,500,000,000, lowering the tax rate would not have had any pronounced effect on purchasing power, even if it had been politically possible.

But with government revenues in excess of $40,000,000,000 for the current fiscal year—almost equal to the 1932 national income—the situation is very different. If there should be a serious threat of depression, judicious tax reduction could increase spendable income in the lower brackets, where it is most needed, faster and more efficiently than any other device.

As soon as the facts are stated, it becomes obvious that tax policy must be fully integrated with public-works planning and social security in any well-rounded full-employment program. Mr. Paul writes with full acceptance of this premise.

He does not, however, suggest that tax adjustment is the panacea for all our ills, and he recognizes that an ideal tax system is unattainable. Even if there were no other difficulty, it is always undesirable to change the base of taxation too abruptly. Sudden changes may provide windfalls for some businesses and individuals, while bringing unforeseeable disaster to others. Substantial readjustment of individual income-tax rates, especially the raising or lowering of individual exemptions to counterbalance deflation or inflation, is fair and sound. But changes in corporation, inheritance, and excise taxes usually raise as many perplexing problems as they solve.

Most of Mr. Paul's book, therefore, is devoted to a history and explanation of the existing tax structure. He points to many evils and inequalities, and recommends a considerable number of changes. At the same time he recognizes that anyone who has made long-range plans in relation to current taxes is entitled to expect no arbitrary or capricious shift. Short of a complete economic revolution, sound tax policy must always start with the current situation, including the cumulative effect of past actions. To take one example from the book, there is something to be said for the proposal—indorsed by Leon Henderson, among others—to eliminate corporation taxes except on undivided profits and depend entirely upon the individual income tax. However, it is extremely difficult to make such a change in a way which would be fair to the man who sold common stock the day before it was announced, and to recapture the windfall from the buyer.

In a long section on corporation taxes Mr. Paul discusses most of the current suggestions for a new policy and concludes that continuation of a fairly high corporate tax rate is a lesser evil than anything else which has been proposed.

Another phase of the problem is the idea of special benefits for small business. From the point of view of national economic health there is considerable justification for regulating taxes in such a way as to help new businesses to get started. But there is no real justification for subsidy on the basis of size—particularly since a small business in steel would be a big business in textiles—and it is not easy to reduce the tax burden for a new enterprise without giving it an unfair advantage over its competitors.

Tax avoidance and tax evasion offer equally serious complications, since a choice must be made between allowing some loopholes and writing tax laws and regulations so detailed that enforcement is virtually impossible, making the penalty in paper work required of honest firms greater than the value of collections from the dishonest. It is also too much to expect that loopholes will not occasionally slip by Congress, as in the case of depletion allowances for oil and gas wells, which have sometimes given more tax remission than the original investment, while the wells are still producing.

"Taxation for Prosperity" is too honest to be dogmatic about the way to achieve a sound tax system. It is easy to read. But the fact that an intelligent, semi-popular discussion of tax problems requires 418 pages and does not reach final conclusions raises a puzzling question as to the development of tax policy in a democracy. Only a few voters will read it, and voters cannot be expected to understand the whole tax structure. So it can only be hoped that the experts and the politicians will present the broad principles in such a way that the voters can make an intelligent choice. This is, at least, an excellent guidebook for the layman who is sufficiently interested to check up on the experts and the politicians. It might also persuade the professionals to face a few practical problems.

Aftermath of Excitement

LADY GREGORY'S JOURNALS, 1916-1930. Edited by Lennox Robinson. The Macmillan Company. $3.

IN THE pages of these journals will be found mention of all those people (nearly all; not Joyce) whom we would rather read about than anybody else—Shaw, Yeats, Synge, O'Casey, "AE," Gogarty, Stephens, and the rest, all those people whose writing in the English language was the brightest and liveliest we have known in our time. Yet these journals, it is sad to have to report, are not particularly exciting, are, even, rather dull; they begin in 1919, except for one or two earlier entries, and by that time the devotion and energy were employed in keeping or recovering; the bold wit that started things was worn down, and Lady Gregory sounds like a tired old lady, trudging faithfully where she may once, however sedately, have danced. The editor, Lennox Robinson, has grouped the entries under several headings: Coole, the Abbey Theater, Politics (but the Terror and the Civil War only, not the Rising), Persons and Books, the Lane Pictures, Odds and Ends. (Mr. Robinson has been scrupulous in preserving disparaging remarks about himself.) The importance of Lady Gregory's role in all this activity cannot be estimated from what she tells here of her actions in picking up the pieces; nor could her ability as a writer be determined from the prose style of the journals: was she always, maybe, a little too serious and earnest? One flash of impatience, at least, has a delightful combination of wit and malice in its exasperation: "Mrs. MacSwiggan (an actress in the Abbey Theater), Mrs. MacSwiggan, being English, has no respect for words and hits with extraordinary perversity on the wrong one to accentuate in each sentence."

The Young Holmes

TOUCHED WITH FIRE: Civil War Letters and Diary of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., 1861-1864. Edited by Mark DeWolfe Howe. Harvard University Press. $3.

ON THE whole these letters are dull. They no doubt have a value for historians and for students of the Justice's career and the Civil War's military history; and for long-time Bostonians. But the reader who is not a specialist will resent having to plow through so much that is insignificant to find so little that is interesting. The letters to his family and the diary fragments are the briefest of battlefield notes. Yet they seldom contain a sense of the battlefield—to communicate this is an artist's work. Moreover, the notes were written—and the editor has transcribed them—in Holmes's hurried shorthand. Again, historians will appreciate this; the general reader will not. The editor's lengthy footnotes also are largely uninteresting except to Bostonians.

A rather curious thing about these jottings is that Holmes really made and preserved them for historians. "Keep all letters that are at all historical," he cautions his parents. And Mr. Howe reveals that the true editor of the collection was Holmes himself—that the Justice destroyed certain letters and pieces of the diary which he did not want preserved. This sense of history is part of a sharp consciousness of role which the aristocrat Holmes had as a young man.

In "Touched with Fire" this self-consciousness appears chiefly in a sense of duty and honor. Besides these arisa leading Indian journalist, tells the stirring story of his countrymen's fight for freedom

I'VE SHED MY TEARS

A Candid View of Resurgent India

D. F. Karaka is a Parsi—neither Hindu nor Moslem, but Indian, and of an ancient family. He is a journalist of note—staff member of the Bombay Chronicle, special writer on domestic affairs, foreign correspondent in the CBI theatre, SHAEF, occupied Germany.

In this striking book he has told the full story of India's march toward freedom, as he has seen it himself, as he himself has lived it. Here are the important movements of three decades—the rise of Gandhi and “non-violent non-cooperation”; the work of the Congress Party; the growing power of the Moslem League; the gradual emancipation of India's women. Here are the events that have made headlines—the Amritsar Massacre; the Bengal famine; the war and the “Quit India” resolution; the rise of anti-British violence. Here are the leaders, as Mr. Karaka has seen them in action—Gandhi and Nehru, Jinnah and Patel and Narayan, and many others.

Here is also Mr. Karaka's unusual personal story. In his own life, he has repeated the experiences of his people. Secure prosperity under British rule; snubs as well as triumphs when he was an Oxford undergraduate; a growing feeling of identification with the Indian people as he travelled the country on journalistic missions; a full conversion to the ideal of freedom; and a crushing tragedy here in America—these things have marked his days. These things make his story both moving in itself, and illuminating of the problems of his land.

If you would know what is really happening in India today, and why, read this book.

tocratic values Holmes unfortunately also had a good bit of upper-class intellectual snobism. “While I'm living in aristocracy I'm an out-and-outer of a democrat in theory, but for contact, except at the polls, I loathe the thick-fingered clowns we call the people—especially as the beasts are represented at political centers.” (A stay in Washington—“that modern Gomorrah”—was the occasion of this outburst.)

Allied with his aristocratic sense of duty is Holmes's relation to his father, which is easily the book's greatest source of interest. Two of the letters to his father are downright boastful: after complaining about the “blowing” of others, he writes—“I really very much doubt whether there is any Reg't wh. can compare with ours in the Army of the Potomac.” It is obvious that he strongly wanted his father to know that he “had done his duty.” And, in fact, he had—with distinction.

But in 1864, when nearly all his early fellow-officers had been killed or wounded and he himself had suffered several wounds, he decided not to reenlist after the disbandment of his regiment. He felt—and doctors confirmed—that his strength was no longer equal to the burden of active campaigning. He “didn't any longer believe in this being a duty,” he wrote. It does not become clear whether this change in belief was due simply to his personal condition, to his view of the war, or to the fact that after three years of fighting he had become a man in his own eyes, with no further need to prove himself one to his father.

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE influence of Paul Klee has had, in the past ten years or so, a more immediately rewarding effect upon contemporary painting than that of Matisse, Picasso, or Miro, who are all greater than he. The latest evidence of this has come, surprisingly enough, from Paris, which in contrast with England and this country had until recently shown an indifference to Klee. The only new Parisian painters of any originality to be exhibited in New York since the war—Dubuffet and now Victor Brauner—are both products of his school. Brauner, Rumanian and surrealist, used to turn out neo-academic pictures of tables with wolf's legs and heads and human testicles. Judging by the ten or twelve of his more recent paintings shown at Julien Levy's last month, he has undergone a remarkable transformation since 1939—that is why I call him a new painter. His old canvases revealed a glimmering of some sort of obscured talent and the presence of a perverted sincerity; he was irrelevant but, unlike most other surrealists, he was irrelevant in an affecting way. Now, however, he has produced some actually good painting which, if it is less important than Dubuffet's as statement and manifestation, is not inferior in intrinsic quality.

Brauner's new paintings and tinted drawings are done in wax, which he was forced to use because of a shortage of oil colors during the war. This medium compels a flatter and tighter handling and excludes the broad modeling that oil invites. Brauner has abandoned his former smoky effects for a flat-patterned, ornamental, emblematic kind of painting that clings as closely to the picture surface as inlay work—which indeed it resembles. He also demonstrates an entirely unexpected inventiveness as a draftsman, an inventiveness that has nothing to do with the usual surrealism but stems directly, more directly than his color, from Klee.

Brauner, coming after Dubuffet, Mark Tobey, and Morris Graves, raises more sharply than ever the question why Klee's influence should be so much more immediately fructifying than Picasso's, whose influence has certainly been greater in extent and more pervasive. Here is a former third-rater who now, suddenly, is well on the way to becoming accepted as an important petit under Klee's tutelage, and there are five or six others like him abroad in the world; whereas of those who follow Picasso closely, hardly one—not Graham Sutherland in England or Pignon and the other epigones in France—has been able to realize himself half so satisfactorily.

The explanation is both obvious and complex. Picasso's influence carries with it the flavor of a potent personality, and the style he formed for himself, in the later even more than in the earlier stages of cubism, is designed to accommodate that personality. Artists taking his style as a point of departure find it difficult to disembarass themselves of Picasso's personality, difficult to push it out of the way and fill in with their own. Even Picasso himself has since 1925 been largely unable to supply the power and freshness his original style requires and must resort to inflation. Painters with talents self-assured and imperious enough to shape these mighty means to their own ends are in any case very rare. If Jackson Pollock has been able to flout by Picasso, it is because he has infused him with Miró and Kandinsky.)

Klee, on the other hand, is a small artist—genuine, enormously original, a master, but nevertheless diminutive, working within a restricted range; an interior decorator rather than an architect. His personality, however authentic and intense, does not oppress but rather frees the painter who comes under his influence. If the artist's temperament is modest one, as is usually the case in a period like ours that drives passionate people away from art, contact with Klee encourages him to release it in sincerity rather than suppress it in imitation. Seeing how much Klee made of relatively little, the aspirant is moved to confess how little he himself has and to make the most of that little. While Picasso tempts one to inflate and distend himself and deny weaknesses, Klee invites one to tell all—work your brushpoint fully over the surface, let it be a seismograph that answers every tremor in yourself: invent, invent.

Picasso asks you to construct rather than invent, to survey the terrain of your emotion more consciously and build upon it the largest and most substantial edifice possible—not, like Klee, to send a demountable tracery and momentary lists of color. This does not mean that Picasso is more "intellectual" or deliberate than Klee; he works, in fact, faster than Klee did, and with less meditation. It is simply that he sees the picture as a whole where Klee sees it as a page, and when one paints a wall one has to have a more comprehensive awareness of the surroundings and a more immediate sense of architectural discipline—though Klee's sense in that respect, if slighter in scale, should not be discounted.

It is the old difference between Nordic and Mediterranean. Klee's influence has been reinforced by the fact that the centers of artistic production having moved northward—even within France itself—fewer new artists appear whose native milieux instill temperamental affinities with Picasso's positive, public, monumental style. Klee's private lyricism is more sympathetic to those who come from industrial countries, where the effort to assert a private life of emotion displaces the ambition to externalize and to synthesize a total view of the world.

Yet the doubt persists whether Klee's art, as compared with the still unexploited potentialities of the cubist heritage, has enough carrying power to support a school of major importance. I myself would say that even the earlier abstract painting of Kandinsky provides a firmer point d'appui. So far none of the products of the Klee school has been able to do more than make an original initial statement of his personality and then stop short, with nowhere else to go. Witness Graves and Tobey. And Klee himself, in the last decade of his life, found that his means were no longer adequate to express what he still had to say. Therefore one awaits Dubuffet's and Brauner's next moves with pessimism—less warranted perhaps in the case of Dubuffet since he has more bravado than is usual with Klee's disciples.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

FORM and analysis seminars have one useful purpose, at least," wrote this column's favorite correspondent, and my most recent source of information about the way music is taught in the universities. "Nobody who spends his time in one of them actually analyzing pieces of music will ever be dogmatic about form again." That is the exaggeration of youth: aged sobriety would say that nobody should. "I have been amazed at the variations which Mozart, the 'most formal of composers,' can produce: structures perfectly logical in their organization, perfectly capable of saying what he wants to say, yet impossible to cram into any textbook form. The people in the seminar, when they began to hit these sports (in terms of the textbook) naturally first tried to do just that; but as they progressed they discovered that the sports were more frequent than the 'normal' forms; and the result has been frustration: the terminology has broken down, and that's always a bad thing for the student mind—it means he has lost his anchor."

This was a seminar; in the classes below seminar-level students are not confused in this way. It would seem axiomatic that ideas about music should be derived from experience of the music; but the students in theory classes do not normally get their ideas of musical language and form from first-hand examination of the language and forms of the works of the great composers: they get them from the textbooks of theorists "whose grammatical knowledge," said Tovey, "is based upon no known language."

Nor is this true only of the teaching of theory. In a course in history in which, my correspondent tells me, exactly one meeting was devoted to the English madrigal and lute schools—not to the music of one composer, but to the entire varied output of all the composers—and two meetings to the entire eighteenth-century comic opera, there is no time for the deriving of ideas from the music itself. "I made the mistake of looking into the subject of eighteenth-century comic opera, and it was two weeks before I was able to get out of it again. All this past week I have been going hammer and tongs at the Italian and English madrigal schools, so that I am now about to be familiar enough with enough of the music to feel that I know something about it; but in the meantime the history class is heaven knows where—I don't."

Most of the members of that class presumably have acquired a "knowledge" of the English madrigal and lute schools consisting of a series of names in their notebooks, each name with a sentence or two of description and evaluation copied out of a book or taken down in class. My correspondent, on the other hand, has derived from his experience of the music his own ideas and estimates of the various composers, which have led him to suspect that some of those descriptions and evaluations in books and lectures were themselves not acquired from experience of the music.

His reward for his work, he writes, has been his discovery of the music of Dowland—"the most famous of the English lutenist song composers: and for once it is a fully deserved reputation"—and Gesualdo. "Historically, Gesualdo is one of those rare and fascinating individuals, a sport"—which "makes him difficult to handle if you are writing history in terms of trends;" and so he was long ignored. "But even more interesting than the fact that he stands outside of his time is the fact that he wrote great music: of its sort some of the most powerful I have ever heard." And "it is a matter of history (Grove, II, P. 373) that the ten volumes of his works went through not less than 25 different editions between 1594 and 1626, one of them, the third book of 5-part madrigals being reprinted five times. Consequently it is not surprising that Lang concludes ('Music in Western Civilization,' p. 327): 'Many, if not the majority, of Gesualdo's madrigals must, however, be considered closet madrigals, because their frightful, ragged, unvocal writing makes their performance by a vocal ensemble well-nigh impossible.' That they are hard to sing cannot be doubted; that they are possible to sing is quite as obvious; that Gesualdo's contemporaries sang them is fully demonstrated by the bibliographical record: why does Lang have to manufacture a myth? All this colorful patter about 'frightful, ragged, unvocal writing' is a bald-faced fabrication which an examination of the madrigals disproves in a moment: I have found in them a rare diminished fourth, and occasionally a diminished fifth—which even sight-singing students are taught to sing, and which constitute the 'frightful, ragged, unvocal writing.'"

Then, "Einstein is perhaps even more renowned for his studies in the madrigal than for his Mozart studies. Consequently, in his 'Short History of Music,' it is not amazing to find that all he has to say about Gesualdo (and Marenzio also, for that matter) is (p. 60) that 'Rore initiated a chromaticism which . . . in the compositions of Luca Marenzio and Gesualdo da Venosa was to lead to extremes of daring—but not based upon clear harmonic perception and hence not fully absorbed by the main stream of development.'" Of the four madrigals of Marenzio that my correspondent has been able to examine only one—printed in Schering's "History of Music in Examples"—has a section that is markedly chromatic; "and all the modulations in this passage are either an applied dominant-to-tonic relation or an alternation of major and minor mode, while in addition one progression exhibits the essential features of what would now be called a modulating sequence. I am under the delusion that all these (a) demonstrate clear harmonic perception, and (b) have since been absorbed by the main stream of development." And on the other hand "Gesualdo's chromaticism was not based on the major-minor, tonic-dominant relationships which ultimately prevailed: why should it have been? But to claim that it is not based on clear harmonic perception is to deny the evidence of one's ears: in every example I have been able to run down it always comes off—provided one is not so hog-tied by tonic-dominant prejudice that one can't hear it for what it is."

But on examination papers—in answer to the question "Discuss the following: (a) Gesualdo . . ."—students who haven't heard a note of his music will write: "His extreme chromaticism was not based upon clear harmonic perception and hence not fully absorbed by the main stream of development. The frightful, ragged, unvocal writing in his madrigals makes their performance by a vocal ensemble almost impossible."

Letters to the Editors

The Soviet Tartars

Dear Sirs: In the second part of his Britain Without Empire (The Nation, April 12), Mr. Laski says: "But there is good reason for assuming that we could do in Malaya a great work patterned upon the remarkable achievements of Soviet Russia with its national minorities, notably with the Tartar Republic."

As an expert on Russia, Mr. Laski ought to have known that the Tartar Republic as well as a few others were liquidated during the war for "disloyalty" to the Soviet government. The majority of the populations of the liquidated regions have been exiled to Siberia.

MARKOOSHA FISCHER

New York, April 30

[According to Soviet Russia Today, the Tartars in the U. S. S. R. have been mainly concentrated in two sections of the country, the Middle Volga and the Crimea. The Tartar Autonomous Republic on the Volga, which has a population of over 3,000,000, was not liquidated nor were its inhabitants deported. The other large settlement of Tartars was in the Crimea, where about one-fourth of the 1,132,360 inhabitants were Tartars. When the Germans occupied the Crimea, says Soviet Russia Today, "many of the Crimean Tartars succumbed to their propaganda and aided the enemy. After the liberation of the Crimea . . . the Crimean A. S. S. R. was demoted from the status of an Autonomous Republic to that of an Autonomous Region, and the Crimean Tartars were sent away." — EDITORS THE NATION.]

Who Talks for the Arabs?

Dear Sirs: The Higher Arab Committee for Palestine claims to represent the Palestine Arabs as a whole; in reality, it represents only a small minority of the population, mainly the effendis and the feudal landlords. As the spokesman of the Palestine Arab delegation, Mr. Ghouri, has admitted, the Mufti is the head of it. But the Mufti no longer has as many followers as he had some years ago. Proof of this is the fact that his efforts to arouse the Arabs of Palestine to a pogrom against the Jews have utterly failed. Observers agree that many of the Arabs of Palestine are siding with the Jews: they give shelter to fugitive Jews hunted by the British and carry on relations with the Jews as good neighbors.

Many leading persons among the Moslems who form more than 90 per cent of the Arab population are friendly toward the Jews. Proof of it is found in the murders of Arabs committed by agents of the Mufti: no fewer than twelve have occurred in recent months, in addition to twenty murders of Arab spiritual and political leaders during the recent war. Many of the Khaldis and Nashashibis, the most ancient patricians of Palestine, would come to an understanding with the Jews if they were only sure that the Mufti and his party had no longer the support of the British government, which is now backed by the Americans. The majority of the Arabs of Palestine are voiceless. They are patronized by the Arab League, which is united only in its anti-Zionist attitude—the League was the creation of the late Lord Moyne and the notorious General

Spears, who quite recently defended the Mufti.

Furthermore, the most vociferous supporters of the "Arab cause" are to be found among the Arab Christians, who form less than 10 per cent of the Arab population of Palestine. At every turn you find Arab Christians of Palestine in the forefront of the struggle. Even the Palestine Arab Higher Committee is guided by Arab Christians: Mr. Ghouri, the spokesman of the Palestinian delegation, is a Christian. The Falastin of Jaffa and many other newspapers edited by Christian Arabs have printed the most poisonous and vitriolic diatribes against the Jews.

The Lebanese Moslems also are playing the game of the Arab League against the majority of the Christians of the Lebanon, represented by the Maronite Patriarch and the Archbishop of Beirut, who on several occasions have expressed their sympathy for the Jews of Palestine.

The allegation of Mr. Ghouri, in his letter of May 5 addressed to the United Nations, that "the Arabs have never recognized the Mandate over Palestine or any act or body deriving from it" does not coincide with the facts. Emir Feisal, later King of Iraq, was acknowledged by the British government and the Allied and Associated Nations of the First World War to be the official spokesman of all Arab countries, including Palestine, and he officially recognized the Balfour Declaration.

At that time the Mandate was opposed by only a few Arabs—some of the Husseins, the family of the Mufti, and some members of the Abd Al-Hadi, a family of great landlords near Nablus.

The Palestine Arab Higher Committee has no right to claim recognition as a representative of the Arabs in Palestine; it cannot be compared with the Jewish Agency, which has an international legal status.

The British army deserves a better fate than to be the tool of Bevin and Attlee in suppressing the rights of the Jewish people in Palestine. And the British people, who have always protected the minorities of other countries against violence and injustice, would act differently if they were told the truth about the Jews and the Arabs in Palestine.

Our Marxist President

Dear Sirs: As you know, aid to Greece intended to prevent the spread of communist ideology, of which, according to the Truman Doctrine, misery is the carrier. This doctrine is, I regret to say, subconscious Marxism. It was in its introduction to "Zur Kritik der politischen Oekonomie" that Marx, some eighty years ago, established the theory that the political system is merely the superstructure of economic conditions. According to his Verelendungs-theorie, the inevitable concentration of capital will eventually result in expropriating the expropriators, that is, in socialism.

There can be no doubt that our distinguished President plans to employ his theory in reverse. In his view the menace of communism can be averted by alleviating the poverty of the Greek people. This subconscious Marxist apparently does not believe in the power of ideas, or, as they are now called in this country, "philosophies." If he seriously wishes to counterbalance the red menace—and not merely to set Anglo-American imperialism against Russian imperialism—he should offer not only $250,000,000 but an ideology which appeals as strongly to the imagination of the masses as that of Marx and Lenin did. Unfortunately the ideology of "free competition" is negative and therefore insufficient. Administering a rebuff to communism is no substitute for a positive and hopeful idea. However, Mr. Truman and his fellow-travelers are so deeply imbued with their subconscious though erroneous Marxism that they believe they can stop communism merely by feeding the proletarian descendants of Plato and Aristotle.

An ideological alternative to communism was of course offered by Senator Vandenberg, when in his answer to Stroyko he spoke of the "conflict between communism and democracy." But even a high-school graduate should know that communism is an economic concept, democracy a political or at most social one. Therefore they are not true equivalents.

I think Truman and his fellow-travelers in their ideological vacuum are adherents of Schiller:

Bis einst Philosophie die Welt im Innersten zusammenhält, erhält sich ihr Getriebe durch Hunger und durch Liebe.

A Nation Supplement

INTRODUCTION

THE United Nations meets in extraordinary session two years almost to the day since its foundation in San Francisco on April 25, 1945. In Germany Allied war tribunals are still condemning those Nazis responsible for the massacre of the Jews. But Jewish survivors of the Nazi terror still languish in detention camps. Barbed wire bars them from freedom on the island of Cyprus, and in Palestine the restrictions set up under the White Paper provide a barrier equally impassable.

The Charter of the United Nations reaffirms "faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small." It undertakes "to establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained."

The Palestine case, now before the United Nations, is a challenge to the conscience of mankind. More than that, it is a challenge to the honor of the United Nations, its capacity to maintain peace, and its willingness to extend the area of human rights and dignity.

Today on the continent of Europe 1,369,800 Jews remain alive out of a pre-war population of 6,500,000, exclusive of the Soviet Union, which had a Jewish population of 3,000,000, half of whom were destroyed by the Nazis. The mass slaughter of the Jewish people was accomplished by the Nazis without effective interference from other nations.

Not until the war's end did the world come to know the full details of a horror so dark it defied belief—the story of more than six million Jews herded into camps, deported, starved to death, tortured to death, gassed to death, burned to death, or massacred in the towns where they lived.

The argument may be valid that no general measures of rescue were possible during the war years. But it must also be said that the Nazi extermination program was planned by Hitler even before he came to power and was put into effect, bit by bit, throughout the years of bloodless conquest between 1933 and 1939. The pattern was everywhere the same: withdrawal of citizenship, suppression of organized opposition, denial of livelihood, expropriation of property, humiliation of the individual, and finally deportation and death. Few of those who could have been saved—even those who sought safety in flight—were saved, for no country was willing to open a single door to rescue a single life.

One people in one country was prepared to welcome these victims—the Jewish community in Palestine. But the doors of Palestine too were slammed shut in the face of the suppliants. The British White Paper, enacted in May, 1939, limited immigration to 75,000 in five years, at the rate of 15,000 per year. This restrictive order, which was declared illegal by the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations, was enacted, quite frankly, in an effort to appease the Arabs.

This act of appeasement, like other similar acts of the Chamberlain government, resulted in failure. The White Paper violated the Mandate, but it did not buy the loyalty of the Arabs. Their war record was one of enmity and double-dealing. The Jews, on the other hand, though injured and betrayed by the restrictions imposed in the White Paper, played a notable role in the defeat of the Axis.

In the following record we show:

1. That a Jewish state in Palestine was promised to the Jews of the world and indorsed by the nations of the world.

2. That the White Paper of 1939 and the British announcement of the independence of Transjordan were in contravention of the terms of the Mandate.

3. That the British Labor Party, after 1920, and most recently on the eve of its victory in the 1945 elections, promised to open the doors of Palestine to Jewish immigration and to establish there a Jewish state.

4. That there is no hope of rescue for the survivors of Hitler's extermination program apart from Palestine.

5. That the present policy of the British is based on the mistaken belief that only by continued support and appeasement of the Arab rulers and politicians can their threatened position in the Middle East be safeguarded.

6. That the intimidation program of the Arabs is led by men who organized and carried out the Arab campaign of sabotage against the United Nations.

7. That the threat of a general Arab revolt is a form of political blackmail and cannot possibly be put into effect.

And, last, we propose a program based on the realities of the present situation, to be enacted in three parts: for the immediate future, for an interim period while political adjustments are being made, and for the long range.

At the war's end the common assumption was that the first victims of Hitlerism would be the first to be rescued by a sympathetic world. That the doors of Palestine would be promptly opened to the Jews was taken for granted, especially after the Labor Party came to power in Great Britain.

President Truman, within two months after the end of the war, dispatched Earl Harrison to Europe to investigate the plight of the Jews. Upon receiving his report, on August 31, 1945, the President requested the British Labor government to open Palestine to the 100,000 Jewish refugees then in the German displaced-persons camps.

Almost two years have passed. The refugees have not been admitted to Palestine except in insignificant numbers, even though the Anglo-American Committee—the eighteenth commission of inquiry since the Balfour Declaration—studied the problem anew in 1946 and again requested the admission of 100,000.

Today the refugee colony in Germany, Austria, and Italy numbers almost 250,000. Every method of exclusion and repression has been utilized by the British government to prevent the entry of these people into Palestine.

Behind this policy is the larger purpose of seeking support for British imperial interests, both material and strategic, from the ruling elements among the Arabs, even at the cost of defending a decadent feudal and hierarchical social system and at the same time violating the commitments embodied in the Palestine Mandate.

It is this indefensible situation which our program aims to abolish. For we believe that the rescue of the surviving Jews of Europe and the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine are wholly compatible with the legitimate interests of the Arabs as well as those of Britain and the other Western nations, including the United States.

PROPOSED PLAN FOR PALESTINE

WE PROPOSE, and intend to show in the chapters which follow, that the United Nations, in the interests of peace, human dignity, and security, should adopt a clear-cut plan for the development and political control of Palestine and bring about its acceptance by the British government, the Jews, and the Arabs. As preliminary steps, to prepare the way for a full inquiry and a workable decision, we urge:

1. That the General Assembly uphold the ruling of the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations declaring the White Paper of 1939 illegal, and request that it be expunged from record and practice.

2. That the General Assembly repudiate the unilateral action of the British government establishing Transjordan as an independent kingdom without authorization of the United Nations.

In order to meet the long-range, interim, and immediate needs of the situation, we propose:

In the Interests of a Permanent Solution—

1. That two independent states be created, a Jewish state and an Arab state.

2. In planning these states account should be taken of the original area assigned under the Balfour Declaration and the Mandate, now known as Palestine and Transjordan, and the concessions already made to satisfy Arab demands.

3. That the Jewish state be established in a contiguous area large enough to constitute a viable national territory and to allow for the absorption of as many of the surviving Jews of Europe as wish to immigrate.

4. That both states, however constituted, guarantee equality of rights to all inhabitants without distinction of race or religion, and that all communities be given full autonomy in the administration of their religious, educational, and social institutions.

5. That the Jewish state grant official recognition to the Arabic language and to Arab schools.

6. That upon the establishment of the Jewish state and the Arab state, both be admitted to membership in the United Nations.

A number of plans have been suggested to implement the general idea proposed above. We recommend special consideration of the two plans summarized herewith:

Plan 1. The Jewish state should be established in an area of 10,400 square miles, to include those parts of Palestine, chiefly in the west, already closely settled by Jews, together with additional areas of Palestine at present undeveloped and lightly populated, including 4,500 square miles in the Negev and an area of 3,400 miles, now either uninhabited or very sparsely settled, to be detached from Transjordan.

The Arab state would include Transjordan, less the area detached, and an area of 3,300 square miles, to be detached from Palestine, in which some 500,000 Arabs now live. A new Arab state would thus be established in an area of 34,600 square miles.

Since historically Transjordan has always been a part of Palestine and was comprised within the area to which the Balfour Declaration was intended to apply, the addition to Transjordan of 3,300 square miles would complete the process of satisfying Arab demands for an independent state begun in 1922 when Transjordan was separated from Palestine by the mandatory power.

Plan 2. Another proposal with respect to the area in which the Jewish state should be constituted provides that the state should be established in those parts of Palestine, chiefly in the west, already closely settled by Jews, together with 4,500 square miles of the Negev. The Jewish state would thus be constituted in an area of 7,600 square miles.

The Arab area would comprise the remaining 2,800 square miles of Palestine, including the hill district of Samaria, forming a rectangle with Nablus as the center, now exclusively inhabited by an Arab population.

This area could either be constituted as an independent state or, if both parties agree, merged politically with the adjoining state of Transjordan. The Arab state, if this union were agreed upon, would be established in an area of 37,200 square miles.

As an Interim Program—

1. Until the process of creating the two states has been completed, we propose that the Mandate be withdrawn from Great Britain and that Palestine be placed under the United Nations, with a High Commissioner appointed by the United Nations and the protection of an international police force.

2. In this interim period the United Nations should initiate the economic development of the region through such undertakings as the proposed Jordan Valley project.

As an Immediate Program—

1. The present British military force should be reduced to its normal garrison size and be retained until the international police force can take over, and martial law should be ended.

2. In view of the urgent needs of European Jewry, 250,000 Jews—the present Jewish population in the D. P. camps—should be admitted immediately into Palestine and settled in those sections certain to be allocated to the Jewish state.

3. Until such time as the Jewish state is actually created, authority should be transferred to the Jewish Agency to regulate immigration. The Jewish Agency should be recognized as the official principal representative of the Jewish state to be established.

The solution proposed above is not ideal. It will not be wholly satisfactory to Great Britain, to the Arabs, or to the Jews. It is, however, capable of fulfilling, at least in part, the fundamental aspiration of both Jews and Arabs—the aspiration to independent nationhood. Such a solution, moreover, offers the one hope of securing peace in Palestine.

THE NEED FOR MIGRATION

FIVE hundred thousand Jews in Europe, almost half of the surviving Jewish population, "may wish or be impelled to migrate from Europe," according to the report of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry.

An exhaustive study by the committee, country by country, revealed an active anti-Semitism which, added to the impoverishment and the psychological horror of living in countries responsible for the slaughter of their families and friends, has produced a frantic desire, as well as a need, to emigrate.

In the words of the committee, while "the governments of the countries we visited expressed their opposition to anti-Semitism . . . this is a poison which after years of infection takes years to eradicate."

When the Anglo-American Committee's report was published on April 20, 1946, there were 74,000 Jewish displaced persons in Germany. Today, in the American military zones in Germany and Austria and in the British zones in Germany and Italy, there is a Jewish displaced persons population of 247,337. The dissolution of UNRRA and the inability of the International Refugee Organization immediately to assume its responsibilities place the Jewish D. P.'s in a very precarious situation.

Jews in Europe Today

Of the 5,978,000 European Jews destroyed as a result of the Nazi extermination program between 1939 and the war's end, Poland lost 2,800,000; the occupied area of the Soviet Union, 1,500,000; Rumania, 425,000; Hungary, 200,000; Czechoslovakia, 260,000; France, 90,000; Germany, 170,000; Austria, 40,000; Lithuania, 135,000; Holland, 90,000; Latvia, 85,000; Belgium, 40,000; Yugoslavia, 50,000; Greece, 60,000; Italy, 15,000; Bulgaria, 7,000; and miscellaneous countries, 6,000.

The property losses suffered by the Jewish people in the Nazi-occupied areas totaled approximately eight and one-half billion dollars, a sum amounting to approximately one-half of the pre-war wealth of Poland, and two billion dollars more than the entire farm income of the United States in 1941. Included in the property losses were about one million business, industrial, and professional establishments, in addition to the losses sustained by the community, such as the destruction of virtually all Jewish institutions.

Although abrogation of all discriminatory legislation was ordered by the Allied military authorities and confirmed by the Potsdam agreement, there has been a steady flow of Jews from Central and Eastern Europe toward Palestine. The abrogation of discriminatory legislation has not restored to the Jews a sense of security or made it possible for them to become self-sustaining, nor has the restitution of property and indemnification proceeded smoothly; little has been done to restore property or provide compensation for damage or to create the basis for self-support.

In Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia a majority of the Jewish population is dependent upon relief from overseas.

Of the large proportion of Jewish wealth consisting of movables, securities, and funds, the greater part was carried away, consumed, or is now in the possession of persons who either cannot be traced or are not affected by existing legislation. Industrial and commercial enterprises, even if restored, are shells. Stocks and machines have been sold or have just disappeared. Real estate, in the relatively few cases that it has been returned to the original owner, is in a state of great dilapidation.

Anti-Semitism Still Strong

Colonel Stanley R. Mickelsen, director of the Displaced Persons Division of the United States Military Government, in response to a question as to whether or not anti-Semitism was decreasing among the Germans, told the Anglo-American Committee: "I don't think there is any change among the Germans. Outwardly, yes, but inwardly, no—inwardly, anti-Semitism is still strong."

Bartley C. Crum, American member of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry and author of "Behind the Silken Curtain," says also, "Our military frankly fear for Jewish lives if our armies are withdrawn."

An increase in anti-Semitism in Germany and Austria is reported by members of the Anglo-American Committee despite the fact that in a city like Vienna only 4,500 Jews remained at the time of their inquiry, and in a country like Germany only 20,000.

Time and again, said Bartley Crum, witnesses have stated: "Once Hitler and the Nazis sought to exterminate us. Hitler made the plan but it was the peoples of Europe, regardless of nationality, who were our executioners. Hitler wanted us exterminated in Poland, but it was the Poles who executed us; Hitler wanted us exterminated in Rumania, but it was the Rumanians who executed us; and so it was in Slovakia, in Hungary, in Bulgaria, in Austria, and elsewhere."

Conditions in the D. P. Camps

In April, 1946, when the Jewish D. P. population in the American zone numbered 74,000, Judge Simon H. Rifkind, Adviser on Jewish Affairs to the Commanding General of the American Forces in the European Theater, reported that what the D. P.'s require is "everything."

But above all else they need to know today that tomorrow will not bring a continuation of their present state of suspense. In order to live peacefully they must learn today that tomorrow will bring them nearer their goal. They need a home they can love, a soil they can cherish, an atmosphere they can breathe without resentment. They require a chance to strike root, to work for a living, to raise a family. They must get away from the scenes of their torture and grief.

I am convinced that the problem of these Jews of Europe is insoluble without Palestine. It is the one place available for mass migration. The Jews of Palestine are eager to receive their European brothers. In Palestine these Jews will find the warm welcome they so earnestly desire and need. They will find a home and an end to their wanderings. . . . The group ties they have developed will not be shattered but will continue. Their culture will be tenderly nursed and will again contribute its part to world civilization.

A year later the problem had not been resolved and the number of Jews in the D. P. camps had multiplied almost threefold. Describing how the Jews in the D. P. camps live, Judge Rifkind said:

How do these Jews live? The one-word answer to that question is—abnormally. Family groups are practically unknown among them, because the members of their families are dead. They are destitute, because the Germans stripped them of everything. A child is a rare treasure among them, because extermination of the young was a high Nazi priority. Few of them can follow their normal callings; most of the younger ones have never learned a trade or acquired a skill. To work and save for the future is meaningless because the German marks have no value outside of Germany. They are surrounded by a hostile population, whom they hate with an intensity beyond the capacity of words to describe. They suffer from psychological and physical ills as a result of their experiences in the concentration camps. Their whole civilization, so laboriously and so lovingly created over the centuries, has been brought low; its leadership is dead; its institutions, religious, educational, social, and economic, have been demolished. Every factor which contributes to normal living in the world as we know it is conspicuously absent in the lives of these people. Moreover, since liberation they have suffered painful disappointment and disillusionment. They had expected the miracle of liberation to be followed by world-wide welcome extended by a repentant mankind, which had permitted them to suffer such barbarism. Instead, they awoke to find themselves in the chilly atmosphere of a displaced-persons center with every avenue of escape to a land of freedom and dignity closed to them. They see their persecutors live in better homes, wearing better clothes, listening to the laughter of their children. They see their enemies resume the threads of organized existence while they themselves live from minute to minute waiting for the unpredictable tomorrow. Is it any wonder they are impatient with sluggish investigations, judicial inquiries, and long-winded resolutions? The amazing thing is that despite this history and despite these provocations these men have so far kept their heads and sustained their faith.

Bartley Crum states that in one poll where D. P.'s were asked to put down a second choice if Palestine were unavailable, hundreds said, "The crematorium."

The D. P.'s and Security

The G-5 Division of the United States Army, European Theater, reported on January 1, 1947:

For those able to make an accurate evaluation of facts, the displaced-persons problem represents one of the greatest human tragedies in history. . . . The displaced persons have a temporary haven in Germany even though it is a country they hate. . . . But for the future welfare and eventual normal adjustment of these people this situation cannot be permitted to endure much longer.

The army's report also emphasizes that the primary desire among displaced persons is "to get out of Germany. The Jewish refugees have united among themselves to demand immigration to Palestine."

In the spring of 1947 reports of the movement of some 140,000 Jews in the displaced-persons camps toward Palestine was reported. On April 7, 1947, both the American army and War Department officials in Washington made it clear that they were powerless to block a mass underground movement of Jews to Palestine from Austria and Germany this spring.

While explaining that the United States has not closed the borders of the United States zone in Germany against Jews arriving from Eastern Europe since V-E Day, the army report emphasizes the urgent necessity of finding a place of permanent settlement for them, both in order to relieve the financial burden which the American taxpayer is carrying and in order to rehabilitate people who "are potentially useful citizens." The report points out that of the 39,000 visas available under the President's directive of December 22, 1945, 26,000 represent the pre-war quota to German nationals and still available to them annually. Thus only 1,100 per month are available to displaced persons coming from other countries.

Moreover, the army points out, the continuance of such a large population of displaced persons could conceivably become dangerous. In this connection it says:

The great majority of them are law-abiding and sincerely grateful to the United States, but idleness, a monotonous diet, limited activities, and the inability to lead normal lives may in time breed a feeling of frustration which might break out in any number of ways.

Tension is growing among the Germans, who are resentful of the impact on their economy of displaced persons, as well as refugees and expellees. There is a growing feeling of opposition between various categories of displaced persons themselves. If trouble flares up, it may spread rapidly and create a security problem of great magnitude, with Germans or other subversive elements taking advantage of the resulting confusion.

Refugees Could be Moved in a Month

That, once a decision is reached, the Jews in the displaced-persons camps could be moved with dispatch was established in the testimony of officials of the American army and the Intergovernmental Refugee Committee before the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry.

Colonel Mickelsen reported that the United States could move 100,000 Jews by rail to Marseille or to Bari within one month.

Colonel D'Arcy Stevens said that the camps in Austria could be cleaned out in two weeks.

Brigadier General Ralph H. Tate, General Clark's Chief of Staff, begged the Anglo-American Committee to move the refugees from the D. P. camps.

Bartley Crum, in his book, quotes Brigadier General Tate as telling the committee, "Gentlemen, I wish you godspeed in your labors. We need your help. For God's sake, help us—we are at the end of our rope."

Richard Crossman, in "Palestine Mission," says:

In the nine months since V-E Day an appalling demoralization had set in which could not be halted by good food or accommodation or educational facilities. Every month which passed accelerated this process of moral decay and of corrosive bitterness against Britain and America. We had long talks with high American officers on the technical problems of transportation and were surprised and relieved to hear that, at the European end, not more than a month would be required to organize the clearance of every assembly center, the movement to a port of embarkation, and the voyage itself.

Paul McCormick, a representative of the Intergovernmental Committee for Refugees, told the Anglo-American Committee, "Give us a green light to move these people and we could transport 100,000 to Palestine with little difficulty."

ARE THERE OTHER COUNTRIES TO WHICH THE JEWS CAN MIGRATE?

SAYS the Anglo-American Committee: "Such information as we receive about countries other than Palestine gives no hope of substantial assistance in finding homes for Jews wishing or impelled to leave Europe." This is confirmed by an examination of the immigration laws and policies of the countries in the United Nations with the largest areas and the best facilities for new settlers.

Australia, with an area of 3,000,000 square miles and a population of 7,000,000, has since 1920 negotiated a series of treaties with almost all Eastern and Southern European countries, in which the latter agree to limit the number of passports issued to their nationals desiring to go to Australia. About 8,500 Jewish refugees were admitted before the war, adding to a Jewish population of approximately 24,000.

In 1945 the Minister of Immigration announced that no immigration would be encouraged until economic security was guaranteed, including the demobilization, rehabilitation, reemployment, and rehousing of all veterans and war workers. Discriminatory powers are vested in the Governor General of Australia to prohibit or limit permanently or for a certain period various categories of immigrants.

Canada, with an area of 3,690,410 square miles and a population of 11,506,605, has rigid legislation which since 1931 has reduced immigration to a virtual standstill. The government has shown no inclination since the end of the war to enact more liberal laws. About 2,000 Jewish refugees were admitted to Canada during the war. The Governor General has discriminatory powers to restrict immigration or limit it permanently or for a stated period, either because of economic conditions or because of the character of would-be immigrants.

In New Zealand, with an area of 113,350 square miles and a population of 1,631,414, immigration is generally frowned upon; and the authority to prohibit the entry of persons of any nationality, race, class, or occupation is in the hands of the Governor General. There are now approximately 4,000 Jews in New Zealand.

The Union of South Africa, with an area of 473,000 square miles and a population of 11,248,000, has a definite anti-immigration practice. The Immigrant Selection Board and the Union Commissioner for Immigration are vested with discretionary powers to admit immigrants. Since 1940 virtually no Jewish immigrants have been admitted.

The United States, with a population of 132,000,000 and an area of 3,000,000 square miles, has since 1924 rigidly curtailed immigration through the institution of a quota system. The chief purpose of this was to limit the admission of persons from Eastern and Southern Europe. Under this system no more than 153,879 can enter the United States in any given year from all countries; and no more than 24,222 can enter in any given year from Eastern and Southern Europe.

The total annual quota of countries in Central and Eastern Europe, from which the majority of the displaced persons come, is a maximum number of 3,900 visas a month. From 1933 to 1943 the United States accepted a total of 499,998 aliens, of whom 168,128 were Jews.

In South America, with large areas of rich and unexploited territory, strictures against immigration are widespread.

Argentina has an area of 1,085,000 square miles and a population of 14,130,871. Major restrictions were introduced in that country in 1933. Its preference is for agricultural workers, and the general attitude of the government is against Jewish immigration.

In Brazil, with an area of 3,276,000 square miles and a population of 45,300,000, the new immigration law of September, 1945, retains the quota system which has been in operation since 1935, limiting the quota of any country to 2 per cent of the total number of respective foreigners established in Brazil during the past fifty years. While since 1900 up to World War II about 47,000 Jews had entered the country, during the war and ever since it has been closed to Jewish immigration.

Mexico has a population of 25,178,495 in an area of 764,000 square miles. It is opposed to immigration in general and to the admission of Jews in particular, preferring to keep its population as strictly Spanish as possible. An immigration law passed in 1935 set up a quota system sharply curtailing immigration from Eastern Europe.

Chile, with an area of 297,000 square miles and a population of 5,237,432, virtually barred Jews in 1943. At that time its Jewish population was 25,000. A new decree of January, 1946, establishes high financial requirements for immigrants—proof of possession of large sums to insure maintenance—which makes refugee immigration unlikely.

Laws having the effect of barring Jewish immigration have been passed by Bolivia and Paraguay.

Colombia admits only artisans equipped to work in the chemical industry. It prefers immigrants of the Catholic faith.

Uruguay has a more friendly attitude toward Jewish immigration.

President Trujillo of the Dominican Republic has stated that his country is prepared to admit a large number of Jewish immigrants, in connection with the D. O. R. S. A. colonization project, which proved, however, to be a failure because of the lack of the proper natural conditions.

The government of Venezuela has discussed the possibility of admitting immigrants, although its requirements are for agricultural workers of nationalities which are apt to be "assimilable."

THE JEWISH CLAIM TO PALESTINE

THE Balfour Declaration was issued by the British government on November 2, 1917. Prior to its publication it had been passed on and approved by President Woodrow Wilson. On February 9, 1918, it was approved by the French government and on May 19, 1918, by the Italian government. On April 25, 1920, it was also approved by the Allied conference at San Remo, where the mandate for Palestine was assigned to Great Britain.

The mandate was ratified by the Council of the League of Nations and came into force on September 29, 1923. Fifty-five nations agreed to the terms of the Balfour Declaration and the Palestine mandate.

The Balfour Declaration said:

His Majesty's Government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.

Provisions of Mandate

Under the Mandate, recognition is given to "the historical connection of the Jewish people with Palestine and to the grounds for constituting their national home in that country." The mandatory government was made responsible for "placing the country under such political administration and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the Jewish National Home as laid down in the preamble and in the development of self-governing institutions."

Article VI of the Mandate provides that "the administration of Palestine will insure that the rights and position of other sections of the population are not prejudiced, that they shall facilitate Jewish immigration under suitable conditions and shall encourage, in cooperation with the Jewish Agency referred to in Article IV, close settlement by Jews on the land, including state lands and waste lands not required for public purposes."

The territory covered by the Balfour Declaration in 1917 included Palestine and Transjordan, an area of 45,000 square miles; and the Palestine Royal Commission, in its report of July, 1937, confirmed that "the field in which the Jewish National Home was to be established was understood at the time of the Balfour Declaration to be the whole of historic Palestine."

Article IV of the Mandate provided for the recognition of what has now become the Jewish Agency for Palestine, declaring:

An appropriate Jewish agency shall be recognized as a public body for the purpose of advising and cooperating with the administration of Palestine in such economic, social, and other matters as may affect the establishment of the Jewish National Home and the interests of the Jewish population in Palestine, and, subject always to the control of the administration, to assist and take part in the development of the country.

The Zionist organization, so long as its organization and constitution are in the opinion of the mandatory appropriate, shall be recognized as such agency. It shall take steps in consultation with His Britannic Majesty's Government to secure the cooperation of all Jews who are willing to assist in the establishment of the Jewish National Home.

Balfour Declaration Issued to Jewish People

Ample evidence exists to show that the Balfour Declaration was intended to secure Jewish support for the Allies in World War I. This purpose was specifically stated by the Royal Commission of 1937 under the chairmanship of Lord Peel. Lloyd George, Prime Minister at the time the Balfour Declaration was issued, wrote:

The Zionist leaders gave us a definite promise that if the Allies committed themselves to giving facilities for the establishment of a national home for the Jews in Palestine, they would do their best to rally to the Allied cause Jewish sentiment and support throughout the world. They [the Jews] kept their word in the letter and in the spirit.

On June 29, 1920, Lord Curzon took the same position. Winston Churchill, speaking in the House of Commons on July 24, 1922, also stated that the Balfour Declaration was issued in order to obtain both moral and financial support from the Jews of the world, particularly in the United States and Russia. In 1939, in the course of a Parliamentary debate on the White Paper, he confirmed this, declaring:

It was not made to the Jews of Palestine, it was not made to those who were actually living in Palestine. It was made to world Jewry and in particular to the Zionist associations. It was in consequence of and on the basis of this pledge that we received important help in the war, and that after the war we received from the Allies and Associated Powers the mandate for Palestine. This pledge of a home, of refuge, of an asylum, was not made to the Jews in Palestine but to the Jews outside Palestine, to that vast, unhappy mass of scattered, persecuted, wandering Jews whose intense, unchanging, unconquerable desire has been for a National Home.

This last point was emphasized in a letter from the Colonial Office to the Palestine Arab delegation, embodied in the Palestine White Paper of 1922, which refers to the Balfour Declaration as "a pledge made by the British government to the Jewish people."

No Pledge of Arab State

The Arabs have repeatedly claimed that the British government, at the end of World War I, promised them the establishment of an independent state in Palestine. This claim is based largely on the correspondence between Sir Henry McMahon, British High Commissioner in Egypt, and the Sherif of Mecca, King Hussein of the Hejaz, in which the British in exchange for help given by Hussein in organizing the revolt of the Arabs against the Turks, promised, according to the Arab interpretation, to support the independence of the areas proposed by Hussein, including Palestine.

In June, 1922, Winston Churchill denied this and stated that "the whole of Palestine west of the Jordan was excluded from Sir Henry McMahon's pledge."

Sir Henry McMahon himself, in a letter to the London Times on July 23, 1937, denied that such a pledge had been made to King Hussein. In this letter, he said:

I feel it my duty to state, and I do so definitely and emphatically, that it was not intended by me in giving this pledge to King Hussein to include Palestine in the area in which Arab independence was promised.

I also had every reason to believe at the time that the fact that Palestine was not included in my pledge was well understood by King Hussein.

In May, 1939, the White Paper on Palestine confirmed that no pledge was made that Palestine should become an Arab state. It said:

His Majesty's Government regret the misunderstandings which have arisen as regards some of the phrases used. For their part they can only adhere, for the reasons given by their representatives in the report, to the view that the whole of Palestine west of Jordan was excluded from Sir Henry McMahon's pledge, and they therefore cannot agree that the McMahon correspondence forms a just basis for the claim that Palestine should be converted into an Arab state.

Arab Statesmen Favored Jewish Palestine

Not only does no evidence exist that Palestine was to be an Arab state, but there is proof that Arab statesmen favored giving Palestine to the Jews. On January 3, 1919, Emir Feisal, then representing the Arab kingdom of Hejaz, signed an agreement with Dr. Chaim Weizmann approving the establishment of the Jewish National Home in Palestine. According to this declaration Emir Feisal agreed:

All necessary measures shall be taken to encourage and stimulate immigration of Jews into Palestine on a large scale, and as quickly as possible to settle Jewish immigrants upon the land through closer settlement and intensive cultivation of the soil. In taking such measures the Arab peasant and tenant farmers shall be protected in their rights, and shall be assisted in forwarding their economic development.

He further agreed that "in the establishment and constitution and administration of Palestine all such measures shall be adopted as will afford the fullest guaranties for carrying into effect the British government's declaration of the second of November, 1917."

Emir Feisal, in his agreement with Dr. Weizmann, had attached a rider in which he stated that "if the Arabs are established as I have asked in my manifesto of January 4 addressed to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I will carry out what is written in this agreement. If changes are made, I cannot be answerable for failure to carry out this agreement."

The Royal Commission Report of 1937 maintained:

That condition was not fulfilled then, but it is on the eve of fulfilment now. In less than three years' time all the wide Arab area outside Palestine between the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean will be independent.

The fact that the Balfour Declaration was issued in 1917 in order to enlist Jewish support for the Allies, and the fact that this support was forthcoming, are not sufficiently appreciated in Palestine. The Arabs do not appear to realize in the first place that the present position of the Arab world as a whole is mainly due to the great sacrifices made by the Allied and Associated Powers in the war, and secondly, that the Balfour Declaration helped to bring about the Allied victory, which helped to bring about the emancipation of all the Arab countries from Turkish rule. If the Turks and their allies had won the war, it is improbable that all the Arab countries, except Palestine, would now have become or be about to become independent states.

How well the British fulfilled their pledge to secure independence for the Arab areas may be gauged from the fact that independent Arab states now exist in Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, and Transjordan. Apart from Egypt, with an area of 386,000 square miles and a population of 18,100,000, fourteen million people occupy an area of 1,228,950 square miles in the Arabian Peninsula, Syria, Lebanon, Transjordan, and Iraq.

In the United Nations the Arab states have five seats.

Palestine, with an area of 10,400 square miles, represents less than one per cent of the area occupied by and under the control of the Arab people.

Did Britain Promise a Jewish State?

Six months before the issuance of the Balfour Declaration, in May of 1917, the British government was definitely committed to the policy of establishing a Jewish state in Palestine under Britain. In the original version of the proposed Balfour Declaration the British government was prepared to state specifically its desire to see Palestine reconstituted as a Jewish state and the national home of the Jewish people. That it failed to do so was due in large part to the objections of wealthy British Jews, some of whom were represented in the British Cabinet, and to anti-Zionist forces in the United States as well as in Great Britain.

In the formula in which the Balfour Declaration was issued Lord Balfour, then the Foreign Secretary, interpreted it to mean that an independent Jewish state would gradually be developed. Lloyd George quoted the Balfour position in his "Memoirs" as follows:

As to the meaning of the words "national home," to which the Zionists attach so much importance, he understood it to mean some form of British, American, or other protectorate, under which full facilities would be given to the Jews to work out their own salvation and to build up, by means of education, agriculture, and industry, a real center of national culture and focus of national life. It did not necessarily involve the early establishment of an independent Jewish state, which was a matter for gradual development in accordance with the ordinary laws of political evolution.

Lloyd George's own view was that the British Cabinet which issued the Balfour Declaration had in mind the ultimate establishment of a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine.

Lord Robert Cecil, a member of the British Cabinet at the time of the issuance of the Balfour Declaration, in explaining its meaning at a demonstration held at the London Opera House on December 2, 1917, declared: "Our wish is that Arabian countries shall be for the Arabs, Armenia for the Armenians, and Judea for the Jews."

Winston Churchill, then Secretary of State for War, wrote in the Illustrated Sunday Herald of February 8, 1920:

If, as may well happen, there should be created in our own lifetime by the banks of the Jordan a Jewish state under the protection of the British Crown which might comprise three or four millions of Jews, an event will have occurred in the history of the world which would from every point of view be beneficial, and would be especially in harmony with the truest interests of the British Empire.

In the United States a similar interpretation was given to the Balfour Declaration. On March 3, 1919, President Wilson said:

I am persuaded that the Allied nations, with the fullest concurrence of our own government and people, are agreed that in Palestine shall be laid the foundations of a Jewish commonwealth.

SUBVERSION OF THE MANDATE

NO SOONER had the Mandate for Palestine been granted than the mandatory government undertook a series of activities which sharply limited and contravened its pledges.

In 1922 Transjordan was separated from Palestine and an area of 34,700 square miles was closed to Jewish immigration and settlement. The area in which the Jewish National Home could be established was thus reduced to 10,400 square miles.

Even in this diminished area, no active policy was pursued by the mandatory government. Except for the electrical and potash concessions little specific action was undertaken to promote the Jewish National Home by the British government. Even in the matter of immigration the number of those admitted fell below the absorptive capacity of the country as created by the Jews themselves.

Jewish settlement on the land was not encouraged. Practically no agricultural state lands were set aside for this purpose. Nor were the agrarian and fiscal systems helpful to Jewish colonization.

The White Paper of 1939

In 1933 Hitler came to power, and there developed the campaign of anti-Semitism climaxed during the war period by the extermination of six million Jews.

In the years between 1933 and 1939 country after country came within the Nazi orbit and established the Nazi policy of oppression and exclusion as its own. The pressure of the Jews to escape from the Nazi advance and certain destruction became frantic. This was the moment, in May of 1939, three months before the outbreak of the actual fighting, when the British government chose to issue its White Paper, under which Jewish immigration to Palestine was to be ended at the close of a five-year period.

This action was taken despite the fact that Britain was fully aware that there were almost no countries in the world outside of Palestine to which Jews could flee. For Britain was a co-convenor of the International Refugee Conference at Evian in 1938, which established the fact that the Jews were trapped in Europe, since virtually all doors, other than those of Palestine, were closed to them.

The same White Paper instructed the High Commissioner to prohibit the transfer of lands to Jews in specified areas. It provided also for the establishment within ten years of a Palestine government based on the actual population of the country. A year after the issuance of the White Paper land regulations were enacted under which Jews were completely prohibited from acquiring land in 63 per cent of Palestine, and severely restricted in another 32 per cent.

The Jewish Agency for Palestine, in a memorandum submitted to the Anglo-American Committee in March of 1946, revealed in detail the fashion in which Britain, by its refusal to admit refugees into Palestine, became responsible for exposing them to the Nazi extermination program. The Jewish Agency says:

The blows came to the Jewish people at a time when the Nazi government was intensifying its campaign against the Jews. But even the outbreak of war and the capture of over 3,000,000 Polish Jews produced no change of heart.

Before hostilities commenced, the Jewish Agency asked for the immediate admission of 20,000 children from Poland and 10,000 young men from the Balkan countries, the latter to reinforce man-power in Palestine. These requests were rejected; it was apparently feared that at such a pace the quota of 75,000 would be used up too quickly. The Polish-Jewish children went to Maidanek and Auschwitz instead, while of the young Jews in the Balkans many died and many were forced to work for Hitler. The fear of impending massacres expressed by the Jewish Agency at the time was written off as spurious. So the hopeless tug-of-war continued, the Jewish Agency trying to rescue Jews as quickly as possible, the government trying to dole out the quota as slowly as possible.

After the holders of pre-war permits had been admitted, a ban was imposed on all further immigration from enemy countries, on the ground that Nazi agents might come in. In May, 1940, the Jewish Agency appealed for the exemption of children and of certain adults of assured identity. The decision took nearly two years. No exemption was then granted in favor of adults. The concession regarding children came too late.

Meanwhile groups of Jews had managed to escape from Europe and reach Palestine. Their entry was held to justify a complete suspension of the issue of new permits even to parts of Europe which were not yet enemy territory. Thus quotas were withheld for the half-years October, 1939, to March, 1940, and October, 1940, to March, 1941. The latter period immediately preceded the German invasion of the Balkans. Only a few hundred emergency permits were granted for Balkan Jewries at the time, mostly too late. The government actually advised the Jewish Agency to save up permits for post-war use when they could be given to Jews from Germany, who were of a better type than those from the Balkans.

The search for boats carrying Jewish fugitives and the prevention of their landing became a major concern of the authorities. In November, 1940, the government announced that Jews coming illegally from Europe would not be allowed to land, but would be interned elsewhere and not be admitted to Palestine even after the war. As a reaction, the Patria, with 1,771 Jewish refugees on board awaiting deportation, was blown up and sank in the port of Haifa. About 250 of its passengers were drowned and the survivors landed and interned. A further 1,700 refugees who had been landed were, with a considerable use of violence, reembarked and deported to the island of Mauritius. From there they were released and brought to Palestine only at the end of the war, after over 100 of their number had died of disease. In December, 1940, 230 refugees, including many children, perished when the tramp steamer Salvador foundered in the Sea of Marmora. They had hoped to proceed overland from Istanbul, but no visas were available. In March, 1941, 793 refugees, mostly fleeing from the massacres in Rumania, arrived on board the Darien. In view of the vessel's condition they had to be landed, but for seventeen months they were kept in detention under the threat of deportation. On February 24, 1942, came the Struma tragedy. That boat had stood in the port of Istanbul for nearly two months waiting for Palestine visas. In the end only children were allowed to proceed, but the decision came too late. The Turkish authorities had turned the vessel back into the Black Sea, where it sank. Of its 764 passengers, only one survived. . . .

After the Struma disaster the rules were relaxed. It was decided to admit and gradually release all refugees from Europe who got to Palestine on their own. At the same time it was made clear that nothing would be done to help them get there. In a communication to the Jewish Agency in May, 1942, the British government said: "In pursuance of the existing policy of taking all practicable steps to discourage illegal immigration into Palestine, nothing whatever will be done to facilitate the arrival of Jewish refugees in Palestine."

It should be borne in mind that at that time no facilities existed in the Balkans for obtaining visas to Palestine. The only way for a refugee to seek legal admission to Palestine was to reach Istanbul and apply to the British consul there. But at Istanbul he was already considered "illegal."

Late in 1942 authentic reports about the wholesale extermination of the Jews became public. Under their impact the government, in the middle of 1943, agreed to facilitate the journey to Palestine of all refugees reaching Istanbul. Yet this decision, of which the Jewish Agency was informed confidentially, was not published, nor was it, for a further nine months, communicated to the Turkish government. This robbed it of much of its value.

There can be little doubt that substantial numbers who are dead today, certainly tens of thousands, might have been alive if the gates of Palestine had been kept open.

White Paper Contrary to Mandate

The terms of the White Paper were carried out by Great Britain despite the fact that it was opposed in the House of Commons by such distinguished public figures as Winston Churchill; the Right Honorable Leopold S. Amery, former Colonial Secretary; Herbert Morrison, now Deputy Prime Minister, Philip Noel-Baker, now Secretary of State for Air; and others.

The Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations also ruled against it. At its thirty-sixth session in June of 1939, the commission held unanimously that "the policy set out in the White Paper was not in accordance with the interpretation which, in agreement with the mandatory power and the Council, the commission has always placed upon the Palestine Mandate."

On March 6, 1940, Philip Noel-Baker, then Labor M.P., moved a resolution in the House of Commons censuring the British government for its action in implementing the White Paper in disregard of the opinion of the Mandates Commission.

Nor was the action of the British government justified by conditions in Palestine itself. In 1937 the Royal Commission had pointed out that "there was land available and a general willingness to sell, that the land had been proved suitable for intensive cultivation, and that satisfactory financial arrangements could be devised." Moreover, the Royal Commission affirmed that "the Arab charge that Jews have obtained too large a proportion of the good land cannot be maintained. Much of the land now carrying orange groves was sand dunes or swamp, and uncultivated when it was purchased."

Palestine as a Crown Colony

The Royal Commission of 1937 found, moreover, that the form of government which the British had imposed on Palestine "is not a suitable or natural form for the Jewish section of its population. . . . Crown-colony government is not a suitable form of government for a numerous, self-reliant, progressive people."

Ten years later the Anglo-American Committee found that "the Palestine government continued to operate on the Crown-colony pattern." The Anglo-American Committee charged, in fact, that this system "militates most gravely against the chances of reconciliation between Jew and Arab. Palestinians were not promoted to head departments of the administration, in which the responsible officials like the members of the Executive and Advisory Councils remained wholly British, as did those on the district level. . . . Demands for a greater voice in government came from both the Arab and the Jewish communities."

The Anglo-American Committee unanimously recommended rescinding the land-transfer regulations of 1940 and replacing them by regulations based on a policy of freedom in the sale, lease, or use of land, irrespective of race, community, or creed, and the provision of adequate protection for the interests of small owners and tenant cultivators. In urging this they declared that the effect of the land laws of 1940 was "such as to amount to discrimination against the Jews," and denied that the free sale of land would create a considerable landless Arab population.

Transjordan Independence

British action in flouting the terms of the Mandate reached its climax on January 17, 1946, when the establishment of Transjordan as an independent state was announced. The unilateral action of the British was taken without any reference to the authority of the United Nations as the successor to the League of Nations or to the provisions of the United Nations Charter with respect to mandated territories.

Moreover, Britain encouraged the present tactics of the Arab states by inviting their participation in discussions about Palestine, a privilege not given them by the Mandate.

JEWISH ACHIEVEMENTS IN PALESTINE

DESPITE the lack of help from the mandatory power, the Jews' achievements in Palestine, brought about by their own efforts and with the support of funds and other backing from the Jews of the world, have been considerable. They are found in the development of the Jewish community in Palestine, in the benefits accruing to the Arab population, and in the tremendous support given to the British war effort in the Middle East. They are reflected also in the growth of population and in the advances in agriculture, industry, and education.

The Jewish population in Palestine in the first years after World War I amounted to some 55,000. By the end of 1946 this population had increased to 625,000 through immigration and natural increase. The Jewish death rate fell from 12.37 per 1,000 of settled population in 1922, to 6.30 in 1946. With improved hygienic conditions the infant mortality rate dropped from 128.86 per 1,000 live births in 1922 to 32.6 in 1946.

Agriculture and Industry

Jewish agriculture has been developed through irrigation, drainage of swamps, improvements in the methods of soil cultivation, and the rotation and diversification of crops. The number of agricultural settlements grew from 70 in 1922 to 290 in 1946, and the Jewish ownership of land from 649,000 dunams in 1922 to 1,765,000 in 1945.

Still more spectacular was the development of agricultural production. The Jews owned 11,000 dunams of citrus in 1922 and about 145,000 dunams in 1946. In the last seven years (1939-46) the production of milk increased from 34,500,000 liters to 72,000,000 liters. The yield of wheat per dunam rose from 75 kilograms in 1927 to 120 kilograms in 1936, and of barley from 113 kilograms to 180 kilograms. The area under cultivation of vegetables and potatoes and the yield per dunam increased considerably during the war years.

Before World War I Palestine was on a primitive level of industrial development. During the last twenty-five years, and especially during the war years, industry has made unprecedented gains.

Number of Enterprises..	1,850	5,606	6,143
Number of Industrial Workers	4,750	30,040	45,000
Production—£ P.	500,000	9,109,000	15,000,000

At the end of the war Jewish industry and handicrafts employed 60,000 workers.

The generating capacity of central power stations went up from 700 kilowatt-hours in 1923, to 76,500 kilowatt-hours in 1942-43. During the same period electrical power used in factories and workshops rose from 1,400 horse-power to 58,300 horse-power. Diamond polishing, an entirely new branch of industry, developed during the war years, employing some 4,000 people and producing £ P 7,000,000 worth of diamonds yearly.

Education and Culture

With this growth came the development of Jewish education and culture. The number of pupils in Jewish schools rose some 10,000 in 1921 to 80,000 in 1944-45. The government contributes only 10 per cent of the cost of the educational system. The Hebrew University, with a staff of 154 and a student body of 1,000, the Hebrew Institute of Technology in Haifa, and the School of Law and Economics in Tel Aviv grew up as institutions of higher learning. Reading for Jewish Palestine is supplied by a wide network of dailies and periodicals and a number of publishing houses. The cultural needs of the community are served by three or four theaters, a symphony orchestra, a conservatory of music, and a great number of extension courses, lectures, and the like.

BENEFITS TO THE ARABS

THE Arab League's claim that the Jewish development in Palestine has worked to the detriment of the Arab community is challenged by the report of the Anglo-American Committee, as well as by leading American experts.

The Arab population in Palestine has increased from 589,000 in 1922 to 1,061,000 in 1944. "The extension of the Arab community by natural increase has been in fact one of the most striking features of Palestine social history under the Mandate," reports the Anglo-American Committee.

The high Arab rate of natural increase is accounted for by a fertility which is among the highest recorded in the world and by the disappearance under the Mandate of such counterbalancing factors as conscription for the Ottoman army and a high incidence of malaria. The fact that the rate is still rising seems to be due principally to declining mortality, particularly infant mortality.

Royal Commission Cites Benefits

In 1937 the Peel Commission had called attention to this fact. The network of hospitals, child-welfare centers, and clinics, the establishment of a private water supply, the building of roads, and the renovation of the railroad system were attributed in largest part to the Jews and to the funds placed at their disposition by the Zionist organization and other bodies.

"In fact," said the Peel report, "the establishment of the Jewish National Home has so far been to the economic advantage of the Arabs as a whole."

The large import of Jewish capital into Palestine has had a general fructifying effect on the economic life of the whole country. The expansion of Arab industry and agriculture has been largely financed by the capital thus obtained. Jewish example has done much to improve Arab cultivation, especially of citrus. Owing to Jewish development and enterprise the employment of Arab labor has increased in urban areas, particularly in the ports. The reclamation and anti-malaria work undertaken in Jewish "colonies" have benefited all Arabs in the neighborhood.

Institutions founded with Jewish funds primarily to serve the National Home have also served the Arab population. Hadassah, for example, treats Arabs patients, notably at the Tuberculosis Hospital at Safad, and the Radiology Institute at Jerusalem admits Arab country-folk to the clinics of its Rural Sick Benefit Fund and does much infant-welfare work for Arab mothers.

The general beneficent effect of Jewish immigration on Arab welfare is illustrated by the fact that the increase in the Arab population is most marked in urban areas affected by Jewish development. A comparison of the census returns in 1922 and 1931 shows that six years ago the increase per cent in Haifa was 86, in Jaffa 62, in Jerusalem 37, while in purely Arab towns such as Nablus and Hebron it was only 7, and at Gaza there was a decrease of 2 per cent.

Opinions of American Experts

Robert R. Nathan, former deputy commissioner of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion and former chairman of the Planning Committee of the War Production board; Oscar Gass, former economist of the Treasury Department; and Daniel Creamer, economic expert for the Department of Commerce, spent two years of exhaustive research in Palestine, Europe, and the United States on the present and future outlook of Palestine as the Jewish National Home. Their conclusions were presented in a volume entitled "Palestine: Problem and Promise," published in 1946, in which they declare:

Zionist reconstruction has brought the Arabs of Palestine a higher standard of living than is found elsewhere in the Arab Middle East. Jewish demand has provided an important market for Arab agriculture, and Jewish enterprises have provided some employment for Arab labor. Jews paid Arabs perhaps £P 15,000,000 for the 380,000 acres of land (6 per cent of the area of Palestine) in Jewish ownership at the end of 1943. Jewish tax payments have been the principal support of the services in health, education, agriculture, and public roads furnished to the Arabs by the government of Palestine. The Arabs are healthier, longer-lived, and more numerous because of Jewish accomplishments.

In fact, they say:

No reliance can be placed upon the prospects of inducing the Arabs of Palestine to leave the country and migrate voluntarily to the non-populated areas of Transjordan, Syria, and Iraq. Only the most lavish compensation would induce any substantial number of Arabs to go to countries with a lower standard of living.

Dr. Walter Clay Lowdermilk, assistant chief of the Soil Conservation Service of the United States, in his book "Palestine, Land of Promise," points out that wages for Arabs in Palestine are three times those in Iraq. He says:

The beneficial effects of Jewish colonization is evidenced by the figures in Arab emigration from Palestine and neighboring countries. During 1929-1930, 9,500 Arabs migrated from Syria and Lebanon to Central and South America—seven times the number of those who emigrated from Palestine. Since the Arab population of Syria and Lebanon, is only three times as large as that of Palestine, there was proportionately twice as much emigration from these countries as from Palestine. In 1939, the demand for visas to America from Syria and Lebanon was about ten times that from Palestine.

Refuting the charges that the Jewish development has produced a landless class of fellahin, Dr. Lowdermilk points out that the total amount of land bought by the Jews "is comparatively small . . . only about 6 per cent of Palestine's 26,000,000 dunams. Most of this land was originally covered with swamps or rocks and considered unsuitable to cultivation; less than one-quarter of it was actually cultivated by the Arabs."

ARABS AND JEWS IN TWO WARS

THE record of the Arabs in and out of Palestine and of the Jews throughout the world in both wars discloses the sharpest contrast.

In World War I, in the course of which Palestine and the Arab states were freed from the Ottoman Empire, the record shows that whereas "practically the whole available Jewish youth of the colonies [in Palestine] and many of the townsmen of military age came forward for voluntary enlistment in the Jewish battalions, only 150 Arabs were recruited from Palestine out of a population ten times the size of the Jews." Moreover, said Sir Ronald Storrs, Governor of Jerusalem, "the Arab revolt in World War I cost British taxpayers eleven million pounds, one million of which went to King Hussein of the Hejaz."

Outside of Palestine Jews constituted 2½ per cent of the 42,000,000 men in the Allied forces, more than twice their proportion of the population in the Allied countries. Of the 1,055,600 Jews who fought in World War I, 116,825 were killed.

Jewish Contribution in World War II

In World War II, 1,300,000 Jews were in uniform in the armed forces of the United Nations: 550,000 Jewish men and women served in the armed forces of the United States; 500,000 in the armed forces of the Soviet Union; 65,000 in the armed forces of Britain.

In Palestine 85,800 men and 50,400 women volunteered for war service; 27,028 Palestine Jews served with the British forces in Palestine and France, Egypt, Sudan, Eritrea, Abyssinia, Liberia, Greece, Crete, Iraq, Italy, Austria, and the Low Countries. Sixty units of Royal Engineers, transportation, ordnance, electrical, and mechanical services served and ranked high in the estimation of their respective commands. Selected civilian volunteers carried out secret raids in the Middle East and parachute missions in enemy Europe. Half of them lost their lives.

When, as the Anglo-American Committee points out, "the spread of the war zone to the Middle East converted Palestine into a base as well as an arsenal" and "large numbers of troops had to be quartered there," the Jewish community of Palestine furnished the skill, the inventiveness, and the energy to provide for the needs not only of Palestine but of the surrounding countries. The report continues:

Supplies of food and other necessities of life and of war materials had to be provided locally or imported where possible from neighboring Middle East countries, themselves subjected by the same combination of causes to severe economic pressure. Existing industries were re-directed, as far and as fast as possible, into war production. Established undertakings were enlarged and new ones were set up, with government support, in order to contribute to the needs of the military campaign and build up a higher degree of self-sufficiency. In this development the variety of manufactures was broadened to include a number of more complicated mechanical and chemical processes.

Thus Palestine became an important source of supply of manufactured goods not only for military purposes throughout the area but for civilian needs in surrounding countries. The skill and inventiveness of the Jewish immigrants of pre-war years proved an invaluable asset, and the directed effort was supported by the Jewish Agency and the other established organs of Jewish settlement.

Jewish industry increased by over 100 per cent in order to meet the needs of the war. Six hundred new enterprises were established for this purpose; new products, essential for the war effort, were produced.

Arab Role in World War II

In World War II the Arab community of Palestine assumed a most indifferent attitude. The Arab states were in largest part pro-Axis, and the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, still the most popular leader of Palestine Arabs, played an active role as an ally of the Axis.

Concerning the attitude of the Arab community in Palestine toward the war effort, the Anglo-American Committee said:

The Arab community in Palestine, though showing few signs of actual disaffection and offering slight response to Axis propaganda, showed itself largely indifferent to the outcome of the war. Out of a population twice as large as the Jewish, only 12,445 persons were recruited for military service, a figure less than half the Jewish total.

This number was reduced by 50 per cent through desertions and discharges before the war ended.

Of the Arab states only Transjordan declared war on Germany in 1939, and this could be attributed to the fact that the country, a British mandate, was still dependent on grants and aid from the British government.

Iraq declared war in January, 1943, after it was clear that the Nazis were losing.

Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria, and Lebanon failed to declare war on Germany until February, 1945, three months before the war actually ended and when the victory of the Allies was certain. Even these declarations of war involved no direct part in military operations and were authorized only in order to qualify for membership in the United Nations, admission to which required a declaration of war before March 1, 1945.

The Iraqi Revolt

In April, 1941, the government of Iraq, under the leadership of Rashid Ali el Kailani, launched a revolt against the British, and on May 2, 1941, formally declared war on Great Britain.

The Iraqi revolt, fundamental to German strategy, took place at a time when the outlook for the British was darkest.

For two months a precarious battle raged. German and Italian airplanes, refueled in Syria, entered the fight. General Dentz, Vichy High Commissioner in Syria and Lebanon, following the instructions of the Italo-German Armistice Commission, rushed trainloads of French arms to Iraq. At the same time the ex-Mufti, working in cooperation with the Iraqi military forces, mobilized into activity the subversive elements throughout the Middle East. Because the Greek and British resistance in Greece and Crete held up the German armies, the Nazis were prevented from transporting reinforcements of men and material to Iraq. As a result the British were able to quell the revolt.

Other Arab States Support Iraq Revolt

The Iraqi revolt evoked sympathy in other Arab countries. Farouk, then and now King of Egypt, sent a telegram of congratulations to the rebel Iraqi Regent, Sharif Sharaf.

Hashim Atasi, President of the Syrian Republic from 1936 to 1939 and one of the leaders of the National Bloc (the party now in power in Syria), not only sent congratulations but called upon the Syrians to assist the Iraqi.

Riad as-Sulh, who subsequently served as the Premier of Lebanon from 1943 to 1944, and is now again Premier and was a member of the Lebanese delegation to the United Nations in 1946, also congratulated the rebels.

The Iraqi revolt was reflected in a mutiny against the British by the Transjordan frontier force, reacting to German propaganda. The Palestine Arabs made their contribution through the participation of their émigré leaders in Iraq.

In Syria and Lebanon Arab Nazi organizations flourished throughout the entire period of the Nazi development. Among these organizations were the Iron Shirts, the An-Nadi al-Arabi Club of Damascus, the Council for the Defense of Arab Palestine, the Syrian Popular Party, the National Bloc, and the Istiqlal Club. Baldur von Schirach, head of the Hitler Youth Movement, visited Syria and established close contact with the An-Nadi al-Arabi group and with the Arab youth organizations.

The Mufti's Complicity

The extent of the Mufti's role in the Iraqi revolt was described in a report of the British General Intelligence Service dated December 1, 1941. The report stated:

THE GRAND MUFTI IN WORLD WAR II

HAJ AMIN EL-HUSSEINI, the most powerful leader of the Palestine Arabs, has a long-time record of complicity with terrorism. Responsible for the Arab riots in Palestine in 1920, he fled to Transjordan to escape a ten-year sentence of imprisonment, to return to Palestine only after complete amnesty had been granted.

In 1922 he became the Mufti of Jerusalem and later the President of the Supreme Moslem Council, during which period he had at his disposal more than £100,000 a year.

The Shaw commission, appointed by the British government to investigate the 1929 riots, attributed to the Mufti a share in the responsibility for these riots, in which 133 Jews were killed and 239 wounded. No action was taken to curb his activities, with the result that in 1936 he again was responsible for new attacks upon the Jews of Palestine. At the same time he caused the assassination of hundreds of prominent Arabs, including twenty-four leading Palestine Arabs who refused to accept his leadership.

The ex-Mufti commenced his political activities without check from the first day of his arrival in the country. In these activities he was encouraged by the reception he was accorded on all sides, including parties given by responsible ministers and Nuri Pasha, the Prime Minister himself.

The ex-Mufti soon had his old Palestine "Headquarters" established and modified to suit the new conditions under which he was working. Jamal Husseini was his Chief of Staff. Shaikh Hassan abu Saud was the Islamic religious adviser and expert. Musa bey al'Alami was the legal adviser and critic on Occidental affairs and, with the authority of his background, he spoke convincingly to responsible and willing listeners on the "British injustices." Fawzi al Quokji was the military member and contacted the Iraqi army, raising from this source arms and ammunition and the facilities to train men for guerrilla warfare. Salim Abdur Rahman was press officer and publicist. Ishaq, Munif, Musa and Towfiq Saleh al Husseini, Emil Ghorri, Izzat Darwaza, Ibrahim Darwish, Izzuddin ash Shawa, and others formed the foreign-relations committee who were responsible for propaganda, intrigue, and subversive activities inside and outside Iraq.

The ex-Mufti held the money bags and paid these, as well as many other refugees, their allowances, as most had no other livelihood but what they were paid from this source. The ex-Mufti's funds for this purpose were considerable, and it is known that he was voted ID. 18,000 by the Iraqi Parliament, was paid ID. 1,000 a month from Iraqi service funds, was paid 2 per cent of the salary of every Iraqi government official, including the military and police (all stopped at source), considerable sums raised by the Palestine Defense Society, by the Red Crescent Society, and through public collections. In addition, authoritative sources now claim he was paid ID. 60,000 by the Germans and ID. 40,000 by the Italians; he also raised other moneys from outside Iraq—including generous gifts from Ibn Saud and Egypt. This money enabled him, his followers, and even Syrian political reactionaries to live in affluence, many owning cars and keeping up reasonable establishments. Several were beyond doubt also getting additional allowances from Axis sources.

The captured files of the German High Command in Flensburg at the war's end reveal that the Arab riots of 1936 in Palestine were carried out by the Mufti with funds supplied by the Nazis. The report found in the files states: "Only through funds made available by Germany to the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem was it possible to carry out the revolt in Palestine."

After his escape from Palestine to Syria and later to Iraq he and his henchmen were directly responsible for the anti-Jewish pogrom, in which almost four hundred Jewish men, women, and children were stabbed or brutally clubbed to death in the streets of Bagdad.

After the failure of the Iraqi revolt the Mufti escaped to Teheran and found refuge in the Japanese embassy. From there he escaped to Italy. In October of 1941 he conferred with Mussolini, Ciano, and Dino Alfieri. From Rome he communicated with Balkan Moslems under Italian rule in Yugoslavia and Albania.

Agent of the Axis

In December, 1941, he went to Berlin. The Nazis established a special office for him in Berlin entitled "Buro des Grosmufti," with branches organized later in other parts of Germany and Italy. His activities included propaganda, espionage, organization of Moslem military units in Axis-occupied countries and in North Africa and Russia, establishment of Arab legions in an Arab brigade, and organization of fifth-column activities in the Middle East, including sabotage and parachutist expeditions.

In the course of his propaganda work the Grand Mufti had at his disposal not only the German-controlled radio but radio stations in Bari, Rome, Tokyo, and Athens. In addition, he was responsible for sending to the Middle East various propaganda publications in Arabic.

His espionage service extended throughout the Middle East. He had a sub-office in Geneva linking him to Egypt and Turkey, and another in Istanbul, branching out all along the Syrian-Turkish frontier in Mersine, Alexandretta, Antioch, Adana, and Diarbekr. These stations received information directly from the Mufti's agent's in Palestine, Syria, and Iraq, and maintained close contact with members of the German Intelligence in Turkey.

In Athens the Mufti established a parachutist and sabotage school for Arabs.

At The Hague, under his direction, Arab students were trained in wireless transmission, high explosives, and demolitions. The Mufti's agents were parachuted into Turkey, Syria, and Iraq. A number of them were caught by the British. On a number of occasions these agents, with the help of local Arabs, cut telephone and pipe lines in Transjordan and Palestine and sabotaged railways and bridges in Iraq.

Another of the Mufti's accomplishments was the organization of Moslem military units. He attempted to recruit for the German military command some 500,000 soldiers from Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria. In Asiatic Russia he collaborated with Moslem Russian quislings and White Russian traitors, whom he helped to form pro-Axis legions.

In 1942 he started to organize Axis Arab legions of Arab students in Germany and Arab prisoners of war who had followed him to Germany. His legionnaires wore the German uniform with "Free Arabia" patches on their shoulders.

After the Jewish Brigade had been recognized by Winston Churchill in 1944, the Mufti on November 2, with the consent of Ribbentrop, called upon all Arabs in Germany hailing from Palestine, Iraq, Egypt, and Syria to join an Arab Brigade.

Accepting a proposal of the Japanese that he broadcast to Moslems in the South Pacific and India, the Mufti recorded numerous broadcasts which were beamed to India, Indonesia, and Java.

On September 3, 1941, Major General Erwin Lahousen, one of the top officials of the Abwehr, whose secret diary was among the captured German documents, wrote:

The Grand Mufti, who left Iraq to go to Iran, is currently in connection with the Abwehr II [sabotage division of the Abwehr]. According to reports from Teheran he is safe with the Japanese envoy.

A year later, on July 13, 1942, Lahousen made the further entry:

A meeting between the chief of the Abwehr and the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem took place in the apartment of the chief. I [Lahousen] took part in the discussion. The Mufti made an offer to the chief that the followers of the Arabian Freedom Movement, which was led by him, as well as the followers of the former Iraq Prime Minister, Kailani [leader of the Iraqi revolt against Britain], were to be used for purposes of sabotage and sedition in the Near East in accordance with the purposes of Abwehr II.

The Mufti and Russian Quislings

Edgar Mowrer, in an article in the New York Post, revealed the efforts of the Grand Mufti against the Soviet Union. Mr. Mowrer's report was based on private and official papers left behind by the Mufti in his villas at Oybin and Bad Gastein, captured files of the Gestapo and the German Foreign Office, and the files of the Allied Military Tribunal at Nürnberg.

Mr. Mowrer revealed that the Grand Mufti in a series of anti-Russian broadcasts attempted to incite the Moslems of the Caucasus and eastern Russia to turn against Moscow and join the Axis. Mowrer reports that the Mufti was in close contact with numerous Asiatic Russian quislings, including Abbas Ali Dudanginski, chief of the "Azerbaijan Axis Legion."

The American legation in Berne, Switzerland, on November 16, 1943, in a dispatch to the Secretary of State of the United States confirmed the activities of Dudaginski.

Berlin dispatch November 8 reports meeting there of Azerbaijan conference attended by all Azerbaijan groups under leadership Dudanginski Major Azerbaijan Legion, and by Grand Mufti of Jerusalem and representatives of German state and army and people of Caucasus, Urals, and Turkestan. Conference described as symbolizing expansion of anti-Bolshevik front and emphasizing readiness of Azerbaijan people to fight on German side. First Azerbaijan field battalions steadily active on front for over one year proved their valor during this period were included in German storm troops and decorated by German army (signed—Harrison).

Mufti's Role in Extermination of the Jews

That the former Grand Mufti was responsible in large part for the Nazi program of extermination of the Jews was revealed by Edgar Mowrer and confirmed by Bartley Crum in the course of his investigations as a member of the Anglo-American Committee. Discussing his examination of the archives of the Allied Tribunal at Nürnberg, Mr. Crum says:

I saw another document—a deposition of Dr. Rudolph Kasztner, a Hungarian Jew, who conducted negotiations with the Nazis in an attempt to ransom Hungarian Jews. Many of these dealings were with Adolf Eichmann, the Gestapo specialist in Jewish affairs, who had been the confidant of the Mufti. During his negotiations Dr. Kasztner spoke frequently with one Dieter von Wisliczeny. Von Wisliczeny was at this moment held in a cell in Nürnberg as a war criminal and an important witness. "The Grand Mufti," he said, "has repeatedly suggested to the Nazi authorities—including Hitler, von Ribbentrop, and Himmler—the extermination of European Jewry." The Mufti told Wisliczeny that he "considered this a comfortable solution to the Palestine problem." And Nazi records show that, accompanied by Eichmann, the Grand Mufti, incognito, visited the gas chambers of Auschwitz, where hundreds of thousands of Jews were exterminated. Hitler had instructed that in any ransoming of concentration-camp inmates no Jews were to be included because an agreement had been reached with the Mufti that all Jews be exterminated. I also learned that the Hitler-Mufti agreement included relegation of Ibn Saud to secondary importance by making the Mufti the supreme head of a new Pan-Islam. This became clear as I read on. It was the Mufti who insisted to the Nazi leaders that no matter what deals were made, no matter what moneys were paid for the ransom of the Jews, no Jews should be permitted to go to Palestine. Negotiations were under way at that time for the ransom of the Jewish community of Bratislava. These negotiations broke down because the Mufti refused to countenance their being ransomed, and as a result the entire community was liquidated.

Other letters of the Mufti showed that he encouraged the deportation of European Jews to Polish extermination camps. On June 5, 1943, he protested to the Prime Minister of Bulgaria against a plan by the Bulgarian government allowing emigration of 4,000 Jewish children. These children, he argued, presented "a degree of danger to Bulgaria whether they be kept in Bulgaria or be permitted to depart from that country." Instead, he said, they should be sent to a place in which they would be "under stringent control—as, for instance, Poland." The Mufti's protest was successful. No children's transport left Bulgaria after July, 1943. . . .

On July 27, 1944, the Mufti wrote to Heinrich Himmler. Von Ribbentrop and Himmler were too lenient toward the Jews, he declared, because though he had protested to both of them on July 5, 1944, some Jews had been permitted to depart from Germany. "If such practices continue," the Mufti wrote, they will certainly be "incomprehensible to Arabs and Moslems and provoke a feeling of disappointment in them," and he warned that such practices might also encourage the Balkan states to permit Jewish emigration.

Grand Mufti's Escape from France to Egypt

The Grand Mufti, who had been held in forced residence in France at the war's end, found it possible to escape on May 29, 1946, despite the fact that on May 8 it was announced that France had agreed to see that he did not leave for any country in the Middle East.

When news of this flight reached the world early in June, the British put on a great show of making a search for him to insure that he would not settle in the Middle East. On June 9 the Grand Mufti arrived in Damascus. From Damascus he moved to Cairo and was granted asylum by King Farouk, by whom he was received. A month later the Mufti moved from King Farouk's palace in Cairo to one of his villas in Alexandria. In addition to granting asylum King Farouk supplied the Mufti with special liaison officers and the Arab League supplied him with funds.

Under the pressure of the British the Egyptian government requested the Mufti to refrain from participating in politics. But within a few months, as the result of protests in the Arab press, the restrictions were lifted, and the Mufti resumed his role as leader of the Palestine Arabs and unofficial head of the Arab League. The record of the Grand Mufti has lost him no followers. Jamal Husseini, vice-chairman of the Palestine Arab Higher Committee, presented a written statement to the Anglo-American Committee which began with the declaration that the Mufti alone could speak truly for the people of Palestine. Moreover, Husseini opened his oral testimony with the statement: "We find ourselves in this inquiry deprived of the presence of our first leader, the Grand Mufti, for whom we can accept no substitute."

Asked about the attitude of the Arabs to the Mufti's war record, Jamal replied: "The Grand Mufti in Germany was working for the interests not of the English, who were warring with the Germans, but of his people, who had no direct interest at least in the controversy."

BRITAIN AND THE ARAB LEAGUE

IN FEBRUARY, 1945, a conference of the Arab states was held and a covenant signed. The signatories were representatives of the governments of Egypt, Iraq, Transjordan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Lebanon, and Yemen. Each country was given a single vote in the organization, and Palestine was left for a representative of the Palestine Arabs.

The conference adopted the following resolution with respect to Palestine:

At the end of the last war Palestine, like the other Arab states detached from the Ottoman Empire, was liberated from Ottoman domination. Having become autonomous, she was no longer dependent on any other state.

The Treaty of Lausanne proclaimed that her fate would be settled by the interested parties. But if Palestine has not been able to order her own destiny, it is nevertheless true that it is on the basis of the recognition of her independence that the Covenant of the League of Nations in 1919 settled her status.

Her international existence and independence therefore cannot de jure be questioned any more than can the independence of any other Arab country.

If, for reasons beyond her will, her independence has failed to materialize, this circumstance cannot constitute an obstacle to the participation of Palestine in the work of the Council of the League.

The state signatories of the present Covenant consider that, under these conditions and by reason of the special circumstances involving Palestine, until that country can exercise all the effective attributes of her independence, it behooves the Council of the League to designate an Arab representative from Palestine who will participate in its work.

The existence of the Arab League was officially registered at the organizing conference of the United Nations in San Francisco in 1945. Since its creation, all its energies have been devoted to fighting the implementation of the Palestine Mandate.

The formation of the Arab League was the culmination of more than four years of effort which had been encouraged by Anthony Eden. A statement made by Anthony Eden, then Foreign Secretary of Great Britain, on May 29, 1941, stated:

... It seems to me both natural and right that the cultural and economic ties between the Arab countries and the political ties, too, should be strengthened. His Majesty's Government for their part will give their full support to any scheme that commands general approval.

In the preliminary discussions, negotiations, and conferences leading up to the formation of the Arab League, a number of British officials were involved. Since its formal establishment Great Britain has recognized the League and its purposes by inviting it to participate in the various conferences on Palestine.

The Mufti and the Arab League

The Arab League backed an effort to bring about the release and reinstatement of the Mufti long before his escape from protective custody in France.

When the British failed to indict the Grand Mufti as a war criminal, the Arab League decided officially to request his release. After the Mufti escaped from Paris, members of the League discussed Palestinian problems with him in Bludan, Lebanon, in June, 1946. As a result of this conference, it was decided to reorganize the Palestine "Arab Higher Committee" and to leave the position of chairman vacant for the Mufti. Jamal Husseini, vice-chairman of the Higher Committee, attends the meetings of the Arab League but he receives his instructions from the Mufti. Exiled Rhodesia by the British for four years as a dangerous pro-Nazi leader, Jamal was permitted to return to Palestine where he resumed his activities.

On August 15, 1946, the Mufti conferred with the Foreign Ministers of the Arab states and became the actual though not the official, leader of the Arab League. On September 30 an Associated Press dispatch from Jerusalem stated that "an Arab shadow government had been organized in Alexandria, with the Grand Mufti as the president of the republic; the shadow government presumably had a premier, ministers of state and of war, and a treasurer."

The importance of the Mufti may be gauged from the fact that immediately after his escape the Palestine Arab Higher Committee, joined by the member states of the Arab League, began insistent agitation to demand that an invitation be extended by the British to the Grand Mufti to attend the London Conference on Palestine. The British finally decided to refuse to admit the Mufti, whereupon the Palestine Arab Higher Committee announced that it would refuse to go to the conference and would ask the Arab League to abstain as well—a threat it did not keep.

On December 13, 1946, Jamal el Husseini announced that the Arab League had demanded that Great Britain permit the return of the Grand Mufti to Palestine.

BRITISH LABOR'S PLEDGES ON PALESTINE

SINCE 1917 the British Labor Party at successive conferences, has taken a firm stand in favor of the Jewish National Home and the establishment in Palestine of a Jewish commonwealth. The party and its leading spokesmen have consistently attacked the efforts of various administrations to whittle down the Mandate and its importance.

Pre-Election Pledges

In December, 1944, when the Labor Party prepared its proposals with respect to the international post-war settlement, it adopted a plank calling for the opening of the doors of Palestine to Jewish immigration and favoring the National Home. In this plank the Labor Party even suggested the possibility of extending the boundaries of Palestine. It set forth its position as follows:

There is surely neither hope nor meaning in a Jewish National Home unless we are prepared to let the Jews, if they wish, enter this tiny land in such numbers as to become a majority. There is a strong case here, based on human grounds, for promoting stable settlement on the one hand and for the transfer of population on the other hand. Let the Arabs be encouraged to move out as the Jews move in. Let them be compensated handsomely for their land, and their settlement elsewhere be carefully organized and generously financed. The Arabs have many wide territories of their own; they should not seek to exclude Jews from this small area of Palestine by agreement with Egypt, Syria, or Transjordan. Moreover, we should seek to win the full sympathy and support of both the American and Russian governments for the execution of this Palestine policy.

A year later, in April, 1945, the National Executive Committee adopted a resolution on Palestine which became one of its election planks, declaring:

The committee reaffirms the policy accepted by the annual conference in December, 1944, in regard to Palestine. It therefore calls upon the British government to remove the present unjustifiable barriers on immigration and to announce without delay proposals for a future Palestine in which it has the full sympathy and support of the American and Russian governments.

The resolutions of 1944 and 1945 expressed a policy advocated consistently since the granting of the Balfour Declaration.

Fought White Paper of 1939

In 1939, when the Chamberlain government adopted the White Paper limiting Jewish immigration into Palestine and restricting land purchase, the Labor Party conference adopted a resolution scoring this action on the grounds that it violated "the solemn pledges contained in the Balfour Declaration and the Mandate." It charged that "the White Paper represents a further surrender to aggression, places a premium on violence and terror, and is a setback to the progressive forces among both Arabs and Jews. It also im-new and intolerable restrictions on Jewish immigration at a moment when racial persecution increasingly divides the other countries of the world into those which Jews are forbidden to enter and those in which they find it impossible to live."

In the same resolution the Labor Party reaffirmed its traditional support for the establishment of the Jewish National Home and called on the government to rescind the White Paper.

Promised Jewish State at War's End

Throughout the war period the Labor Party at successive conferences emphasized its historic position in Palestine. Thus at the Labor Party conference in 1940 a resolution was adopted declaring that "in order to remove the root cause of Jewish suffering, and to insure the existence and free development of the Jewish people, international assistance should be given for the continued growth of the Jewish National Home in Palestine by immigration and settlement. The Jewish people should be allowed to make the most of the economic capacity of the country to absorb the immigrants."

In the same resolution the White Paper of 1939 was attacked and the Parliamentary Labor Party instructed to continue to fight against it.

In 1941 the Labor Party went a step farther. The annual conference asked that "the Jewish Agency be given authority to make the fullest use of the economic capacity of the country to absorb immigrants and to develop the country, including the development of unoccupied and undeveloped lands. It demands for the Jewish people equal status among the free nations of the world."

In spite of its consistent and outspoken position on Palestine, the Labor Party since it came to power in 1945 has about-faced and made the White Paper of 1939 the basis of its policy.

OIL, COMMUNICATIONS, AND BASES

WITH nationalism rising in all parts of the Empire and the threat of rival interests gaining a foothold in the Middle East, British government leaders have been afraid to cut loose from men and policies which in the past they have strongly opposed. The imminent withdrawal of British forces from Egypt has made Palestine even more important than before as a strategic area, both in relation to oil and to the defense of the Suez Canal.

To protect this key position, the Labor government has continued the Tory policy of placating and supporting the Arab rulers and in so doing has violated its pledge to the Jews of Palestine and its obligation to the displaced Jews of Europe.

In a debate in the House of Commons on July 3, 1946, Winston Churchill charged that the controversy over Palestine was born of the desire of the Labor government, in the light of "its precipitate abandonment of its treaty rights in Egypt, to look for a jumping off ground in Palestine in order to protect the Canal from outside Egypt. Now, apparently, the one place where we are at all costs and all inconveniences to hold on and fight it out to the death is Palestine. And we are to be at war with the Jews in Palestine, and, necessary, with the Arabs of Palestine—for what reason? Not, all the world will state, for the faithful dispatch of our long mission, but because we have need . . . to secure satisfactory strategic base from which to pursue our imperial aims."

Richard Crossman, British M. P., has also charged that the current policy of the British government is related to its desire for a military base in Palestine, particularly in view of the unwillingness of the Egyptian nationalists "to permit any arrangement under which Britain could use Egypt as base in the event of a threat to British interests in Persia or Iraq."

What these interests are Mr. Crossman explains in his recent book, "Palestine Mission."

For Britain [he says] Mosul and Abadan are not merely an important supplement to existing domestic supplies. They are her major source of oil; and both are dangerously exposed, both strategically and politically. Politically, because the oil fields are in countries which do not belong to Britain; a hostile power therefore, by ideological warfare, can easily exploit the natural hatred of foreign capitalists. Strategically, because the oil fields lie at the end of long lines of communication across the territory of independent Arab states. Though Suez has become of second importance to British strategy, Mosul and Abadan have become essential to British independence in peace as well as in war.

The determination of Britain to maintain its foothold in the Middle East is illustrated by its actions in the course of the past year in regard to the three Arab states of Transjordan, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia.

Only such a purpose can explain why the British armed forces in Palestine now number 120,000. In contrast, British military strength in Palestine in 1935 was 2,000, in 1930 5,500, and even during the war, never in excess of 25,000.

British Base in Transjordan

In January, 1946, Great Britain, without the consent of the United Nations, announced the independence of Transjordan, which since 1922 had been governed under the Palestine Mandate. On March 22, the British announced the conclusion of a treaty of alliance with Transjordan which recognized that country as an independent kingdom and the Emir Abdullah as its sovereign. In an annex to the treaty provision is made for British bases in Transjordan and the training of the armed forces of that country.

Article 1 provides also that Great Britain "may station forces in Transjordan in places where they are stationed at the date of signature of the present treaty, and in such other places as may be agreed upon, and His Highness the Emir will provide all the facilities necessary for their accommodation and maintenance and the storage of their ammunition and supplies, including the lease of any land required. Any private rights on such land will, if necessary, be expropriated."

Article 2 stipulates that the Emir of Transjordan "will grant facilities at all times for the movement and training of the armed forces of His Majesty the King, and for the transport of the supplies of fuel, ordnance, ammunition, and other materials required by these forces, by air, road, railway, waterway, and pipe line and through the ports of Transjordan." Article 3 provides that "the armed forces of His Majesty the King will have the right to use their own systems of signal communication, including wireless."

In Article 8 the British government undertakes to defray "the cost of the military units of the Emir's forces, and the strength of such units will be agreed upon annually" between the two governments.

In addition, the British government undertakes to "provide any British officers whose services are required to insure the efficiency of the military units of the Emir's forces."

On April 2 the Lebanese delegation to the Arab League protested to the Council of the League against the treaty between Transjordan and Great Britain on the score that "at a time when other Arab states are seeking to rid themselves of foreign military forces Transjordan has made concessions to Britain that will be dangerous to her neighbors and harmful to the Arab cause as a whole."

British Arrangements in Iraq and Arabia

In Iraq, which was declared free of the British Mandate in 1932, an Anglo-Iraqi treaty gives Britain air bases, facilities for moving troops and supplies, the right to supply foreign military and civilian advisers and technicians, joint control of the British-built Iraqi railways and port of Basra, and the right to move in troops if war threatens.

The British occupy the key posts in the economy of the country. An Englishman is Acting Controller of Currency and Exchange Control Director. Iraq's foreign trade is controlled in the interests of British exports.

On August 4, 1946, although the treaty provides for the movement of British troops only if war is threatened, the Iraqi government approved a British request to send troops to Basra from India.

That British military supervision "will soon be extended to Saudi Arabia" is indicated in a dispatch printed on January 14, 1947, in the New York Times, which stated: "Authoritative quarters [in Cairo] confirmed today that Britain was sending a military mission to Saudi Arabia to organize legions in that country." The mission has undertaken to train and equip Saudi Arabian forces, now numbering 25,000. This is the area where the United States has its richest oil concessions.

Anglo-American Oil Union

A joint Anglo-American political and military policy is a distinct possibility as a result of merged economic interests in the Middle East. A world monopoly on oil is being established by British and American interests, with the participation of the British government and the knowledge and consent of the American government.

Today British and American interests jointly control 42 per cent of the world's oil resources; 42 per cent of the resources are to be found in the Middle East. Five American companies and two British companies, in which Royal Dutch Shell [in which British interests are dominant] has a minority interest, are involved in this combine, which has been in process of formation since the early days of the war and which completed its arrangements in December, 1946.

Iran: The exclusive concession to the oil deposits of Iranian and Kuwait fields is held by the Anglo-Iranian Company, which also owns the Abadan refinery, the largest refinery east of the Suez. The British government owns 50 per cent of the shares of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company.

The Gulf Oil Company of the United States owns 50 per cent of the Kuwait concession.

Iraq: The Iraq Petroleum Company holds the exclusive concession to the oil fields of Iraq, Qatar (now about to be developed), the Trucial Coast, Muscat, Oman. It owns 1,200 miles of pipe line with terminuses at Haifa and Tripoli. The Iraq Petroleum Company is held by the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, of which the British government is the principal stockholder. Royal Dutch Shell holds a 23 3/4 per cent interest in the company, French interests 23 3/4 per cent; Socony-Vacuum and Standard Oil of New Jersey own approximately 25 per cent of the Iraq Petroleum Company and all its products.

British interests in the Iraq Petroleum Company also own the Haifa refinery, with its 80,000-barrel capacity. Standard Oil of New Jersey and Socony-Vacuum have a 30 per cent right to the Haifa capacity.

On July 31, 1928, British, Dutch, French, and American interests, the latter through the Near East Development Corporation representing Socony-Vacuum and Standard Oil of New Jersey, agreed that the participants in the Iraq Petroleum Company would act only through joint operating companies in all matters pertaining to the exploration and production of crude oil within the defined area. This defined area referred to most of the old Ottoman Empire. This has since come to be known as the Red Line agreement.

Saudi Arabia: The Saudi Arabian concessions are owned by the Standard Oil Company of California and the Texas Company, each of which has a 50 per cent interest. The same companies own the concession at Bahrain Island, as well as its refinery.

On December 26, 1946, an agreement was announced under which the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and the Socony-Vacuum Company acquired a 40 per cent interest in the Arabian-American Company.

As a result King Ibn Saud of Saudi Arabia receives monthly royalties annually in the millions, and is reported to have obtained advance payments totaling between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000. Some months earlier, on August 5, 1946, the Import-Export Bank granted a $10,000,000 credit to Saudi Arabia. The loan was obtained on notes backed by the Arabian-American Oil Company. On January 26, 1947, the New York Times dispatch stated that an additional $5,000,000 had been earmarked for Saudi Arabia by the Import-Export Bank.

On December 26, 1946, it was announced also that the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and Socony-Vacuum gether with the Anglo-Iranian Company, in which the British government owns a 50 per cent interest, would investigate the possibility of constructing a jointly owned pipeline from the Persian Gulf to the eastern Mediterranean. At the same time Standard Oil of New Jersey undertook to buy for the next twenty years a substantial quantity of crude oil from the Anglo-Iranian Company.

Standard of New Jersey was bound by the Red Line agreement, however, not to enter into the Saudi Arabian oil development without sharing the entire enterprise with the Iraq Petroleum Company. British legal experts advised that as much as the French company, which was a partner in the Iraq Petroleum Company, was incorporated in France, the German occupation of France had the effect of dissolving the group agreement. France was thus eliminated and Standard Oil given a green light. However, French interests brought it in Britain to contest this decision, and it now appears that the Arabian-American oil deal will be modified to meet, at least, their legitimate demands under the Red Line agreement.

The Chase National Bank of New York heads a group of American banks which have agreed to make a loan of $102,000,000 for the further development of the Saudi Arabian concession. The loan, which will extend for a period of ten years, is guaranteed by Standard Oil of New Jersey for the amount of $76,500,000, and by Socony-Vacuum for the amount of $25,500,000.

The United States government has given its sanction to these recent developments. The United States needs to secure oil imports, according to a statement made by the State Department on August 17, 1946. It believes that in twenty years there will be such a drop in the oil resources of the United States as to require in the year 1965 imports to the amount of 50 per cent of the country's needs.

It is interesting to explore the reasons why the Iraq Petroleum Company was willing to give up the Red Line agreement and its share in huge profits. Obviously, the British believed that if American investments in the Middle East were sufficiently large, the United States government could protect the interests of its nationals. In effect, it deliberately sacrificed profits from Arabian oil for the support of the United States. Moreover, Britain acquired at the same time needed American dollars for the building of its pipelines through the sale of the Anglo-Iranian oil to the American companies.

American Aviation Interests

Oil is not the only American interest in the Middle East. On November 23, 1946, C. L. Sulzberger, in a dispatch from Baghdad to the New York Times, reported that the United States army "is now developing numerous airports in Dhanan on the Persian Gulf coast of Saudi Arabia into its most important air base in the area of the Middle East. The Dhanan airport will be the only base under direct United States army control between Tripoli, Libya, and Karachi, India."

Under the contract with the government of Saudi Arabia any type of civilian or military aircraft may be based at the field. Although it is planned to turn the base over to Saudi Arabia eventually, the contract has a clause guaranteeing future preferred rights to the United States. The American army has landing rights at Payne Field in Cairo, which was turned over to the Egyptian government by the United States.

According to James Landis, now the head of the Civil Aeronautical Authority and formerly United States Middle East economic representative, "No all-weather round-the-world route can be developed without the Middle East." Writing in the September, 1945, issue of Fortune, Mr. Landis further pointed out:

But thus far our rights to fly and land, even to use what we have built, rest everywhere on the most tenuous of war-time easements. Moreover, to reach around the world, or to reach eastward to China and the Pacific by water, we require free and untrammelled access to the Mediterranean and the Red Sea . . . American airplanes fly almost every route in the Middle East, and either directly, or through lend-lease, millions of American dollars have been spent in costly air installations.

The relationship of commercial air transportation to war preparation hardly needs to be stressed.

Who Benefits from the Oil Concessions?

Although millions of dollars are being poured into the Middle East and billions taken out in profits, the economy of the region is still based on a feudal land system which keeps the populations in a state of destitution, ignorance, and misery. Two per cent of the population controls the wealth and the power of all the Arab states.

In Egypt, with its territory of 386,000 square miles and a population of over 18,000,000, some 80 per cent of the people live under conditions of slow starvation. The great majority are infected with parasitic diseases which stunt the mind and body. Nine-tenths of the population suffers from trachoma and other serious eye diseases. Three-quarters of the population is affected by bilharzia and ancylostomiasis. In 1940 less than one-half of one per cent of Egypt's land-owners owned 37 per cent of the land.

In Iraq a population of 3,000,000 occupies an area of 175,000 square miles of great potential productivity. The majority of the population lives under the most primitive conditions, 80 per cent below the theoretical subsistence level. Ninety-five per cent is illiterate. Infant mortality up to the age of five is over 50 per cent. Despite the role of the oil industry in absorbing industrial labor, little more than one-half of one per cent of the population is employed in industry. The fellahin are insolvent, and archaic methods of land tenure are still in force.

In Saudi Arabia King Ibn Saud is an absolute monarch. In Transjordan, the Emir Abdullah also has unlimited power, except for the checks applied by the British. Neither country provides a decent standard of life for its people.

In all the Arab states modern industry has made only a feeble beginning, and there is the same range from the abject poverty of the masses to the great wealth of the very few as exists most spectacularly in Egypt. Hundreds of millions of dollars poured into Arab lands through oil royalties are the exclusive property of kings, sheiks, and effendis, without benefit to the Arab masses.

AMERICAN SUPPORT FOR THE JEWISH NATIONAL HOME

THE United States played a primary role in the events leading up to and following the issuance of the Balfour Declaration and the Mandate for Palestine. In fact, the Balfour Declaration was submitted to President Wilson for his approval in advance of its publication.

Since the time of Wilson other Presidents of the United States, successive sessions of Congress, and leaders in the national life of the country have indorsed the purpose of the Mandate. This indorsement reached its clearest expression in 1944, when both the Democratic and Republican parties incorporated into their platforms resolutions favoring the establishment of a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine.

Resolutions of Both Parties

On June 27, 1944, the Republican National Convention adopted the following resolution:

In order to give refuge to millions of distressed Jewish men, women, and children driven from their homes by tyranny, we call for the opening of Palestine to their unrestricted immigration and land ownership, so that in accordance with the full intent and purpose of the Balfour Declaration of 1917 and the resolution of a Republican Congress in 1922 Palestine may be constituted as a free and democratic commonwealth. We condemn the failure of the President to insist that the mandatory of Palestine carry out the provision of the Balfour Declaration and of the Mandate while he pretends to support them.

On July 24, 1944, the Democratic National Convention adopted the following resolution:

We favor the opening of Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization and such a policy as to result in the establishment there of a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth.

Franklin D. Roosevelt on several occasions reaffirmed the interest of the government of the United States in the rebuilding of Palestine as the Jewish National Home. In the midst of the war, in September, 1941, he found time to send a message to the forty-fourth annual convention of the Zionist Organization of America, in which he said: "It is hardly necessary for me to say that the threat to Palestine does not differ in essence from the threat to this country. . . . I look forward to the day when the great work which has been accomplished in Palestine may be carried forward in peace and harmony."

President Roosevelt's attitude was stated explicitly in October, 1944, to the forty-seventh annual convention of the Zionist Organization through Senator Robert F. Wagner of New York. In this communication the President said:

Knowing that you are to attend the forty-seventh annual convention of the Zionist Organization of America, I ask you to convey to the delegates assembled my cordial greetings. Please express my satisfaction that, in accord with the traditional American policy and in keeping with the spirit of the Four Freedoms, the Democratic Party at its July convention this year included the following plank in its platform: "We favor the opening of Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization, and such a policy as to result in the establishment there of a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth."

One month before his death, on March 16, 1945, President Roosevelt reaffirmed this point of view, declaring: "I maintain my position on Zionism clear in October. That position have not changed, and I shall continue to seek to bring about its earliest realization."

Attitude of United States Congress

The position of the Congress of the United States has been consistent since the issuance of the Balfour Declaration. On September 20, 1922, in a joint resolution, signed by President Harding, Congress declared:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the United States of America favors the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of Christian and all other non-Jewish communities in Palestine, and that the holy places and religious buildings and sites in Palestine shall be adequately protected.

On December 3, 1924, a convention was signed by the United States and Great Britain in which the United States reaffirmed its indorsement of the Balfour Declaration, accepted the terms of the Mandate for Palestine as defined by the Council of the League of Nations on September 29, 1922, and asserted the rights of the United States with respect to decisions on Palestine as equal to those of the member nations of the League of Nations. Article 7 of this convention provides, "Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be met in the terms of the Mandate as recited above, unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States."

On July 2, 1945, a majority of the members of both houses of Congress addressed a communication to the President of the United States in which they urged American assistance in establishing Palestine "as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth" open "to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization."

On December 19, 1945, a concurrent resolution was adopted at the first session of the Seventy-ninth Congress of the United States, declaring:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring): That the interest shown by the President in the solution of this problem is hereby commended and that the United States shall use its good offices with the mandatory power to the end that Palestine shall be opened for free entry of Jews into that country to the maximum of its agricultural and economic potentialities, and that there shall be full opportunity for colonization and development, so that they may freely proceed with the upbuilding of Palestine as the Jewish National Home, and, in association with all elements of the population, establish Palestine as a democratic commonwealth in which all men, regardless of race or creed, shall have equal rights.

That same day the President of the United States received petition from the governors of forty states also urging American support for the establishment of a democratic Jewish commonwealth in Palestine.

President Truman's Position

In recognition of Jewish need and the traditional policy of the United States with respect to Palestine, President Truman, immediately after V-E Day in May, 1945, dispatched Earl G. Harrison, American member of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees and dean of the Pennsylvania Law School, to Europe to make a report on the plight of the Jews. Some months later, Mr. Harrison reported to the President as follows:

The main solution, in many ways the only real solution, of the problem lies in the quick evacuation of all non-repatriable Jews in Germany and Austria who wish it to Palestine. In order to be effective, this plan must not be long delayed. The urgency of the situation should be recognized. It is inhuman to ask people to continue to live for any length of time under their present conditions. The evacuation of the Jews of Germany and Austria to Palestine will solve the problem of the individuals involved and will also remove a problem for the military authorities who have to deal with it. The army's ability to move millions of people quickly and efficiently has been amply demonstrated. The evacuation of a relatively small number of Jews from Germany and Austria will present no great problem to the military.

On the basis of the Harrison report President Truman, on August 31, 1945, sent a communication to Prime Minister Attlee of Great Britain, asking him to make available 100,000 Palestine immigration certificates for Jews in the displaced-persons camps. After months of delay the British countered with the suggestion that a Committee of Inquiry be appointed by the United States and British governments. The United States agreed. On November 13, 1945, President Truman announced the establishment of this committee.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMITTEE AND WHAT FOLLOWED

ON JANUARY 4, 1946, the committee, consisting of six members representing the United States and six members representing Great Britain, met in Washington and inaugurated a series of public hearings which were later extended to London, the Continent, and Palestine.

Its functions were described as follows:

1. To examine political, economic, and social conditions in Palestine as they bear upon the problem of Jewish immigration and settlement therein and the well-being of the peoples now living therein.

2. To examine the position of the Jews in those countries in Europe where they have been the victims of Nazi and Fascist persecution, and the practical measures taken or contemplated to be taken in those countries to enable them to live free from discrimination and oppression and to make estimates of those who wish or will be impelled by their conditions to migrate to Palestine or other countries outside Europe.

3. To hear the views of competent witnesses and to consult representative Arabs and Jews on the problems of Palestine as such problems are affected by conditions subject to examination under paragraphs one and two above, and by other relevant facts and circumstances, and to make recommendations to His Majesty's Government and the government of the United States for an interim handling of these problems and their permanent solution.

Recommendations of the Committee

On April 20, 1946, the Anglo-American Committee issued from Lausanne, Switzerland, a report on its findings. Its proposals, based on the findings, follow:

Refugee Immigration Into Palestine

We recommend that 100,000 certificates be authorized immediately for the admission into Palestine of Jews who have been the victims of Nazi and Fascist persecution; that these certificates be awarded as far as possible in 1946 and that actual immigration be pushed forward as rapidly as conditions will permit.

Land Policy

We recommend that the Land Transfers Regulations of 1940 be rescinded and replaced by regulations based on a policy of freedom in the sale, lease, or use of land, irrespective of race, community, or creed, and providing adequate protection for the interests of small owners and tenant cultivators; we further recommend that steps be taken to render nugatory and to prohibit provisions in conveyances, leases, and agreements relating to land which stipulate that only members of one race, community, or creed may be employed on or about or in connection therewith.

No Arab, No Jewish State

In order to dispose, once and for all, of the exclusive claim of Jews and Arabs to Palestine, we regard it as essential that a clear statement of the following principles should be made:

(1) That Jew shall not dominate Arab and Arab shall not dominate Jew in Palestine; (2) that Palestine shall be neither a Jewish state nor an Arab state; (3) that the form of government ultimately to be established shall, under international guaranties, fully protect and preserve the interests in the Holy Land of Christendom and of the Moslem and Jewish faiths.

Thus Palestine must ultimately become a state which guards the rights and interests of Moslems, Jews, and Christians alike, and accords to the inhabitants as a whole the fullest measure of self-government consistent with the three paramount principles set forth above. . . .

Mandate and United Nations Trusteeship

We have reached the conclusion that the hostility between Jews and Arabs, and, in particular, the determination of each to achieve domination, if necessary by violence, make it almost certain that now and for some time to come any attempt to establish either as independent Palestinian states would result in civil strife such as might threaten the peace of the world.

We therefore recommend that until this hostility disappears the government of Palestine be continued as at present under mandate pending the execution of a trusteeship agreement under the United Nations.

Arab Needs

Looking toward a form of ultimate self-government consistent with the three principles laid down in Recommendation No. 3, we recommend that the mandatory or trustee should proclaim the principle that Arab economic, educational, and political advancement in Palestine is of equal importance with that of the Jews and should at once prepare measures designed to bridge the gap which now exists and raise the Arab standard of living to that of the Jews, and so bring the two peoples to a full appreciation of their common interest and common destiny in the land where both belong.

Future Immigration Policy

We recommend that pending the early reference to the United Nations and the execution of a trusteeship agreement the mandatory should administer Palestine according to the Mandate, which declares with regard to immigration that "the administration of Palestine, while insuring that the rights and position of other sections of the population are not prejudiced, shall facilitate Jewish immigration under suitable conditions.

The well-being of all the people of Palestine, be they Jews, Arabs, or neither, must be the governing consideration. We reject the view that there shall be no further Jewish immigration into Palestine without Arab acquiescence a view which would result in the Arab dominating the Jew. We also reject the insistent Jewish demand that forced Jewish immigration must proceed apace in order to produce as quickly as possible a Jewish majority and a Jewish state. The well-being of the Jews must not be subordinated to that of the Arabs, nor that of the Arabs to the Jews. The well-being of both, the economic situation of Palestine as a whole, the degree of execution of plans for further development, all have to be carefully considered in deciding the number of immigrants for any particular period.

During the London hearings of the Anglo-American Committee a formal luncheon was tendered the members by Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin. Bartley C. Crum reports that Bevin on this occasion definitely assured the committee he would accept its recommendations if they were unanimous.

On the strength of this promise the committee brought out a unanimous report, although two members, Richard Crossman and Bartley C. Crum, favored partition, while Frank W. Buxton favored the establishment of a Jewish state in the whole of Palestine.

Truman Accepts; Attlee Rejects

When the Anglo-American Committee report was issued President Truman expressed his support of the recommendations with respect to immigration, land restrictions, and the canceling of the White Paper. He reserved judgment on the remainder of the recommendations.

The British government did not accept the provisions of the report. Instead, Prime Minister Attlee in the House of Commons on May 1, 1946, stated that Great Britain could not undertake to carry out the recommendations single-handed and wanted to know to what extent the United States would "be prepared to share the resulting military and financial responsibilities." He declined to implement that portion of the report calling for the early admission of 100,000 refugee Jews and demanded the disarmament of the Haganah, as well as the Arabs, as a condition precedent to a discussion of the possibility of putting the recommendations into effect.

In a communication to President Truman the British government went beyond the Attlee statement and announced that it would be willing to consider admitting the Jews or if illegal Jewish armies were disbanded before the Jews were permitted to move, and asked whether the United States would share responsibility in disarming these forces.

Committee of Experts Set Up

On June 11, 1946, President Truman created a special Cabinet committee to assist him in formulating and implementing "such policy with regard to Palestine and related problems as may be adopted by this government."

Henry F. Grady of San Francisco was named as an alternate for Secretary Byrnes and left for London with an advisory staff to discuss a plan for Palestine with a similar committee appointed by the British government. This joint body issued what became known as the Morrison-Grady Plan, on July 10, 1946.

While the committee was meeting, President Truman announced that the United States was ready to assume responsibility for transporting 100,000 Jews to Palestine.

Terms of Morrison-Grady Plan

Under the Morrison-Grady Plan four administrative areas were to have been set up. First, a Jewish province consisting of the most highly developed industrial and agricultural Jewish settlements, including Tel-Aviv and other settlements already populated by Jews; second, a Jerusalem district consisting of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and surrounding territory to be administered by the central British government; third, the Negev or south country, a largely uninhabited triangle with its apex on the Gulf of Aqaba and bounded by Sinai desert and Transjordan, to be administered in the immediate future by the British authorities; and, fourth, a province to be known as the Arab province, which would consist of the rest of Palestine.

The Negev area, it was revealed, was to become a base for British military activity in the Middle East.

Under the scheme, two Arab and Jewish provincial governments were to be set up and to include local elected legislatures. The central government—namely, Britain—would charge of the administration of law and security, for affairs, customs, and taxation. Both Jews and Arabs were to be permitted to admit or exclude as many settlers in their areas as they wished within the absorptive capacity of each province, subject, however, to the approval of the High Commissioner. The High Commissioner, moreover, could veto any legislation in the provincial legislatures. A principal point in the Morrison-Grady Plan was the proposal that the Negev, comprising 45 per cent of Palestine, a likely source of oil, was to become a British reservation, ultimately to be added to either a Jewish or an Arab state. But whatever the disposition of the Negev, the rights were to be retained by Britain in perpetuity. If the scheme was accepted, Herbert Morrison said, 100,000 Jews would be admitted into the country in twelve months.

United States Rejects Plan

The United States, under the plan, was called upon to provide the transportation of refugees, supply two months' food for them, and, in addition, assume financial responsibility for improving the living standards of the Arabs. The United States was expected to assume short-term financial commitments, including the financing of all health services and an educational system for the Arabs comparable to that of the Jews, and the development of light industries and other economic improvements. In addition, the United States was to pay $300,000,000 to the Arab states, of which $100,000,000, in the words of Bartley Crum, could be regarded as "an outright bribe to the Arab leaders in Syria, Saudi Arabia, King Abdullah, and all the rest, that should permit Great Britain to permit some Jews to settle what will become a small elongated ghetto." The scheme was rejected by the United States and by the Jews and the Arabs.

George Huthcheson, chairman of the American section of the Anglo-American Committee, called the plan a "com- sell-out—a very pretty, even grandiose sell-out, but a sell-out nevertheless."

Further American Proposals

On October 4, 1946, the President again asked Prime Minister Attlee for the immediate admission of considerable numbers of Jewish displaced persons into Palestine. The request was refused. This refusal was countered with another message from the President reiterating his request. This plea was also refused.

President Truman pointed out that among the members of the major political parties, both in Congress and throughout the country, opposition had developed to the Morrison-Grady Plan and for that reason he "could not give support to the plan." He continued:

The British government presented to the conference the so-called Morrison Plan for provincial autonomy and stated that the conference was open to other proposals. Meanwhile, the Jewish Agency proposed a solution of the Palestine problem by means of the creation of a viable Jewish state in control of its own immigration and economic activities in an adequate area of Palestine instead of in the whole of Palestine. It proposed further the immediate issuance of certificates for 100,000 Jewish immigrants. This proposal received widespread attention in the United States, both in the press and in public forums. From the discussion which has ensued it is my belief that a solution along these lines would command the support of public opinion in the United States. I cannot believe that the gap between the proposals which have been put forward is too great to be bridged by men of reason and good-will. To such a solution our government could give its support. . . .

The President further urged that immigration into Palestine be started promptly and again promised American assistance. He agreed, if this policy was carried out, to recommend to Congress measures liberalizing this country's immigration laws and providing economic help in the development of Palestine.

Truman to Ibn Saud

On October 15, 1946, King Ibn Saud of Saudi Arabia, in a letter to President Truman, demanded the stoppage of Jewish immigration, which he chose to call "Zionist aggression."

In reply to this letter, on October 28, President Truman refuted the points raised by Ibn Saud and affirmed American responsibility for seeing to it that the Jewish National Home was established in Palestine. He pointed out that "the Jewish National Home, however, has not as yet been fully developed."

Britain's Last Attempt

Subsequent conversations held by Great Britain with Arab and Jewish groups failed to achieve anything, and it was decided by the British government to hold another conference with Arabs and Jews in January, 1947, in London. When the time came, the conference was held with the Arab leaders alone. The representatives of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency refused to attend in view of the lack of advance assurances that the partition proposal favored by them as a possible compromise solution would be fully considered by the British. Informal discussions with the Zionist leaders, however, went on during the entire period of the conference.

The outcome of the conference was a British plan based on a scaled-down version of the Morrison-Grady Plan: it was acceptable to neither party concerned.

On February 26, 1947, the British government made its first advance to the United Nations, requesting an extraordinary session of the Assembly on the Palestine question. By consent of the member nations that session was called for April 28.

British Pressure on Inquiry Committee

That Britain, despite its responsibility for the creation of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, was opposed to a settlement favorable to the Jews was made evident to American members of the committee from the very start, and Bartley Crum, in his book, cites numerous instances of this attitude.

Harold Beeley, Near East expert of the British Foreign Office attached to the committee, now attached to the British delegation at the U. N., told Mr. Crum that the purpose was to reach a solution which would establish an Arab cordon sanitaire against the Soviet Union.

One British member described Zionism as Jewish fascism. Another characterized it as communism in disguise. Harold Beeley told Crum "that Britain's honor was at stake. The 1939 White Paper pledged independence to the Arabs in Palestine and we must carry out the pledge."

In London witnesses tried to deny that the pledges of the Labor Party on Palestine were intended to be carried out. General Sir Edward Spears, who in 1942, 1943, and 1944 had been Britain's Minister to Syria and Lebanon, was called as a witness as a so-called expert on Middle Eastern affairs. Spears, who had been recalled after the French denounced him for intriguing behind the scenes, charged the Zionists "were spiritually Nazis and agents provocateurs, and that during World War II Britain had to keep military forces in the Middle East in order to guard against Jewish revolt against Britain."

When Mr. Buxton, an American member of the Anglo-American Committee, asked Spears if he knew the relative enlistments in the last war of Arabs and Jews of Palestine and said, "My understanding was that per capita enlistments among the Jews in Palestine were a great deal heavier than the enlistments among the Arabs," General Spears tried with his spectacles and said he "had not seen the figures."

In Palestine Sir John Shaw, chief secretary of the Palestine government, told Crum that only if the Jewish Agency were liquidated and the Haganah disarmed would he be ready to recommend the admission of 100,000 Jews into Palestine over a period of three to four years. Crum also revealed that a number of General D'Arcy's aids, as part of their evidence, had offered the committee photographs of "extreme military importance," allegedly showing and ammunition discovered during a raid on a new collective in Syria. Crum took up one of them and looked at the back. "It was a commercial postcard, the type of in any Jerusalem shop," he reports.

Richard Crossman, in his book, states that the British Palestine "are anti-Jewish and are either pro-Arab or impartial in detesting both."

State Department Prejudice

If the British were guilty of prejudice, officials of the United States State Department were responsible for actions which contradicted the publicly announced policy of the American government with respect to Palestine, as was the viewpoint of Truman, according to Bartley Crum.

Loy Henderson, chief of the Near East Division of the State Department, in briefing Mr. Crum echoed the comments of Harold Beeley, his opposite number in the Foreign Office. He said to Mr. Crum, "There is only one facing both the United States and Great Britain, and that is the Soviet Union. It would be wise to bear that in mind when you consider the Palestine problem."

The practical effect of this attitude on the part of the State Department was revealed in the confidential file supplied by the Near East Division of the State Department for the use of the American members of the committee.

Seventeen items in the file disclosed, according to Crum, that since April 15, 1938, "each time a promise was made to American Jewry regarding Palestine, the State Department promptly sent a message to Arab rulers disavowing it and reassuring them in effect that regardless of what was promised publicly to the Jews, nothing would be done to change the situation in Palestine." According to Crum, even President Truman knew of the existence of this

IMMIGRATION AND REPRESSION

THE refusal of the British to admit more than a thin trickle of the displaced Jews of Europe to Palestine has mobilized the entire Jewish community in opposition to this policy. Boatload after boatload of Jewish immigrants in past months has made its way to Palestine, only to be forcibly removed and sent to the Island of Cyprus. Each transfer has been accompanied by resistance, first on the part of the immigrants themselves, and, second on that of the Jewish community.

Regarding restrictions of the White Paper as illegal, the Jews of Palestine decline to regard any Jewish immigration as illegal.

The "illegal" immigration is carried out under the direction of the Haganah, the Jewish defense organization.

In August, 1945, the last of the 75,000 immigrant visas available under the 1939 White Paper's five-year plan were assigned. Under the pressure of the United States government the British have agreed to allow 1,500 immigrants to enter the country each month. These visas are assigned to the so-called illegal immigrants in Cyprus, which now has a refugee colony of more than 12,000.

The Jews as a Nation

All observers in Palestine report that the Jews will reject any solution which fails to satisfy their demands for the admission of refugees and for the right to conduct their own affairs. In discussing their present attitude toward Palestine, Richard Crossman says:

History, reaching its climax in the Nazi persecutions, had made these few survivors of the Polish, Hungarian and Rumanian Jewish communities into the members of a Jewish nation. . . . Nothing could stop this movement to Palestine, although it could be halted for a period. The National Home was not a synthetic colony composed of Jews of fifteen different nationalities but a new Palestinian community. . . . the nucleus of a brand-new Western state planked down on the seaboard of the Arab world. The fact that the home of the Jews was also the home of the Arabs complicated the problem, but it was not for that reason, trying to believe that the Jewish nation should be given a home elsewhere. Nations cannot be constructed in this way, and Jewish nationalism would not be content until a Jewish commonwealth had been established in the Eretz Israel. . . . I had to admit that Jews had set going revolutionary forces in the Middle East which in the long run would benefit the Arabs. . . . But what should not be done was to attempt to hold an even balance between the two communities and thereby to frustrate the legitimate aspirations of both.

In the opinion of Crossman and others the Jews will fight to the finish to achieve their goal. Ben-Gurion, chairman of the Executive Committee of the Jewish Agency, told Crossman in Palestine:

In deciding our destiny don't make the mistake of thinking of us as Jews like the Jews you have in London. Imagine that we are Englishmen fighting for our national existence, and calculate that we shall behave as you would behave if you were in our situation. . . .

Palestine a Police State

A small element of the Jewish community is organized into two terrorist groups, one known as the Irgun Zvai Niti and the other as the Stern Gang, which have organized a series of reprisals against the British military administration, including bombings and assaults on British administrative officers and other personnel.

In retaliation the British administration has introduced repressive measures which have turned Palestine into a police state. It has made many attempts to induce the Jewish Agency for Palestine to act as informer and turn over the terrorists. While disclaiming any identification with the terror, in fact strongly opposing it, the Jewish Agency has agreed to accept this function and has demanded instead of the British government "end the terror by admitting immigrants and restoring civil rights to the people."

Today, Palestine under Britain is, according to the Anglo-American Committee, a semi-military or police state. The expenditures on so-called law and order in 1944-45 amounted to $18,400,000, as against an expenditure of $10,000,000 for health and $2,800,000 for education.

Censorship is absolute. Every item of Palestine news and every editorial comment must be submitted, and there is no appeal from the decision of the government. Civil liberties are non-existent. Anyone can be arrested for being a member of a group any other member of which has done something illegal.

The Anglo-American Committee, in describing the situation in the country said:

The regulations confer on the authorities wide powers of arrest and search without warrant. Searches may be made in the absence of the owner or occupier, provided the mukhtar of the area or two responsible citizens are present. Military courts possess considerable jurisdiction and can impose the death sentence. The principle of group responsibility has been extended, and the authorities are empowered to impose collective fines as punitive measures. The regulations provide also for forfeiture of property of any person who, in the considered opinion of the High Commissioner, has committed or abetted the commission of certain specified offenses.

In Palestine there is a police-and-prisons establishment of over 15,000 persons, exclusive of supernumerary police. These police are habitually armed and are conspicuous everywhere.

Defense Regulations or Martial Law?

On September 27, 1945, forty new regulations on security were introduced by the Palestine government, necessitated, it stated, "by conditions in Palestine." The regulations were based on special war-time practices.

Four months later, on January 28, 1946, even more drastic regulations were issued, which had the virtual effect of martial law. Military courts were established with single officers appointed by the general officer in command in whom were vested practically unlimited powers to impose punishments.

Made punishable by death were: discharge or carrying of firearms or explosives; damaging or obstructing property; interfering with property, vehicles, communications, plant installations, or supply services of the government and the armed forces.

Punishable, but by less drastic means, were: aiding or abetting offenders or attempted offenders; wearing clothes resembling uniforms; wearing a disguise while at a place where such disguise would be prejudicial to the public safety or defense; unlawful drilling of any kind and possessing of wireless transmitting apparatus or parts of apparatus without the authority of the military commander.

The regulations gave the authority to issue detention orders to officers or persons named by the military commander. The High Commissioner was empowered to deport any person from the country for an indefinite period, and to refuse entry to any person as long as the regulations were in force.

Most stringent was the provision which made it necessary for the suspect to prove his innocence, instead of placing the responsibility on the authorities to prove his guilt.

Under these regulations the British Palestine administration arrested the highest leaders of the Executive Committee of the Jewish Agency, although admitting that they had no connection with terror, and for weeks kept them in detention camps without trial. British troops and police carried out searches in Jewish settlements, destroyed property, arrested innocent men and women.

A new phase was inaugurated on March 2, 1947, when statutory martial law was imposed on Tel-Aviv, Ramat Gan, Petah Tikvah, Bnei Brak, and the Mea Shearim district of Jerusalem. This action was in retaliation for the bombing of the officers' club in Jerusalem and, as the government put it, because of "lack of cooperation against bloodshed and terrorism" on the part of the Jewish institutions.

Statutory martial law remained in effect for fifteen days until March 17, 1947, and Jewish community losses are estimated to have totaled some $7,000,000.

On April 9, 1947, statutory martial law underwent a further transformation, and it was announced that "what have been called statutory martial-law areas will in the future be known as 'controlled' areas." Under this new decree, issued as an amendment to the defense emergency regulations, the High Commissioner gave himself the power to declare any part of the country a "controlled area" and to close all public offices, civil courts, banks, and communication services in such areas. An explanatory note warned that "these conditions are much more restrictive than under martial law."

SOME PROPOSED SOLUTIONS

VARIOUS proposals have been made for a solution of the Palestine problem. The Arabs demand an independent Palestine immediately; this would of course mean an Arab-controlled state since the Jews are in a minority. The British have proposed a form of federalization or cantonization under the ultimate authority of the British crown. Various groups, Jewish and non-Jewish, favor an independent bi-national state in which power would be divided equally between Jews and Arabs. Other groups and individuals advocate partition on a basis which would create in Palestine what has come to be called "a viable Jewish state." This last scheme, which has won some backing among moderate Zionists, involves a serious modification of the traditional Zionist aim—namely, the establishment of a Jewish commonwealth in the whole area of Palestine.

Let us examine briefly these various proposals:

The Bi-national State

The idea of a bi-national state in Palestine in which Jews and Arabs shall have equal rights—either on the basis of numerical equality in the population or through equal representation without regard to population figures—has a strong democratic appeal. It was suggested, rather vaguely, as a possible solution by the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry.

It is not one, however, which will satisfy the need of the Jews to migrate to Palestine—particularly in view of the consistent opposition of the Arabs to the admission of any Jews—or to develop their own institutions there. Nor will it satisfy the ambitions of the Arabs for sovereign control in a country of their own. Moreover, if the scheme were actually put into effect, conflict would inevitably develop between two peoples whose cultural and industrial development is on such contrasting levels and whose approach to social and political problems is so different.

Cantonization

Twice since the end of the war the British government has sponsored a scheme for the division of Palestine into Jewish and Arab cantons, or districts, under a central government which would be controlled by Britain. Such a plan was worked out at the London Conference of the Anglo-American Cabinet Committee and made public in July, 1946.

Nine years earlier, in 1937, the Royal Commission had also examined the idea of cantonization and rejected it on the ground that "cantonal autonomy would not satisfy for a moment the demands of Arab nationalism; it would not raise the status of Palestine Arabs to the level of that enjoyed or soon to be enjoyed by Arabs in neighboring countries; nor would it give the Jews the full freedom they desire to build up their own national home in their own way at their own pace, nor offer them the prospect of realizing on a small territorial scale all that Zionism means. Cantonization presents most, if not all, of the difficulties presented by partition without partition's one supreme advantage—the advantage it offers of eventual peace."

Despite the rejection of this plan Great Britain renewed its proposal for cantonization on February 10, 1947. At that time Mr. Bevin advocated even more restricted Jewish immigration. The end effect of the proposal was to prepare Palestine for eventual independence under circumstances which would insure a permanent Arab majority.

Partition as a Solution

The proposal that Palestine should be divided into states was first made by the Royal Commission in 1937. Thereafter the British government received authority from the Permanent Mandates Commission and the Council of the League of Nations to explore the practical application of the principle of partition. In December, 1947, it appointed a committee to investigate partition and draw up a practical scheme. This committee unanimously adopted against the recommendations of the Royal Commission proposed instead two other plans which would have reduced the Jewish state to much smaller dimensions than were suggested in the Peel report. These proposals were bitterly opposed by all Zionists.

As a result the British government in November, 1947, "reached the conclusion that this further examination has shown that the political, administrative, and financial difficulties involved in the proposal to create independent Jewish and Arab states inside Palestine are so great that this solution of the problem is impracticable."

Seemingly the experience of World War II and the need to provide a refuge for European Jewry brought the British government, before the war's end, to the belief that partition might provide the best solution after all. Dr. Chaim Weizmann, then president of the Jewish Agency, in his testimony before the Anglo-American Committee said: "I had a promise from Mr. Churchill that if he were returned to office in the summer of 1945, he would immediately go forward with a generous partition plan."

Leopold S. Amery, former British Secretary of State for India and former Colonial Secretary, told the committee in January 30, 1946, that "the division of Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state is the only solution. Both sides have aspirations for self-government and both feel fit for it."

Even today, however, there is little enthusiasm in Jewish circles for a partitioned state. It represents a sacrifice which Zionism feeling naturally resists. This feeling was reflected in the resolution of the Basel Zionist Congress in December 1946, which asked for full implementation of the terms of the Mandate encompassing the whole of Palestine.

Attitude of the Zionists Toward Partition

But even if the Zionist movement is officially opposed to partition, there is reason to believe that the promise of a Jewish state in an area adequate to allow for the admission of the remnants of European Jewry would be acceptable to most Jewish leaders.

Moshe Shertok, political secretary of the Jewish Agency, stated in 1946 that the Agency would accept partition with tain conditions. Even Ben-Gurion, thought to be more extreme in his views, told Crossman a year ago that a firm decision by the British and a speedy execution of partition would be accepted.

Could the Jews Be Safe in an Arab State?

The Arab states are demanding an independent state in Palestine immediately. In such a state the Jewish population, aggressive and technically advanced, would be at the mercy of a backward and antagonistic Arab majority led by the enemy, the Mufti. Moreover, in decisions involving any disputes with the Jews, Palestine Arabs would have the backing of the other Arab states.

To be sure, in all their demands for an Arab state in Palestine the Arab states, singly and collectively, have emphasized that all sections of the population would be on a level of equality. M. Fadhel Jamali, director-general of Foreign Affairs of the Iraq government, in his testimony before the Anglo-American Committee, underscored this view and held the status of the Jews in Iraq as an example of how different elements in a population can live in peace and harmony. This is the same official who in 1937 visited Germany, and according to a British Defense Security report of April 11, 1945, "he was accorded an official welcome and lavishly entertained."

In examination of the record, however, clearly indicates there is nothing to justify confidence in the attitude of Arab states toward any minority in their population. The experience of the Kurds, Christian Lebanese, Copts, Arrians, and Jews offers striking refutation of such assurances. In 1937 the Royal Commission emphasized, "We cannot, in the present state of affairs, abandon them [the Jews of Palestine] to the good intentions of the Arab government." The situation is even greater today than in 1937.

In recent years pogroms have taken place in Bagdad, Mosul, and Cairo.

In Syria, as recently as March 24, 1947, the government announced that the death penalty would be imposed on Jews in Syria, numbering 13,000, unless they publicly denounced Zionism and surrendered all Jewish refugees attempting to enter Palestine. In the last years Jews have been fleeing from Syria to India, Egypt, the United States, and Palestine. The Jewish population today is half of that of 1937.

The situation of the Lebanese Jewish community is like that of the Syrian, although the existence of a small Christian minority serves for the time being as a safeguard.

Iraq celebrated its independence in 1932 by persecuting and slaughtering its minority groups, including Assyrians, Kurds, and Jews. In 1935 Jews were discharged from all public posts under pretense that "unsuitables" were being eliminated. But the largest category of so-called unsuitables were the Jews. Subsidies have been withdrawn from Jewish schools; the teaching of Hebrew is forbidden.

In 1941 a pogrom took place in Bagdad in which the British and his followers played an important part. An investigating committee reported that 110 Jews were killed, including 28 women; 586 stores were looted; 911 houses, in which 12,311 persons lived, were destroyed. In reality, the number of Jews killed exceeded 400.

In Egypt pogroms have taken place in Cairo and Alexandria. These spread from Egypt to Tripolitania, where three days later 170 Jews were massacred. Jews are discriminated against in every possible way, politically and financially.

In Yemen, one of the most backward of the Middle Eastern countries, the Jews, numbering some 45,000, are homeless wanderers in the desert. They are exposed to robbery and torture, burdened with all kinds of special taxes, and are on the verge of death by starvation.

Immigration Impossible in an Arab State

If Palestine were an Arab state, the primary need of European Jewry—immigration—could not be met. Apart from the restrictions proposed by the Arabs in the plans under consideration, their opposition to immigration has been consistent and open. Dr. Hitti, testifying before the Anglo-American Committee in Washington in behalf of the Institute for Arab Affairs, when asked if the Arabs would agree to Jewish immigration if the goal of a Jewish state were eliminated, replied, "Frankly, no. Jewish immigration seems to us an attenuated form of conquest."

Arab Rights in a Jewish Commonwealth

The Jewish Agency for Palestine, in its testimony before the Anglo-American Committee, set forth its views as to the rights of all citizens in a Jewish state, as follows:

A self-governing state is contemplated in which all citizens, regardless of race or creed, shall enjoy equal rights, and all communities shall control their internal affairs. The state will not be Jewish in the sense that the Jews in it will have more rights than the non-Jews, or that its Jewish community will be superior in status to other communities, or that other religions will have an inferior status to the Jewish religion. In what sense will it then be a Jewish state? It will be Jewish because Jews will have a right of entry to it not limited by any political consideration; because in it Jews will be free to create a society according to their own way of life; because, in addition to its ordinary function of insuring the welfare of all its inhabitants, the state will have the special function of serving as the Jewish National Home and providing refuge for oppressed Jews; because by its existence it will normalize the status of the Jewish people.

The attitude of the Jews toward the Arabs in areas of Palestine where Jewish institutions are established supports the Agency's claim that the rights of the Arabs would be fully respected in a Jewish state. The facilities of Jewish hospitals, social-welfare organizations, the Hebrew University, agencies for agricultural information and advice, and other similar institutions are uniformly made available to both communities on equal terms.

Possibilities of Arab-Jewish Cooperation

That Jews and Arabs can live together in peace is attested to by certain Arabs themselves. An Arab leader with considerable influence whom Bartley Crum identifies as Yusefd told him: "If we were sure that Britain and America wished the Jews and Arabs to get together, we would." Mayor Nashashibi of Jerusalem told Bartley Crum that he favored partition for the following reasons: first, the Jews could have an independent democratic state with a Jewish majority; second the Arabs could have a large Arab state comprising Transjordan and the Arab-populated part of Palestine, all under King Abdullah of Transjordan; third, the British would be eliminated.

Other Arab leaders expressed their belief that the Arab politicians were making a great mistake in not recognizing that the Palestinian Arabs and the Palestinian Jews share a common destiny. "If the Arab leadership were convinced that the Jews were not part of a creeping invasion engineered by England to destroy their position, the Jews and Arabs even at the top would be able to reconcile their differences." Bartley Crum reports the opinion of the Nashashibi family, representing the moderate Arab groups in Palestine.

"It was the old story of appeasement," Nashashibi told me, "and like all appeasement, it proved a major error."

CAN A JEWISH STATE BE ESTABLISHED?

ALL evidence points to the certainty that the establishment of independent Jewish and Arab states is feasible.

Bartley Crum reports his "feeling" that Sir Allan Cunningham, High Commissioner for Palestine, favors partition, "not partition along lines of the Peel report, but with a far more generous territorial allowance to the new state of Judea." Sir Allan told members of the Anglo-American Committee, "Whatever you do, I would suggest that you make a bold and forthright recommendation and then see to it that it is carried out with boldness and determination."

General J. C. D'Arcy, general officer commanding Palestine, told the Anglo-American Committee that "purely from the military point of view he could enforce a pro-Jewish solution without much difficulty. In enforcing such a solution the Haganah can be most helpful." Whereas, according to D'Arcy, in case of a pro-Arab solution he would have the Haganah to contend with.

Asked what would happen were Britain to withdraw her troops from Palestine, General D'Arcy said, according to Crum: "The Haganah would take over all of Palestine tomorrow and . . . hold it against the entire Arab world."

When one of the British members of the Anglo-American Committee asked him: "Are you implying, sir, that it is impossible for His Majesty's Government to disarm the Haganah?" General D'Arcy replied: "You cannot disarm a whole people. I rather think the world will not stand for another mass murder of Jews."

Crossman reports that the Arab experts in Cairo told him that the Haganah was the most powerful military force in the Middle East apart from the British army. In Crossman's view a pro-Arab policy would entail the heaviest military commitment since it would be resisted not only by the Irgun but by the whole Haganah, backed by nearly all the Jews.

Can the Arabs Stage a Revolt?

For the past twenty-five years the Arabs have held over the heads of the British mandatory and world public opinion the threat of an Arab revolt in the event of decisions favor-

As soon as Haj Amin came to power, he was more intransigent than ever. He purged the Arab leadership of every Arab who threatened his domination, and I do not exaggerate when I say the Mufti's gangs simply eliminated by murder hundreds of his political opponents. The Mufti, he added, was publicly charged with "direct responsibility" for the murder of twenty-eight men, all distinguished Palestine Arab leaders, in an affidavit entitled "Voice from the Arab Tombs of Palestine," published in Cairo on January 2, 1939, by a Sheik Ali Yassin, who had escaped to Egypt from Palestine. "The Mufti is a great problem for us, as you can see," he added.

Militating against Arab-Jewish understanding are the Arab kings and effendis on the one hand and British imperialism on the other. The rich Arabs are opposed to Zionism on ground that Jewish social and technical innovations are lifting the masses from their ignorance and serfdom.

able to the Jews. This threat has been reiterated by the Arab League and has been given point in the announcements from Cairo and Jerusalem that Palestine Arabs are forming semi-military youth organizations in every town and village.

Despite this fact seasoned observers do not believe that the Arabs will revolt or have the strength to maintain a revolt. As far back as 1937 the Royal Commission dismissed the idea of serious trouble on the part of the Arabs: "It would not suggest that it would be formidable. It would be ludicrous to suppose that it is beyond the resources of Your Majesty's Government to deal with a rebellion on so small a scale and so ill-equipped for modern warfare."

More recent observers on the spot acquiesce in that opinion. Mr. Crossman says in his book: "I do not believe that the admission of 100,000 Jews would cause any Arab disturbance which could not be comfortably dealt with by the British army on the spot. . . ."

American correspondents who have visited Palestine at the Near East share and amplify that view. Freda Kirchwey, editor of The Nation, returned from a visit to Palestine in the Middle East last June and said that no Arab state combination of states could start a war in Palestine without British connivance.

The Arab leaders know this well; they may bark loudly, but they have very few teeth to bite with. Egypt will never endanger its present negotiations with Britain by seriously involving itself in Palestine. King Farouk has huge ambitions, encompassing the whole Arab world. But his present need is to win a diplomatic triumph through the withdrawal, on favorable terms, of British forces from Egypt.

Transjordan's newly crowned king, Abdullah, is in Britain's pocket—not only because the whole independence farce was staged and run off by the British; not only because the treaty with Britain secures that power's predominant interest; but above all because Transjordan's army is officered by Britishers and is in fact an integral part of Britain's armed forces in the Middle East. To imagine an incursion from Transjordan into Palestine without Britain's consent is a little difficult.

In Iraq British control is only a little less overt. Since the overthrow of Rashid Ali in 1941, the Iraqi government and army have operated under strict British supervision.

There remain Syria and Lebanon. Ostensibly independent since the French were evicted, these countries might possibly cause trouble across the border. Syria is now militantly pan-Arab and has taken the lead in boycotting Jewish goods from Palestine. Lebanon, torn between Arab propaganda and the fears of the Christian population, is more inhibited. But both are deeply beholden to the British. The liquidation of French control was accomplished by a series of maneuvers which have never been fully exposed. In the process, local politicians, bought and paid for, were established in power by their new overlord. The financial by-products of office are great in the Levant and it will be some time, I imagine, before these officials will think it discreet to kick over the traces. If they did, their ability to make trouble in Palestine would be severely restricted by the almost complete collapse of the Levantine armies since the French moved out.

Richard Mowrer, foreign correspondent of the New York Times, in a dispatch to his paper on April 30, 1946, also expressed the belief that if the Arabs revolt the British will be lame.

Ibn Saud Will Not Cancel Oil Concessions

The fear that a settlement in Palestine favorable to the Jews will also jeopardize foreign oil interests seems to be without foundation in so far as Saudi Arabia is concerned.

On March 1, 1947, Clifton Daniel, in a dispatch to the New York Times from Cairo, said:

Ibn Saud is notably content with his arrangement with the American companies and does not care to have any other power put its foot in his door. Ibn Saud also accepts the distinction between the companies and the American government. He does not penalize the Arabian-American Oil Company for the American policy in Palestine, which he abhors.

This was a repetition of a statement made by Ibn Saud on November 28, 1946, when he told a representative of the Arabian-American Oil Company that "rumors that he might withdraw the oil concessions because of American support of the Zionists were 'hot wind.'"

On December 4, 1946, in response to a threat by Jamal Husseini that the oil concessions would be jeopardized, King Ibn Saud said that "he has never even considered selling or even voiding the oil concessions that are being developed in his country by the United States companies."

POSSIBILITIES OF EXPANSION

WOULD a divided Palestine be equal to supplying the needs of present-day European Jewish life? The answer of experts is in the affirmative. Belgium, with an area of only 11,780 square miles, supports a population of 8,159,185. Holland, with an area of 102 square miles, supports a population of 8,061,571. In the United States, Massachusetts, with an area of 8,266 square miles, supports a population of 4,313,000; New Jersey, with an area of 8,224 square miles, 4,193,000. "There be little doubt," said the Anglo-American Committee, "that, given some central direction, more cooperative effort, and a peaceful political administration, Palestine can be made to provide further opportunities for prospective settlement, concurrently with an improvement in the living standard of its present population."

Alfred Nathan, Gasser, and Creamer, in "Palestine: Problem and Promise," estimate that "between 615,000 and 1,125,000 Jews could be admitted to Palestine within the next ten years, provided that a basic political program is enacted, backed up by the moral and material weight of the United Nations. Under such a political program," they say, "Palestine can become a source of self-sustaining livelihood for many more Jews and an outpost of Western culture for the whole of the Middle East without being an outpost of Western imperialism."

100,000 More Immigrants

Dr. Lowdermilk, assistant chief of the Soil Conservation Service of the United States, in his "Land of Promise," goes farther. He proposes the establishment of a Jordan Valley Authority for Palestine and Transjordan. The full utilization of the Jordan Valley depression and adjoining drainage areas for reclamation and power would, in his judgment, "provide farms, industry, and security for at least 4,000,000 Jewish refugees from Europe, in addition to the 1,800,000 Arabs and Jews already in Palestine and Transjordan." Pointing out that Palestine has two primary needs, water and power, Dr. Lowdermilk says that the River Jordan could irrigate 300,000 acres and develop power facilities having a minimum capacity of from 76,000 to 110,000 kilowatts, with an installed capacity of twice these amounts. Additional power generated in connection with other projected irrigation schemes would bring the total to 150,000 kilowatts. This capacity, he says, "would be sufficient to serve the needs of well over 1,000,000 additional population."

In such a development Dr. Lowdermilk sees great benefits to the Arabs of both Transjordan and Palestine. Recalling that Transjordan was once one of the granaries of Rome, he points to the fact that today 80 per cent of the country is desert or semi-arid. He believes that under the JVA 200,000 acres of Transjordan could be irrigated, with an estimated increase of at least 50 per cent in agricultural production.

Dr. Lowdermilk proposed that the JVA should be financed jointly by the United Nations and public Jewish organizations, as well as by private capital, and should be administered under a quasi-public authority. He expresses complete confidence in the ultimate ability of the project to pay for itself.

Why They Read "The Nation"!

Chester Bowles

"Too often these days we read a great many facts without necessarily getting at the truth. The Nation, I have found, can usually be relied on to give its readers the truth as well as the facts about world events."

Raymond Swing

"I can think of no single periodical in the United States whose continued existence is of more importance to American democracy than The Nation."

Joseph E. Davies

"The Nation adheres to a policy of enlightenment and liberal service in the public interest, in an effort to promote a wider knowledge and more intelligent understanding of the facts motivating present events in the world, the outcome of which is so vital to us all."

Clifton Fadiman

"To every American who treasures, particularly in these trying times, our national ideals of justice, decency, and democracy, The Nation continues to be both a necessity and a stimulus."

The Shape of Things

AS THE TRIAL OF THIRTY-ONE WHITE MEN for the lynching of a Negro enters its second and probably final week in the crowded courtroom of Greenville, South Carolina, it has become evident that one Southern state is determined to end an evil tradition. Veteran trial reporters who came expecting the customary "show" have witnessed a judicial process of which any state might be proud. Thirty-seven-year-old Judge Robert J. Martin, Jr., and the prosecuting and defense attorneys have rigorously observed the rules of court procedure. There has been no disorder, little flamboyant oratory. The case against thirty-one men, twenty-six of whom admitted being members of a lynch party, has been energetically pressed. Since Willie Earle, accused of the fatal stabbing of a Yellow Cab driver last February, was taken from the Pickens County jail, mutilated, and shot to death, events have moved fast. From the beginning, the newspapers demanded action. Governor J. Strom Thurmond assigned as special prosecutor the brilliant solicitor Sam R. Watt, who last year secured the conviction of 471 of the 473 persons he brought to trial. The jury's verdict will likely be handed down this week. It is perhaps too much to expect that inveterate custom will be overturned and white men will be sentenced for a Negro's murder. The jury, faced with the extraordinary circumstance of thirty-one defendants, may return verdicts of varying degrees of severity. But whatever the outcome, the fact stands that the governor, the courts, and the responsible white citizens of South Carolina have made a bold attempt at a new definition of Southern justice.

IN THE CHOICE OF NITTI AS ITALIAN PREMIER two considerations surely played a part—his mastery of economic questions and the insignificance of his party. At a moment when the lira is selling on the black market at 900 to the dollar and when many conflicting interests delay the general progress of reconstruction, the presence at the head of the Cabinet of a financial authority like Nitti might have an excellent effect. In Parliament he leads a small group, the National Democratic Union, made up of proved anti-fascists like himself but with no chance of developing into a major national party. It is an ideal position from which to preside over a coalition, and a coalition in which three almost equally strong parties—Communists, Christian Democrats and Socialists—must be included. The general elections are scheduled for October, and for months past Italy has been in a state of political tension. De Gasperi came back from the United States with greatly increased personal prestige, but his tactics after his return succeeded only in convincing the left that he was using his augmented power as Premier to escape an almost certain electoral defeat. Nitti, as leader of a small party, will not provoke the same sort of suspicion. As this is written, the composition of his Cabinet is still undecided. It seems certain that he will have to reduce the representation of Communists and Socialists to include Pacciardi's Republicans, Saragat's dissident Socialists, and the remnant of the Action Party. But the diminution of left strength will be partly offset by the exchange of premiers. On social issues Nitti is far more progressive than De Gasperi, who is considered too close to the Vatican. Besides which, Nitti's old, deep-rooted anti-clericalism will facilitate his relations with the other left parties upon which he must finally depend.

CONTRARY TO EXPECTATIONS AND AGAINST the advice of Secretary of Labor Schwollenbach, President Truman has signed H. R. 2157—the bill outlawing all pending portal-to-portal suits except those based on activities compensable by contract or custom. Thus Mr. Truman has associated himself with a piece of class legislation of doubtful constitutionality. For this is a measure which retroactively prevents the courts from passing on the validity of claims to unpaid wages—that is, claims to a particular kind of property. Imagine the same principle applied to claims for corporation tax refunds, based on an interpretation of the law which the courts had upheld! No doubt many of the portal-to-portal suits filed would eventually have been thrown out of court: some, in fact have already been withdrawn following the decision of Judge Picard in the Mt. Clemens Pottery case that claims for as much as fourteen minutes unpaid time per day were too trifling to warrant court interference. But this new act condemns good and bad claims alike. Moreover it goes beyond the portal-to-portal issue by making it easier for employers to evade their obligations under the wage-hour law and the two acts which regulate labor standards of government contractors. In future, even though claims made under these acts are found to be valid, courts will be permitted to waive or reduce the now mandatory double-damage provided employers can show "reasonable grounds" for believing that they were not violating the law. Mr. Truman, in his message to Congress, voices doubts about the "possibly ambiguous language" of this section and says he will ask for remedial action if necessary. But does he really expect to get such action from a Congress which has shown that it is interested only in remedies prescribed by the N. A. M.?

THE PRESIDENT MAY HAVE HOPED THAT BY signing the portal-pay bill he would offset the effect of his probable veto of the Taft-Hartley labor bill. He had been warned that if the House-Senate conferees should accept in substance the Senate measure, abandoning the more savage provisions of the House bill, they would put the President in an awkward spot politically. This seems to us a most dubious estimate of the situation. The Taft-Hartley bill is far more drastic than the Case bill which Mr. Truman vetoed last year. The assinine provision that a union may lose its bargaining rights if a single officer is "reasonably" thought to be a Communist opens the way to endless abuse. Exposure of unions to law suits is a threat to their treasuries that is not balanced by any corresponding right on their part to sue an employer for breach of contract. The flat ban on the closed shop is purely punitive. If the President vetoes the bill and the Senate overrides his veto, his political position will be better, not worse, than if he signed it.

SOME DEGREE OF BUSINESS REACTION IS NOW unavoidable, according to the Committee on Economic Stability sponsored by Americans for Democratic Action, but we still have a chance to head off the kind of collapse which occurred at the end of 1920. To this end, the committee, which comprises eleven top New Deal economists headed by Chester Bowles, has put forward a short-range emergency program which could be set into effect within the next sixty days. "The heart of our present danger," it declares, "lies in the lack of balance between wages, prices, and profits" which has developed since stabilization was jettisoned last year. The cost of living has rapidly outstripped the rise in salaries and wages, with the result that income currently being paid out is insufficient to clear the markets of goods being produced. To close the gap the committee proposes an average reduction in prices of 10 per cent—bigger cuts, it suggests, would put in motion a deflationary spiral—through the machinery of a federal price-adjustment board. It also urges the generalization of the 15 cents-an-hour wage increase won by some unions and the raising of the legal minimum wage floor to 65 cents an hour. Other points in its program include an increase unemployment-insurance coverage and payments, extension of rent control, tax reductions designed to swell the purchasing power of the lower brackets, a much enlarged federal-housing program on lines promoting a cut in construction costs, and a great expansion of credit to foreign nations. The whole plan, of which only the bare bones can be outlined here, is moderate and realistic. In an early issue we hope to devote more space to it. Meanwhile we urge our readers to study the report for themselves and to press their Congressmen to do likewise. It can be obtained from Americans for Democratic Action, 1740 K Street N. W., Washington, D. C.

THE SUPREME COURT MADE HISTORY WHEN by seven to two it upheld action taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission to equalize rail freight rates as between the East and the South and West. It was in May, 1945, that the commission at long last heeded pleas against discrimination and ordered a reduction of "class rates" in the South and West by 10 per cent and an increase of the same proportion in "official territory," which covers the area east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio and Potomac. This decision was announced as an interim measure pending the elaboration of a program by the ICC, for "national uniformity in the classification of freight and a greater degree of national uniformity in the class rate structure." The protests of Northern states against the prospective loss of their present advantage in transport costs failed to impress the court. A majority of the justices found that existing discriminatory rates do, in fact, serve as "trade barriers," impeding established industries in the regions where they apply and checking the rise of new ones. It is true that "class rates" apply to only a small proportion of rail traffic but, since they are charged mainly on manufactured goods, they have burdened business in the South and West. Apart from its direct economic effects, condemnation of this particular discrimination has symbolic significance, marking as it does the beginning of the end of internal "colonialism." Next week The Nation will publish a fuller discussion of the subject by Ellis Arnall, former governor of Georgia.

THE CONNECTICUT STATE SENATE HAS defeated by a voice vote of 23 to 12 a bill permitting physicians to prescribe contraceptive devices for married women—surely a moderate proposal and one which the House of Representatives had the sense and courage to pass by a vote of 180 to 40. The fight against the bill was conducted chiefly by the Catholic church, which held that the measure would weaken public morality. The statute of 1879 which forbids the use of contraceptive devices remains in effect. And it will be just as effective in the future, no doubt, as it has been in the past. The law, as everyone knows, is neither accepted nor enforced. Contraceptive devices are bootlegged in Connecticut, and the statute of 1879 has occasioned many a ribald joke. Is this the sort of public morality of which the church approves?

The Assembly's Decision

THE United Nations passed its first test on the Palestine question with surprisingly high marks. Palestine was lifted from the doorstep of a single state and brought before the world assembly for its judgment. Those most deeply involved in the fate of that strife-torn land—Jews, Arabs, and Great Britain—had a full opportunity to state their case. And the General Assembly, in handling a situation that was keeping the entire Near East in a dangerous state of tension, showed a new maturity. Much credit for its achievement goes to the able chairman, Señor Aranha of Brazil, who presided over the plenary sessions, and perhaps even more to Canada's Lester B. Pearson, who handled the rugged sessions of the Political Committee with wisdom, firmness, and imagination. Both chairmen allowed wide freedom of discussion but never lost sight of the prime task for which the Assembly was called—the appointment of a commission of investigation and the assignment of its duties. The final vote showed for the first time since the end of the war that an international body can reach a solid moral judgment when kept clear of the entanglements of big-power dissension.

The course of the three weeks' debate revealed the strength of a moderately stated case. At the outset, all the advantage seemed to be on the side of the five Arab states, which presented with all the eloquence at their command the argument for an independent Arab Palestine. But they overplayed their hand, and the extremism and threats of open war that came increasingly into their arguments swung the majority of member states against them. In contrast, the representatives of the Jewish Agency, Messrs. Silver, Shertok and Ben-Gurion, showed restraint and reason and a willingness to accept the findings of the United Nations commission.

One of the most interesting role features of the whole session was the subordinate play played by the big powers. Such states as Poland, Norway, Czechoslovakia, South Africa, Australia, Guatemala, Colombia, Chile, and Panama carried the fight to a clear-cut conclusion. It was clearly to Britain's advantage to say little. Its presentation of the Palestine problem to the United Nations was a tacit confession of failure to discharge its mandate. It became clear that Britain was prepared to accept the United Nations findings provided they were supported by United Nations authority. Cadogan's speeches were few, brief, and almost always to a procedural point.

The Soviet Union throughout most of the discussion seemed to be taking a moderately pro-Arab position in supporting immediate Palestinian independence. But it favored hearing the Jewish Agency and was quite willing to have the case of immigration and the Jewish refugees in the D. P. camps considered as an integral part of the Palestine problem. Mr. Gromyko's most dramatic intervention, however, came in the closing hours of the plenary session when he outlined the kind of solution his government would favor. The most satisfactory settlement would, in his opinion, be a bi-national state in which the rights of both Jewish and Arab communities were guaranteed. But if existing tensions made such a scheme unworkable, then the Soviet Union would favor a partition plan setting up a Jewish and an Arab state.

Over against such a bold stand, the United States delegation's role appeared both negative and picayune. Senator Austin opposed, on procedural grounds, the demands of the Arab states for an independent Palestine. However, in a particularly weasel-worded amendment he made an attempt to steer the investigating committee toward some kind of independent-Palestine solution. This was properly voted down. For the rest, he seemed content to insist upon a small-nation rather than a big-power commission and managed to get his seven candidates designated in a block to the eleven-man investigating commission. Those who sat through the long session at Lake Success and Flushing listened in vain for a restatement of the American stand on a National Home for the Jews, a stand taken by every American President since the Balfour Declaration was enunciated. They listened in vain for a reiteration of President Truman's demand that 100,000 Jewish refugees now in D. P. camps be allowed to make a new home in Palestine. They listened in vain for a slight whisper that the United States was prepared to take moral leadership in an issue that pressed so sharply on the conscience of the world.

The commission of investigation now sets about its task. Its terms of reference are broad. It is obligated to examine fully every aspect of the Palestine problem. And it is charged with working out the intricate and thorny details of a plan for Palestine that will satisfy the just claims of all the Palestinian peoples. It will help rather than hinder the work of the commission if the United States government now states with a clarity equal to that of the Russians what it believes to be essential to a just Palestine settlement. The Russian stand gives the committee hope that a settlement may be arrived at that will not be upset by big-power dissension. But the ultimate authority behind any settlement must be the authority of the United Nations, and of all the member states none must be prepared to accept as much responsibility as the United States. The time has come, therefore, for the United States to declare itself.

Federal Aid and Catholic Schools

SO FAR has the American school system deteriorated that the most ardent champions of states' rights, and the most penny-pinching legislators, now see federal aid as the only solution. The shocking figures are well known: more than five million children between the ages of seven and seventeen—one child out of every six in the country—either deprived of schooling entirely or subjected to part-time, substandard instruction at the hands of unqualified teachers; three million illiterate adults; six thousand schools closed down for lack of instructors; and 50 per cent of our antiquated school buildings in need of replacement. With financing left entirely to state and local communities, we have been spending a third as much for our schools as we spend for recreation, smoking, liquor, and cosmetics. As a people we spend three billion dollars on education and scatter five billion on horses at the track.

Apart from the emergency appeal, an unanswerable argument can be made for federal aid in principle. Dr. James B. Conant, president of Harvard University, putting the case simply, says: (1) All school children are future citizens and voters, and their conduct as such will determine the kind of nation we are to live in; and (2) we are a mobile people, our towns crowded with citizens born and raised elsewhere. There is certainly as much reason for New Yorkers to contribute to the education of a Kentuckian who will spend his adult life in Manhattan as to that of a Brooklynite who will one day make his home in California.

There is nothing new about these arguments or about the dire need of the schools for more money, and bills calling for federal aid have been introduced in Congress with monotonous regularity for years. States' rights fanatics could not have blocked them, any more than they prevented legislation for social security, a wage-hour law, or the National Youth Act. What has blocked every attempt to provide federal aid for the public schools of this country—it had better be said bluntly—is the power of the Catholic church.

The issue is simple. In a letter addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Education in 1943, the National Catholic Welfare Conference warned: "The Catholic position is one of opposition to any measure for federal aid to education that would: . . . (b) fail to make mandatory the inclusion of Catholic schools in its benefits."

We consider this approach a clear violation of the spirit—and of the letter—of the constitutional provision that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Archbishop Cushing of Boston says that no objections to state provision of buses for parochial school children "or any other democratic aids to education, no phony plea of conflict between church and state . . . must be permitted to obscure the sovereign right of the parent to choose the teachers of his children." That right, speaking of "phony pleas," is not challenged by anyone. It is guaranteed by the same Constitution that forbids the state to finance a parent's preference for private rather than public instruction.

Feeling for the tradition of complete separation of church and state, as old as the Republic, is still strong—witness attacks on the Catholic position at the recent session of the Methodist Council of Bishops, the Southern Baptist Convention, and the seventy-third convention of the American Association of School Administrators. But against it is the desperate need for federal funds. Many educators, convinced that no help will be forthcoming from Washington unless the parochial schools get a cut, have been willing to make concessions, and the two principal bills now before the Senate reflect this spirit of resignation.

Of the two measures, the one sponsored by Senator Taft is considerably less dangerous on this issue than that of the more liberal Senator Aiken. The Taft bill, backed by the National Education Association, would direct each state to spend proportionally as much of its federal grant on parochial schools as it now spends for this purpose out of its own funds. Since sixteen states at present make some allowance for parochial schools, thirty-two would be unaffected by the provision. The Aiken bill, on the other hand, would allow a fixed proportion of federal money to be given to non-public schools in all forty-eight states. In every other respect it is a better measure than Taft's, entailing far larger appropriations. It is supported by Senate liberals like Murray and Morse, who rightly regard as "niggardly" a bill whose sponsor himself calls it only a "humble beginning." Nevertheless, we hope the Senate will choose the Taft bill, raising its amounts, rather than accept the Aiken bill and its dangerous precedent.

The Vermont Senator seems to us much too cavalier in dismissing so fundamental a tenet of the American faith as the separation of church and state—an argument, he says, that "falls down when under the G. I. Bill of Rights the United States is paying today to educate priests, Protestant ministers, and rabbis." There is a difference between the government's giving a sum of money to an individual for an education of his choice and granting a fixed and permanent proportion of taxpayers' money to religious institutions. The first is legitimate aid to a deserving individual; the second, a systematic undermining of the public-school system.

Salonika, May 5

AT THE height of the December, 1944, "outbreak" in Athens, the British Foreign Office rushed that excellent Beaverbrook cartoonist Osbert Lancaster to Greece in an attempt to "correct the erroneous interpretations" being made by two-thirds of the American and British correspondents who were covering the tragic events. Thereafter Lancaster sat in on the daily press conferences held by Lieutenant-Colonel Anthony Rouse of the British Headquarters Intelligence Section and gave his interpretation of the political news.

One morning in late December Lancaster announced that several hundred Bulgarians had crossed the border to help the Greek leftists. When he refused to divulge his source or to elaborate on the report, correspondents turned to Rouse, who, obviously embarrassed, declined to confirm, deny, or discuss Lancaster's statement. It was, of course, pure fabrication and entirely in keeping with the Foreign Office's frantic efforts to smear the Greek left and the resistance movement. The report, however, opened old wounds, and after its publication the walls of Balkan nationalism began to be built up again.

Almost a year earlier, when the Foreign Office realized that post-war Greece might have a leftist government oriented toward the Soviet Union instead of a royalist right-wing government oriented toward Great Britain, it had started playing on the old slavophobia of the Greek people. This line, cleverly upheld by Foreign Office diplomats in Egypt and its agents in Greece, coincided with the anti-Slav propaganda spread by the Nazis in Greece. The British line also encouraged the Greek quislings to pretend that they were collaborating with the Germans and organizing armed anti-resistance forces only because it was necessary to prepare a bridgehead for the British when they came to liberate Greece from the "Slav-loving" Communists.

This was very effective propaganda in Greece, and two new words were added to the Greek language, Eamobulgar and Eamoslav. Every member of E. A. M. (the resistance organization) was called either a Bulgarian or a Slav-lover and was accused of wanting to give Macedonia and Thrace to the "barbarians in the north," who now were not only Slavs but Communists, too. The charges were plausible because the Greek Communist Party had advocated "an autonomous Macedonia and Thrace" at a time when "autonomy" plainly meant the incorporation of Greek Macedonia and Greek Thrace in Bulgaria.

THE COMMUNIST ATTITUDE

In May, 1922, at a meeting of the leading members of the Bulgarian, Greek, and Yugoslav Communist parties held in Sofia, the Bulgarian party wanted the "autonomy" of Macedonia (Greek and Yugoslav) and Thrace placed at the top of the agenda, arguing that if the 50,000 Bulgarian refugees leaving those territories in the exchange of populations were given some hope of getting their lands back, they would join the Bulgarian Communist Party instead of the terroristic, reactionary I. M. R. O. (Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization). The suggestion was opposed by the Greek and Yugoslav delegations, and the matter was dropped. At the fifth congress of the Third International in Moscow George Dimitrov and Vasil Kolarov again raised the question, and the Greek and Yugoslav delegations again opposed it. They argued that it was intended to serve only the questionable purpose of the Bulgarian party, which at that time was the strongest in the Balkans, that it would ruin the growing Greek and Yugoslav parties, and that instead of using a nationalistic slogan the congress should call for a Socialist federation of Balkan states. Dimitrov and Kolarov prevailed, however. The Yugoslav delegation withdrew from the congress, but the disciplined Greek party accepted the new policy and worked for it for a few years.

When the Communist Party was outlawed in Bulgaria, the cry for Thracian and Macedonian autonomy died out. After 1931 the Comintern seemed to forget about it, and the Greek party followed suit. But the bitter taste was still there, and Communist activities were hampered. At a meeting of the Central Committee in June, 1935, the Greek Communist Party went on record as abandoning the old goal and standing for the inviolability of Greek boundaries, making the excuse that the "ethnological composition" of Macedonia and Thrace had changed. The sixth congress of the party, held in December of the same year, indorsed the Central Committee's decision, and the Communists have not sounded the autonomy slogan since that time.

In 1943 the E. A. M.'s guerrilla army, the E. L. A. S., rejected a proposal of the Yugoslav partisans that they enter Greek territory and organize the Slav minority there into a resistance movement under Tito's control. In October, 1944, the E. L. A. S. attacked, disbanded, and drove over the Yugoslav frontier one of its own battalions (belonging to the 28th Regiment of the 9th E. L. A. S. Division), made up largely of Slavs from Greek Macedonia, which had come out openly for autonomy during the withdrawal of the Germans.

The British were aware of these actions but preferred to ignore them—as they ignored the fact that in the period between the withdrawal of the Germans from Greek Macedonia in October, 1944, and the arrival of British and regular Greek troops in March, 1945, the E. A. M. prohibited all autonomist demonstrations, and the E. L. A. S. put down by force such armed autonomist elements as still attempted to operate.

And so, in December, 1944, E. L. A. S. prisoners were killed in Athens, a block away from British headquarters, because the small royalist mobs had been inflamed to the point where they actually believed that every E. L. A. S. fighter was pro-Slav and a traitor. Just as every Greek in the resistance movement was called a "Bulgarian" and "Slav-lover," every Slav in Greek Macedonia was called a "Communist." And when the carefully screened Greek troops entered the area, the Slavs suffered doubly, first for being Slavs, and secondly for being Communists.

WHAT MAKES A GUERRILLA?

The population of Greek Macedonia is now more than 90 per cent Greek. The handful of Slavs there, roughly seventy-five to eighty thousand, consists of those who elected to remain when the exchange of populations was made after the First World War.

Between 1918 and 1936, according to the testimony of Slav witnesses before the United Nations Commission of Inquiry, the Slavs in Greek Macedonia were treated "even better than the Greek refugees from Turkey." But when the King George-Metaxas dictatorship was established in 1936, the Slav minority was looked upon as second-class citizens and placed under various legal handicaps. It became a legal offense to use the Macedonian Slavonic language in public: witnesses before the U. N. Commission told of old women being beaten and jailed for asking the price of potatoes in the only language they knew.

After the war, the occupation, the liberation, and control by the E. A. M., royalist-rightist control was finally established and the persecution started all over again.

Pericles Eliadou, member of Parliament from the Florina-Kastoria district, which has the largest concentration of Slavs in Greece, writing in the royalist Athens daily, Ethnikos Kyrix, of March 30, called for the forced removal of all "this refuse" from Greece.

When automobile trouble forced a subcommittee of the U. N. Commission to make an unscheduled stop at the Greek Macedonian town of Verga on March 13, Slav villagers gathered around the beaming Mr. Eliadou—who had hopped on the subcommittee's motor convey just as local politicians in the United States climb aboard the Presidential special to prove to the voters that they have the official blessing—and told him they were fed up. "You have cut off our UNRRA supplies since September," one of them said. "We worked fifty days clearing the snow from roads and you haven't paid us. We have no rights; we have no justice. If these conditions continue, we too will go to the mountains."

Only a small percentage of these Greek Slavs want an autonomous Macedonia—as yet. But the number of eager Slav peasants and mountaineers who crowded around the young Yugoslav liaison officer with the subcommittee to ask about the "new" Yugoslavia and to pour out their bitter stories of persecution should have served as a warning to the Greeks. A real movement for autonomy within the Yugoslav federation will grow with very little outside prodding when the Slavs on the Greek side, continuing to live in squalor and fear, begin to envy life across the frontier, where houses are being rebuilt, and there are new state tractor stations, and those who work can at least eat.

The government in Athens is not intelligent enough or unselfish enough to see this. When it was suddenly frightened by the strength and fervor of the new guerrilla forces in the mountains, it decided to camouflage its own deficiencies by accusing its northern neighbors of organizing internal revolt for the purpose of tearing Macedonia and Thrace away from Greece; at the same time it tightened the screws on the Slav minority.

The Athens liberal center daily, Ta Nea, correctly placed the responsibility for the existence of the new guerrilla movement when it said recently in an editorial: "The Vice-President and leader of the present government, Constantine Tsaldaris, and his colleagues, with their moronic policy, have been the best recruiting officers for the guerrillas. Unquestionably Tsaldaris has sent more men to the mountains than were sent from Yugoslavia. They are those who were beaten, those who were persecuted by state and quasi-state agencies, those who were dismissed without cause from their jobs. They are the farmers to whom the rightist local authorities would not give seeds to sow their fields; they are the men who were in the resistance movement and cannot return to their homes."

ROLE OF BULGARIA AND YUGOSLAVIA

The new Greek guerrillas are carrying on a bitter, bloody, and just struggle against persecution, exploitation, and open fascist terror. But their cause is being hurt by the obscure and ambiguous attitude of the Bulgars and Yugoslavs, whom the Greek government accuses of instigating and supporting the guerrilla warfare.

Dimitrov and Kolarov are now in the driver's seat in Bulgaria. They no longer need the chauvinist slogans they once used to bring them to power, but they still mumble about "an outlet to the Aegean." In Yugoslavia the Macedonian Communist Dimitar Vlahov, who in 1924 split the I. M. R. O. and headed a faction that worked for a truly autonomous Macedonia within a Balkan federation, is now high in Tito's councils and is reported to be scheming again for "Macedonia for the Macedonians," this time as a federated state within Yugoslavia. The old idea of incorporating both Greek and Yugoslav Macedonia in Bulgaria has given way to the idea of bringing the entire region into Yugoslavia. By declining to declare frankly and clearly that they have no territorial claims against Greece, the Communist governments of Bulgaria and Yugoslavia make it easy for the Anglo-American bloc on the U. N. Commission to maintain that Greece's internal situation is mainly due to external factors.

Yugoslavia naturally granted refuge to E. L. A. S. refugees. Just as naturally, it urged many of those who were still in Yugoslavia when the new guerrilla army sprang up to return to Greece. Bulgaria naturally allowed the new guerrillas to cross its frontiers when they were pursued by the Greek army or gendarmerie.

Bulgarian and Yugoslav aspirations to expand southward have their source in old nationalist ambitions, ideological arrogance, and big-power politics. Neither government is sure about the Greeks. Tito and Dimitrov may think they can bully Zachariades into some kind of "autonomy" agreement, but they have a feeling that all Greeks, Communists and non-Communists, would unite to prevent its fulfilment. The Yugoslavs know that the new Greek guerrillas, like the old, are executing the "autonomist" agents who cross the border to take advantage of the unsettled conditions in Greece. That is why the Yugoslavs are not sending arms into Greece.

Little of all this was taken into consideration by the U. N. Commission. Nearly all its members had made up their minds before they arrived in Greece. The Anglo-Americans were determined to prove that the whole Greek guerrilla movement was inspired, directed, and armed by Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. The Russian bloc was equally determined to prove that it was strictly an inside job, and that the Yugoslavs and Bulgarians were blameless. Too often the Anglo-Americans and their satellites, insisting that the commission's terms of reference called only for an investigation of frontier incidents, deliberately choked off witnesses who were explaining why they took to the mountains. On the other hand, when Greek Slavs called by the Yugoslav liaison officers firmly declared that they were opposed to autonomy, the Yugoslavs closed the subject. Further questioning would have revealed that class as well as minority persecution was driving the Slavs in Greek Macedonia to the mountains.

The Greek government presented a miserable case. It failed to prove any of its charges conclusively. Most of its exhibits were crude forgeries. Its witnesses were prisoners under sentence of death, adventurers, criminals or men who were black marketeers during the occupation; one of them was a man who had deserted from the army during the Greek-Italian war in 1940-41.

MYOPIA OF THE U. N. COMMISSION

The commission did not study the Greeks' bizarre dream of a revival of their ancient glory, of a Greater Greece. It did not see the maps of the royalist right wing picturing a Greece which included half of Bulgaria, half of Albania, a good chunk of Yugoslavia, all of Turkish Thrace, Constantinople, and Asia Minor. It did not take note of the irredentist military league (the R. A. N.) which was organized in Athens during the German occupation by the Greek army's present chief of staff; or of the provocations suffered by Bulgaria in 1945, when Greek government leaders and the Greek press called for an immediate invasion of Bulgaria with the avowed aim of occupying the whole country and "setting the torch to Sofia." It paid little attention to the well-documented case against the Albanian quislings who fled to Greece after the German withdrawal and then returned to Albania in August, 1946, with weapons provided by the Greek army, to carry on underground activity against the government. It did not inquire as to the whereabouts and present activities of the Bulgarian war criminals whom E. L. A. S. had captured and turned over to the Greek government two years ago. It did not see the Chetnik officers who moved freely around Athens, in regular contact with the Greek general staff and the American military attaché's office.

The commission was too sunk in wishful thinking and self-deception to search earnestly for the truth. Its "terms of reference" barred from its consideration the studies of experts which show that the economy of northern Greece will collapse unless healthy trade relations with Bulgaria and Yugoslavia are established.

The commission watched the organized demonstrations of the Greek government, in which little children carried posters with nationalist and expansionist slogans written in English and French, but as their cars passed quickly through destroyed villages, they paid little heed to the ragged Greeks who flung themselves toward the cars and shouted, "We want peace."

The Tacoma Agreement

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, May 20

THE action of the House Appropriations Committee in slashing the budget of the Department of the Interior—going so far as to cut the Bureau of Reclamation 58 per cent—has thrown Western Republicans into a state of panic. They know that unless the cuts are restored, the Democrats stand a good chance of recovering a number of the Congressional seats they lost in 1946. Apparently the Eastern wing of the Republican Party intends to sacrifice the political interests of the Western wing in an effort to win the Eastern states' large blocks of electoral votes. Once the Western Republicans might have acquiesced in such a scheme, but now their principal supporters have been compelled to line up with the proponents of large-scale reclamation and power projects in the West.

This new orientation of Western Republicans, which moves Governor Earl Warren of California to support Secretary Krug's budgetary requests for the Central Valley project, is exemplified in an agreement signed at Tacoma, Washington, on January 22, 1947, by the Washington Water Power Company, the Portland General Electric Company, the Pacific Power and Light Company, the Northwestern Electric Company, the Puget Sound Power and Light Company, and the municipally owned utility systems of Seattle and Tacoma. The agreement clearly recognizes that continued public-power development is essential to the expansion of industry in the Northwest. It declares that the federal government must furnish 318,000 kilowatts of new generating capacity between now and November 1, 1949, "to meet the present critical power-supply problem," and 1,565,000 kilowatts more by November 1, 1953. The signatories urged the government to make the necessary appropriations, including those for backbone transmission facilities, as rapidly as possible. A few years ago one would have been thought mildly balmy for suggesting that Kinsey Robinson, the adroit generalissimo of the private-utility interests in the Northwest, would ever join with municipal systems in memorializing Congress to increase its appropriations for the Bonneville Power Administration. But the signature of Mr. Robinson as president of the Washington Water Power Company is the first on the Tacoma agreement. General recognition by private-utility executives of the absolute necessity for further power development puts Western Republicans in a bad spot.

As early as May 2, 1946, Dr. Paul J. Raver, astute administrator of the Bonneville project, warned the private power interests of an imminent power famine in the Northwest, but they paid no heed. In fact, Kinsey Robinson testified before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations in March, 1946, that the Bonneville Power Administration had "a tremendous power surplus." Today, one year later, the Bonneville Administration cannot meet the demands of industry for power, and no substantial relief can be expected until 1952—and then only if the recent budget cuts are restored.

How does it happen that a power famine of this proportion has developed so rapidly in the Northwest? The chief reason is that the end of the war did not bring the expected cancellations of orders for power. Even the Bonneville Power Administration was caught somewhat off guard. As a result of the partial break-up of the monopoly position of the Aluminum Company of America, Reynolds and Kaiser in one year have required power in amounts that Bonneville expected would remain unused for perhaps three years. The availability of cheap power has also greatly stimulated its use in rural areas and for domestic purposes. A year or so ago, when I was in the Northwest, the Bonneville officials were dreaming up all sorts of new uses for power—for heating houses, running railroad trains, and so on. Today the use of electric power for house-heating has been pushed far into the future, for Bonneville cannot supply the prime industrial requirements of the region. Moreover, new industrial "loads" are clearly foreseen—the supersonic load, the electrolytic load, the chemical load, and the load of the new phosphate development in southern Idaho. Recently the Alcoa Mining Company announced its discovery of important deposits of laterite, a ferruginous bauxite, that will make possible a vastly expanded aluminum industry in the Northwest.

The same need for public power affects local politics on the West Coast. After the defeat in Washington of Initiative No. 166, which sought to hamstring the public-utility districts of the state, the private-utility interests tried to push a similar measure through the Washington legislature, which for the first time in years is controlled by the Republicans, but this tactic also failed. Oregon is not so strongly for public ownership as Washington, but support for public power is developing rapidly in many areas.

All of this does not mean that Western private-utility interests have capitulated. Having failed to obtain the privilege of buying power from government projects at the dam sites, they now seek to control feeder transmission lines and connecting systems. The Tacoma agreement, for example, urges appropriations for "backbone transmission facilities," that is, for the large transmission lines from the dams to the local centers. In his appearances before the Committee on Appropriations Mr. Robinson has made it clear that the private utility companies seek to control the transmission and distribution of power once it has reached the load centers. While these interests will not be displeased if their Eastern colleagues succeed in pushing through measures designed to force federal agencies to sell power at the dam sites, they know they must get more power some way, or else, in the near future, they will be unable to supply markets which they have long controlled.

Governor Warren's recent appearance before a House committee to urge appropriations for the Central Valley project and for the construction of transmission lines brought out clearly the new point of view of an important section of Western industry and business. The change does not, of course, imply conversion or consciousness of sin, but it reveals a new and realistic appreciation that public power has become indispensable to the industrialization of the West. For industry to expand in the Northwest, the supply of energy must be consistently developed in anticipation of demand. New sources of energy must therefore be planned years ahead of immediate needs. From the time an appropriation is first obtained, it takes at least five years to build a new dam and to instal generators. Today it is apparent that by 1955 the Northwest will require two and one-half times the present available supply of power. This means that plans for additional power installations at Grand Coulee, at Hungry Horse, at McNary, Foster Creek, and Snake River must go through on schedule, with no interruptions or delays. In view of the peculiar dynamics of Western industry, the cuts that have been made in the budget for the Department of the Interior are nothing short of calamitous and may, as Secretary Krug has warned, bring on a major depression.

At a recent meeting in Seattle a spokesman for the Republican Party in eastern Washington warned his audience that "what happens to reclamation is the biggest single issue on our side of the Cascades. If Republicans recognize the problems peculiar to our area, our fortunes will rise; if not, they will fall." The bigwigs of the Republican Party had better heed this warning if they expect to retain in 1948 the gains scored in the West in 1946.

"The American Question"

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, May 15

THIS first fortnight of May was Moscow's festive season: May Day was celebrated for three days, and Victory Over Germany Day for two—nobody makes much song and dance about the victory over Japan. With the trees bursting into leaf almost overnight and the people changing from drab winter clothes to bright new summer garb, the general mood has suddenly improved. Everybody is planning vacations, or excursions down the Moscow-Volga Canal, where the pleasure steamers have started running.

The sufferings of the war years and the thrill of the victory over Germany still make a strong emotional appeal. On the night of May 9 a million people must have gathered in and around the Red Square to see the illuminations and hear the victory salutes—a much larger crowd than gathered there on May Day. Russia is faced with immense reconstruction difficulties, which are not underrated, but these holiday crowds in Moscow seemed to have confidence in the future as far as the country's internal progress is concerned. The government and the party have used every conceivable means to get the largest possible harvest this year; economically as well as politically this is a matter of the utmost importance. The snow was heavy all winter. In the south April was mild and rainy, and the old people in the villages say that it will be a good summer for crops. In anticipation of the harvest, bread, potatoes, and other commodities went down some 20 per cent in the open market in the past month. Consumer goods are in much greater supply, and ration stores have plenty of inexpensive cotton fabrics for summer wear. There are also more shoes, stockings, and household goods. Altogether there is a general feeling that with respect to consumer goods and food Russia's difficulties will soon be over. Housing is another matter; in war-damaged cities and large centers like Moscow the housing shortage will remain acute.

Much less reassuring is the international outlook, and the ignorant old women are already saying that Hitler is in America and is plotting against the Soviet Union with his American cronies. Awareness of "American imperialism" has spread through every layer of the Russian people. It is significant that of the hundreds of plays written since last autumn in conformity with the Central Committee's instructions, the play picked for production in more than 600 theaters throughout the country should have been Konstantin Simonov's "Russian Question," which shows the struggle of a "good American" against the "bad Americans" who are plotting a new war against the Soviet Union.

Obviously it is considered vitally important to make everybody extremely conscious of the "American question." As it is seen here, America is trying to infringe on the Soviet Union's lawful rights; in many places it is rearing dangerous spearheads against the Soviet Union. I have not the space to enumerate all the media by which "American imperialism" is denounced. I have already mentioned the theater; incidentally, Simonov's play is being played not only in the Soviet Union but also in the Russian sector of Berlin, at the Max Reinhardt Theater—the American authorities are reported to have tried in vain to sabotage the production. The satirical journal Krokodil is now devoting much of its space to "American imperialism" and the weaknesses of "American democracy," of which the treatment of Negroes is called only one instance. There is anger over the Voice of America broadcasts—much greater anger than over the BBC's Russian broadcasts.

In hundreds of cinemas next week a new documentary in North Korea will be presented. Its dominant theme is that the Russians have a capacity for dealing with Asiatic peoples shown by no one else, least of all the Americans. Russians feel no racial superiority toward yellow, brown, or black people but are "like brothers to them." A people's government has been set up in North Korea. Land tenure has been reformed. Hundreds of schools are being opened for children and a thousand schools for adults, "to liquidate illiteracy." According to the film, "with an eight-hour day the Koreans are producing more than they did with a sixteen-hour day under the Japanese system of sweated labor." In the higher grades Koreans are now taught Russian, and we see a pretty little Korean girl writing the word "Stalin" on the blackboard. The film then demonstrates how this happy land of progress ("rice is more plentiful in North Korea than ever before") contrasts with South Korea. There one finds no land reform, no nationalization of industries, no eight-hour day. The country is run as it was under the Japanese by a "reactionary clique" with American protection. The South Korean sequences are shown to the accompaniment of gloomy funereal music. In South Korea the people are still nothing but coolies; in North Korea they are self-respecting citizens. Throughout the film runs the theme: the Thirty-eighth Parallel dividing North from South Korea is the dividing line between two worlds.

The statements by Marshall and Dulles and by Bevin are considered the most significant events since the conference. Dulles was perhaps more outspoken than Marshall, though little difference is found between their viewpoints. Bevin tried to argue that the conference was a step in the right direction, in the direction of compromise, but Dulles said, "Convictions are more important than compromises." In other words, two wills and two systems are facing each other in Europe—the Soviet will and the American will—and one must prove stronger than the other.

Typical, perhaps, was the Austrian reaction: One prominent Austrian who had come here for the conference wrung his hands and said, "The one thing we all prayed would not happen has happened: Austria has become the bone of contention between the great powers, between the United States and the Soviet Union. The chances of the occupation troops getting out are much worse now. A clash of wills can get us nowhere. Only a compromise can save us, and here is Dulles saying that European nations are more interested in convictions than in compromises. Jesus Maria! Austria is not interested in convictions. We want a quiet life. Can nothing be done to neutralize us so that we can live quietly like Switzerland?"

Bevin, on the other hand, no doubt with some domestic considerations in mind, was remarkably conciliatory, even cordial. Standing on the station platform with Vishinsky, he burst into song—"The more we are together the merrier we'll be"—and Vishinsky, grinning broadly, beat time like a bandmaster. In an aside Vishinsky said, "What a jolly, convivial man Minister Bevin is."

Decidedly, a change is in the air. Hardly anything is being said in the Russian press against Britain these days or against the British Empire. On the British policy in Egypt and Palestine the Russians are extremely discreet. Perhaps Bevin has seen the light? Whether he has or not, the Russians have suddenly realized that the Truman policy has become a cause of disquiet to the whole of Europe. A sort of mobilization of popular opinion against "American imperialism" is now beginning, somewhat like the mobilization of popular opinion against Hitler in 1934, only with probably better prospects of success. The Russians are gratified that half the Socialist Party in France wished to side with the Communists. They are gratified to learn that much hard thinking is being done inside the British Labor Party, which is obviously scared by the necessity for a new American loan.

When a member of the British government, Harold Wilson, Secretary of Overseas Trade, came to Moscow to prepare the ground for the Anglo-Soviet trade agreement, he was received with open arms. Mikhoyan personally presided over all nine plenary meetings of the British and Soviet experts and was "always available" during the three weeks Wilson was here. Wilson said before leaving that the Russians had been most friendly and charming and that valuable progress had been made. There will not be extensive Anglo-Soviet trade in the immediate future—there obviously cannot be—but a long view is taken by both sides, and "a very large Anglo-Soviet trade, much larger than before the war, is anticipated." Technical cooperation is being planned to put the Soviet timber industry on the same high level of mechan-zation as the North American timber industry, and Britain will supply a large part of the equipment: that is one of the significant results of the Wilson mission. Before long Russia may have food and tobacco to sell; cotton is already being shipped in substantial quantities. A number of technical and financial difficulties which discouraged some British firms from engaging in trade with Russia were eliminated during the Anglo-Soviet talks.

In short, various new political and economic friends are being acquired and are expected to counteract in some measure the Truman policy. Not every European, or Asiatic, country's political and economic interests coincide with America's, and these divergences are being brought into focus. To counteract by every possible means the conception of a Pax Americana is one of the principal objects of Russian foreign policy today. One cannot help feeling that Washington has made a serious mistake in creating an atmosphere in which such a drive against "American imperialism" has a fair prospect of success.

Terror in Taiwan

BY PEGGY DURDIN

Nanking, China

ON FEBRUARY 27 a policeman of the Taiwan (Formosa) Monopoly Bureau saw a woman selling smuggled cigarettes on the streets of the capital, Taipeh. When he tried to seize her tray and money, she pulled away, and he struck her a crashing blow on the head with his revolver butt. She died at his feet. An angry mob gathered, and the police shot into the crowd, killing one person and wounding others. Forthwith a year and a half of gathering hatred for an inefficient, autocratic, corrupt administration exploded into unarmed demonstrations against the mainland Chinese.

China put down the revolt with brutal repression, terror, and massacre. Mainland soldiers and police first killed thousands indiscriminately; then, more selectively, hunted down and jailed or slaughtered students, intellectuals, prominent business men, and civic leaders. Foreigners estimate that at least five thousand Taiwanese were killed, and executions are still going on.

Governor General Chen Yi has turned a movement against bad government into one against any Chinese government. Nanking has again demonstrated that its chief solution for political and economic crisis is force. In spite of a curtain of censorship and official misrepresentation, the tragic events that took place in Formosa in March are well known here.

The Chinese government owns, controls, and operates—for government profit and personal squeeze—almost the entire economy of Taiwan. One of the articles whose importation and sale are rigidly controlled is tobacco. Many Taiwanese street vendors sell smuggled cigarettes. It was in the course of a campaign against the sale of smuggled goods that the woman was killed in Taipeh.

The rioting which followed was not consciously revolutionary but was against the hated monopoly police, which symbolized for the people the government's exploitation of their island. Unarmed processions marched to the government offices to demand punishment of the policemen, compensation for the dead and wounded, and dismissal of the head of the tobacco monopoly. They beat to death two policemen in front of the tobacco monopoly's office and burned the stocks of tobacco. Police guarding the Governor's office raked the crowd with machine-gun fire without provocation.

Barricaded in its offices, the government lost control of the city. Shops closed. Transportation broke down. Mobs of Taiwanese, still unarmed, beat up a number of mainland Chinese and burned their possessions, though not their homes. Truckloads of police rushed through Taipeh's streets machine-gunning the demonstrators while Governor Chen Yi was busily broadcasting conciliatory promises. During this period not a single foreigner saw an armed Taiwanese.

With calculated trickery Chen Yi continued his efforts to appease the people while he waited for military reinforcements. On March 2, over the radio, he expressed his love for the Taiwanese, and promised that no one would be prosecuted for rioting, that the families of the dead would be compensated, and that he would appoint a committee to settle the incident. This group, composed of mainlanders and representative Taiwanese, most of whom have since been shot, was to be known as the "Committee to Settle the February 28 Incident" and was to present to him by March 10 their suggestions for the reform of the administration.

Though the efforts of the committee Taipeh and the nearby port of Keelung became quiet. Students patrolled the streets, keeping order. Many of these students are now dead.

Meanwhile the spark ignited in Taipeh had spread down the whole length of Taiwan. In the first few days of March the Taiwanese took over the administration of almost every city. As far as can be discovered, they seized control in most instances without the use of firearms. Violence was usually limited to beatings, though some officials were killed.

On March 7 Chen Yi's committee handed in its recommendations. Reasonably enough, they included the following: that Taiwan be given provincial, not colonial, status; that provincial magistrates and city mayors be elected before June; that a larger proportion of Taiwanese be given administrative, police, and judicial posts; that all special police be abolished and no political arrests be permitted; that freedom of press and speech and the right to strike be granted; that managers of all public enterprises be Taiwanese; that committees be elected to supervise these public enterprises and the factories taken over from the Japanese; that the trade and monopoly bureaus be abolished; that the political and economic rights of the aborigines be guaranteed; that Taiwanese be appointed to as many army, navy, and air-force posts in Taiwan as possible; that detained "war criminals" be released (Taiwan was part of the Japanese Empire for fifty-one years); that the central government repay Taiwan for the expropriated sugar and rice; that garrison headquarters be abolished "to avoid misuse of military might." These proposals were not presented as an ultimatum. They were clearly a basis for negotiation. Chen Yi had already agreed to most of the points.

At noon on March 8 the commander of the Fourth Gendarme Regiment told the committee that its demands for political reform were "proper," but asked that it withdraw its demand for the abolition of garrisons. He said, "I will guarantee with my life that the central government will not take military action against Taiwan." At this point, although most of the island was still in the hands of the people, Chen Yi could have reached an agreement with them which would have insured the Nanking government's continued control of Taiwan and the cooperation of the Taiwanese. He only needed to move honestly toward reform. But he had at no time any intention of establishing peace by compromise. This was revolt; he would crush it. He was obliged to temporize and deceive until his troops arrived.

On the afternoon and evening of March 8, without warning or provocation, the streets of Keelung and Taipei were cleared with gunfire to cover the entry of mainland troops. These reinforcements consisted mainly of the Twenty-first Division, a Szechuan outfit with a reputation for brutality. In the next four or five days more than a thousand unarmed Taiwanese in the Taipei-Keelung area alone were massacred. A year and a half earlier many of them had joyously welcomed the arrival of the Chinese troops. Now truckloads of soldiers armed with machine-guns and automatic rifles shot their way through the streets. Soldiers demanded entry into homes, killed the first person who appeared, and looted the premises. Bodies floated thick in Keelung harbor and in the river which flows by Taipei. Twenty young men were castrated, their ears cut off, and their noses slashed. A foreigner watched gendarmes cut off a young boy's hands before bayoneting him because he had not dismounted from his bicycle quickly enough. The radio advised students who had fled from the city to return to their homes, but when they did so they were killed. Any prominent person was in grave danger.

By March 14 the killing had tapered off in Taipei. In other cities the terror followed the same pattern.

While this legalized slaughter was at its height, Chiang Kai-shek told the audience at the weekly memorial service in Nanking that Taiwan would have constitutional rights "at an early date." The recent riots, he revealed reassuringly, were "instigated by Communists." He admonished the erring people of Taiwan to "abide by law and not become an instrument of traitorous cliques."

Terror has won temporarily in Taiwan; the island is sullenly quiet. At this writing Governor Chen Yi has not yet been dismissed, in spite of a resolution passed by the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang several weeks ago.* Chen Yi has important friends. Moreover, to dismiss him promptly would mean loss of face; it is more tactful to let him resign, in good time. A Taiwanese who had spent his adult life in anti-Japanese activity said to me bitterly during the height of the terror, "The Generalissimo won't dismiss Chen Yi now. That would be an admission that he and the government had made mistakes. But hundreds of Taiwanese die every day that Chen Yi saves face."

The Minister of National Defense, Pai Chung-hsi, sent by the Generalissimo to Taiwan to investigate the affair and "comfort" the mainland Chinese, has denied any reprisals against the Taiwanese; the rioters were simply pursued, arrested, and punished. There were no atrocities, he said, giving the lie to foreign eyewitnesses. "Chinese troops have been instructed by the government not to commit any atrocities; so it is not possible for them to commit any atrocities in Formosa or anywhere in China," he explained. While he admitted that there were defects in the Chinese administration of Taiwan, Pai blamed the revolt on Japanese influence and on the Communists. Not a single neutral observer, however, accepts Pai's or the Generalissimo's statement that Communists instigated or directed the riots. None believes that Communists have any influence at present in Taiwan. However, shortly after news of the massacre began to leak through to China, the Yenan radio claimed that hundreds of Taiwan soldiers in Kuomintang armies on the Shantung front were deserting to the Communists. Certainly Chen Yi has followed the procedure most likely to cause the development of a flourishing Communist movement in Taiwan.

A group of Japanese-trained gangsters and ronins undoubtedly participated in the uprising, but they did not start it. Foreign observers in Taipeh state categorically that the sole cause of the revolt was the flagrant misrule of the Chinese mainlanders. The Taiwanese had repeatedly and fruitlessly petitioned for reform. It is not surprising that they finally acted.

Isabelita Has Lost Her Reason

BY KAY BOYLE

Paris, April 30

I DID not reach Spain in time for the anniversary of the Spanish Republic. I crossed the border on the morning of the sixteenth of April, two days too late. The words of commemoration which had been written up on the walls had been effaced long since, for a bare quarter of an hour after they were boldly written there by clandestine hands, I was later told, official hands had wiped them away. It was just after eight o'clock, and there were only two of us crossing that morning—an Englishman and I. The sun was brilliant, and instead of taking a taxi at the frontier, we got into the electric train which runs through the fields and villages to San Sebastian on the Sea. The wind was strong in the port town, and the waves broke high, flinging slaps of water and salty spray as high as the Paseo de la República, and as I walked there with the Englishman I thought of Isabelita. I knew she was in prison and that she had lost her reason, but I did not know any more.

From San Sebastian it is another fourteen hours to Madrid (and as each taxi leaves the North Station of the city, the police record the address to which the passengers have directed it to go). Within an hour I had learned from Spanish friends that there had been, about three weeks before, a new round-up of professional people and intellectuals. As usual, it had all been done very quietly, no word of it appearing in the press. Enrique Díaz, a former professor of the French Lycée of Madrid, had been picked up at his house, and his notebooks, containing the names and addresses of friends, had led to the arrest of others. (The husband of my friend, J—, had been taken, and now she had destroyed not only all personal letters and the address books she had kept over a period of years but also every doctor's prescription, every wedding announcement, and any other piece of paper which might bear an innocent name or address.) Still others had been rounded up wholesale in a café—as were Frenchmen in the days of the occupation—and even the bootblacks who happened to be shining shoes there at the moment had been taken along to jail as political offenders.

Another recent arrest had caused a great deal of surreptitious talk, J— said. Although the identity of the prisoner had not been divulged, rumor had it that he was a highly placed official. Packages were being sent to him at the Prisión Central de Alcalá de Henares addressed simply to "Señor the Unknown"; but the story persists that he is the chief engineer of the Constructora Naval, and that he was suspected of having passed on atomic information to a foreign power that has made no secret of its animosity to Franco Spain. When I asked J— about Isabelita, she said it would not be easy to see her. She and the other children, J— said, were at present being held incomunicado, and not even members of their families were permitted access to them.

That was the seventeenth, and at six o'clock that morning four men were executed by a firing squad in the Retamares camp. On the eighteenth two entirely unrelated things happened: two more political prisoners were executed, this time at Alcalá de Henares, and a demonstration by the Falangist student organization (the S. E. U.) took place in downtown Madrid. Members of the S. E. U. (the Syndicate of Spanish Universities) paraded through the streets carrying an actual coffin, with a contrived corpse lying in it. Other Falangist students followed in the funeral cortège bearing lighted tapers and chanting: "Death to the King! Death to the King!" Opposition was shown them by the crowds in the street, and the police broke up the ensuing mêlée by bringing their sticks down right and left. That same day I talked with officials at our embassy about the possibility of seeing Isabelita, and they told me what they knew.

Isabelita Torralba is fifteen or sixteen years old, and she has become "mentally deranged as a consequence of the ill treatment" to which she was subjected during her stay in the Dirección General de Seguridad. This much, at least, seems to be clear. It is also known that Isabelita is one of a group of nine children—the three oldest are nineteen years old, the others between fifteen and eighteen—who have been accused of terrorism, and who are at present confined in the provincial prisons of Carabanchel Alto y Ventas. The children have not been condemned to death, one American official took great trouble to point out to me; but the prosecutor is expected to ask the death sentence for four of them and thirty-year prison terms for the other five. "People are apt to go off half-cocked on these matters," the American official said.

The same American told me more of the tragic story, and the part he told me went like this: When the children were first arrested they were held in isolation—in an isolation "so severe and inhuman," states the National Committee of United Socialist Youth of Spain, that several of the children, in this strict confinement, "contracted incurable diseases." Late in 1946 a delegation from the other political prisoners in the Prisión Central de Alcalá de Henares made a formal protest against the treatment being accorded the children. The prisoners then went on hunger strike for seven and a half days, at the end of which time the children were removed to another gallery, where living conditions were apparently somewhat more bearable. (But in the meantime, or before that, or somewhere along the way, Isabelita had managed to lose her reason.) And then, on Christmas Eve, it became known in the prison that the nine children were being punished, and were not to be allowed to partake of the special dinner which would be served the following day. So every prisoner in that wing refused to eat Christmas dinner if the children were not to have it too, but this time the authorities did not give in. So, because of a little group of children whose names are José Luis Sánchez Cano, Germán Sanz Esteban, Juan Arranz Lafont, Luis Berlinches Raso, Adolfo González Barona, Angel Goya Arroyo, José Yuste García, Isabelita Torralba, and Luisa González Barona, none of the prisoners in that wing ate dinner on Christmas Day.

More of the story was told me by M—, who has been out of prison on parole since February, and who has seen children like them die. "In Spain," M— said, "three classifications of people are protected under present conditions. They are the military, the clergy, and the Falangists. Isabelita and the other children cannot appeal to any of the three." He said he had seen girls of Luisa's and Isabelita's age go out to their execution, walking two by two across the prison courtyard in the gray of the morning, like young girls on their way to school. "We could see them from our cells," he said. "Sometimes they passed close under our windows. We could see they had put their lipstick and mascara on, like cheap women. But they were not cheap women. It was their way of saying they were not afraid to die."

Tonight one more paragraph is added to the story. It is contained in a few lines on the front page of a Paris evening newspaper. Following the condemnation to death of three of the nine children on trial, Franco's Ministry of Foreign Affairs has found it necessary to make a public statement to the effect that under Spanish law sixteen years of age constitutes "penal majority." Therefore an accused of that age is, in the eyes of the law, fully responsible for his acts. "Cardinal Segura," says M—'s voice across the brilliant sunlight, "has been occupied barring from sacred communion people unchristian enough to attend dances. He has not had time yet to ask Franco for clemency for nine Spanish children who have been nearly a year in prison."

A military court, concludes the newspaper notice, will shortly determine what their fate will be.

In the Wind

IT GIVES this column the utmost pleasure to reproduce herewith extracts from a long editorial which appeared in the Boston Herald just fifteen years ago next week:

The Democrats probably reelected President Hoover last night when they nominated Governor Roosevelt. . . . They have chosen a man who . . . is deficient in the qualities of leadership and statesmanship, and in character, ability, and intellectual impact, to . . . a score of other possible candidates, including Senator Walsh.

Not since 1896 . . . has the party picked a candidate in whom the country has so little confidence. There is nothing in his career to justify a classification with his predecessors—Judge Alton B. Parker, Woodrow Wilson, James M. Cox, and John W. Davis. One of his most ardent supporters has said that he has never been associated with a man whose public career gave so little foundation for a speech of praise. . . .

Republicans . . . think frankly that he is the weakest candidate in the Democratic Party. . . .

What sort of campaign will Governor Roosevelt make? It is to be expected that he will have more to say about "the forgotten man" . . . The chances are that the Governor will dispense doctrines which are dear to the ["so-called progressives"] and will also woo the conservatives.

We doubt that he will have the courage . . . to make an uncompromising fight for his political principles, if he has any.

ON THURSDAY, MAY 8, the United States Senate met at eleven o'clock in the morning, and its chaplain, the Reverend Peter Marshall, offered a prayer, which closed as follows: "Help us to do our very best this day and be content with today's troubles, so that we shall not borrow the troubles of tomorrow. Save us from the sin of worrying, lest stomach ulcers be the badge of our lack of faith. Amen." You can look it up in the Congressional Record.

BREST-LITOVSK AGAIN?

SINCE the most important issue of our times is the relationship between Russia and the Western nations, we are more than justified in studying any aspect of it that can throw a ray of light on today's difficulties. One indispensable source is the collection of official documents on the early years of the Russian Revolution. I have recently gone through a lot of them. They are fascinating, and they serve to remind us again that there is nothing new in the present policy of "getting tough" with Russia. Among its possible many merits that policy certainly has not the merit of originality.

It began nearly thirty years ago. From the summer of 1918 until today stretches a period of misunderstandings and tension broken only by brief intervals of reconciliation when Russia joined the League and when it entered the fight against Germany on the side of the Allies. Let us jump back for a moment to the start of the trouble.

Toward the end of May, 1918, the first skirmishes take place between the Czechoslovak troops, acting as vanguard of the interventionist powers, and the Soviet forces. Later in the month the Allies land in Murmansk and among the landing forces is a small contingent of Americans. In a note dated June 12, Chicherin, People's Commissar of Foreign Affairs, charges an unprovoked act of intervention in the internal affairs of his country; Soviet officials are being arrested and sometimes even shot; Russian railroad guards have been disarmed; railroads and telegraphs taken under Allied control. Chicherin asks for the removal of foreign troops from Soviet territory and warns of "the feeling that is being developed among the wide masses of Russia by the unprovoked British invasion, and the results this feeling will have in the future." The Allied reply takes the form of a British coup d'état in Archangel that results in the overthrow of the local Soviet. A proclamation addressed to the "Peoples of Russia" by the British at Archangel assures them that the invaders "come as friends to assist in the struggle against Germany."

Chicherin knows better. He knows, among other things, that on December 23, 1917, twenty-four hours after the first session of the preliminary Brest-Litovsk conference, representatives of Great Britain and France met secretly in Paris to discuss the best way to finish with the Russia of the Soviets. A plan was worked out there by the experts of each country whose aim was the elimination of the Bolshevik regime. With this plan in mind, Chicherin's note protesting the Archangel coup is firm and even violent in tone. Some important British agents in Russia, fearing that intervention will more and more push the Russians into the hands of Germany, advise London to go slow. But official London believes that only "getting tough" with the Bolsheviks will bring results.

The Allies, in these days, are heading back toward 1917. The pattern was set at Brest-Litovsk by the gigantic General Hoffman, speaking in the name of the Imperial German Army, at a series of meetings with the Russians during which he used his fist on the "peace" table so energetically as to smash it to smithereens. Lenin, who wanted peace against the advice of his collaborators, fixed a limit to his desire; he was not going to allow General Hoffman to treat the Soviet regime and his country like a bunch of bushmen if he could help it. The czarist army had disintegrated; the people had demanded peace—and "seized" it. But the Red Army was already in the field, defending the revolution, and Lenin was prepared to go on fighting if he received some help from Russia's former Allies. The best hope was America. The All-Russian Congress of the Soviets had received a cable of sympathy from President Wilson; Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, had also sent an encouraging word. At the request of Colonel Robins (head of the American Red Cross Mission in Russia) Lenin agreed to draw up a formal note to the United States government asking, "in case (a) the All-Russian Congress of the Soviets refuses to ratify the peace treaty with Germany or (b) if the German government, breaking the treaty, renews the offensive in order to continue the robbers' raid, can the Soviet government rely on the support of the United States, Great Britain, and France?" Lenin's decision was held up to give time for a reply from Washington. No reaction; no reply. Silence may be also an expression of toughness.

War approaches its end. On the eve of the Armistice the Soviets try again to improve their relations with the Allies. On October 24, 1918, a long, reasoned letter is sent by Chicherin to Wilson. On December 2 a combined protest and peace proposal is sent to Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States. On December 24, Litvinov from Stockholm sends another statement to Wilson. There follows an entire year of attempts by the Russians to arrive at some kind of modus vivendi. On December 5, 1919, the Seventh Congress of the Soviets adopts a resolution recalling all these earlier appeals and "once more confirms its unchanging desire for peace" by renewing its proposals for negotiations. Clemenceau rejects this offer on December 21 and insists on the policy of "economic encirclement of the Bolsheviks [in French the cordon sanitaire] and the organization of order by the Russian elements"—the Kolchaks and Denikins. The Allied policy toward Russia remains the same until the entire machinery of intervention breaks down with the rout of the counter-revolutionary armies.

Does this record of the earliest relations between Russia and the West explain the suspicion and hostility, the intransigence, that strangle those relations today? Perhaps only partly. Conflicting interests, conflicting social philosophies, are still major causes of trouble as they were in 1918. But no one who has been in Russia would deny that the "get-tough" tactics of the Allies in 1918, so long forgotten in the West, are still a living issue there. Nearly thirty years have passed. But in the last issue of the London New Statesman and Nation to reach my desk I read: "It seems clear that Mr. Marshall is relying on American toughness to prevail in a diplomatic war of attrition and to succeed in the end in extracting compromises from the U. S. S. R. The indications so far are that the U. S. S. R. will go on meeting toughness with toughness."

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Financing the Monnet Plan

THE first operation of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development—a $250,000,000 loan to France—is designed to forward both objectives included in the bank's title. For if France is to regain its position as a pillar of European economy, and to provide an adequate standard of living for its people, it must proceed beyond a mere reconstruction to the development of new resources and the increase of productivity above pre-war levels. In the period between the two world wars French industry and agriculture stagnated. Too large a proportion of national savings was swallowed up in providing for defense, and investment in modern equipment was insufficient to keep France abreast of other industrial countries. In the thirties production in Britain, Scandinavia, and other European countries recovered from its depression lows to reach levels higher than in 1929. In France it never did, as the following table shows:

	1929	1938
Coal production (million tons)	55.0	47.6
Steel " "	9.7	6.2
Cement " "	5.3	3.8
Rail freight (million tons transported)	224.0	133.0

The effects of the Second World War on an already weakened economy were devastating. Population was reduced by 1,400,000; property damage was enormous; stocks of raw material—working capital—were completely exhausted; industrial equipment seriously deteriorated owing to lack of proper maintenance for five years; the transport system was half wrecked; the very soil was badly depleted by lack of fertilizer. Considering all these factors, the degree of recovery achieved since liberation is truly remarkable. By the end of 1946 the volume of production had risen to about 90 per cent of the pre-war figure and the volume of exports to 75 per cent.

But recovery is not enough; it must be followed by expansion if the French people are to realize true economic security. Early this year, therefore, the French government adopted a four-year program of development drawn up by a great body of experts headed by M. Jean Monnet. This plan aims to raise the national production level 30 per cent above the 1938 figure by 1950 and to this end proposes the investment of a sum equivalent to $18,900,000,000 during the next four years. For the most part, expenditure is to be concentrated on six key sectors of the economy—coal, power, steel, building materials, agricultural machinery, and transport. The modernization of these industries, the raising of their output, and the increased productivity per capita of the workers they employ will, it is believed, stimulate greater activity in all directions.

The capital required to finance the Monnet Plan will be derived to the extent of 84 per cent from domestic sources. That means that savings over the next four years must equal about 20 per cent of the net national income, a very high proportion for a country as poor as France now is. For the sake of a future improvement in living standards, the French people are being asked to restrict present consumption to little more than bare essentials.

Fulfillment of the Monnet Plan will not be possible without large imports of coal and oil, raw materials, and machinery of all kinds, most of which will be bought in the United States. Orders amounting to $700,000,000 for such equipment as locomotives, freight cars, tankers, tractors, and power plants have already been placed, and tentative schedules call for further purchases totaling $1,230,000,000. But the French balance of international payments is heavily adverse at this time, and the restoration of equilibrium through the expansion of exports can hardly be expected before 1950. Imports of capital goods, therefore, must be paid for by the mobilization of external resources. The liquidation of foreign investments and other overseas assets, together with the partial proceeds of existing loans from the United States and other countries, will, it is anticipated, furnish about $2,170,000,000. This leaves some $850,000,000 to be raised by new credits, or $600,000,000 after taking into account the loan just granted by the International Bank.

The problem of the external financing of the Monnet Plan, therefore, remains to be solved. And this is only one of many formidable obstacles to its successful completion. Among these coal supply takes a foremost place. By heroic measures the output of the French mines has been pushed above the pre-war level, but this source was never adequate for French needs. In order to maintain industrial production, let alone increase it, larger coal imports must be obtained. But where are they to be found while fuel shortages hinder recovery throughout Europe?

Another major difficulty is lack of man-power. In order to fulfil the Monnet Plan nearly 1,000,000 new workers must be recruited before 1950. Efforts are therefore being made to persuade hitherto unemployed women to enter industry, and agreements are being negotiated for the immigration of foreign workers, particularly Italians. It is also hoped that some of the German prisoners of war, who must shortly be released, will be induced to stay in France as free workers. But even if all these and other measures being taken succeed, the labor supply will hardly equal the demand.

Even more momentous for the success of the Monnet Plan is the solution of the political problem that it poses. Commenting on this aspect of the program, the London Economist of December 14, 1946, asked: "How far will a sovereign people, in peace time, allow its rulers to impose upon it more effort and less consumption than it would choose, on its own initiative, as a collection of individuals?" In other words can democratic economic planning which calls for voluntary acceptance by the workers of long hours and frozen wages, and by the population at large of burdensome taxation, rationing, and shortages of all kinds, be successfully achieved? The future of European democracy depends, in a large measure, on the answer which France and other nations find for that question.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

IN "THE BIG SKY" (William Sloane Associates, $3.50) A. G. Guthrie, Jr., has attempted to recreate the landscape and the life of the early Northwest, the West of the fur trapper and the voyageur. It is an authentic subject—for the emotional impact of the Far Western experience is still unspent and so far has remained part of the unfinished business of art. The creative imagination of a Mark Twain seized upon the rough stone of another phase of American experience and handed it back in its intrinsic, final, and therefore possessable form. The essence of the Far Western experience has yet to be extracted and possessed.

The landscape, for lack of a larger word, is the central theme of "The Big Sky." Scattered through the great expanse of mountains and forests and river valleys are the mountain men, the traders, French boatmen plying the streams, the Indians at war and peace, who are Mr. Guthrie's dramatis personae. Three mountain men and an Indian girl are his principal characters, of whom Boone Caudill and Teal Eye occupy the foreground.

The characterization of the three mountain men is carried out by contemporary and realistic means, including the stream-of-consciousness technique for revealing their thoughts and feelings. Bernard De Voto assures us that Mr. Guthrie's delineation is accurate, that this is actually "how they were, how they lived, most of all how they felt." Perhaps. The trouble is that, however well Mr. Guthrie understands them, his rendering of their thoughts and feelings is not very convincing. I doubt whether any contemporary rendering could be. It would be almost impossible not to ascribe to them, as Mr. Guthrie often seems to do, the thoughts and feelings about the early West of a present-day American. The fact that the two sets of thoughts and feelings may be similar only complicates the problem. As for his handling of the romance of Caudill and Teal Eye, it is, to say the least, anachronistic.

As I have indicated, the landscape is the object and motivation of the emotional drive out of which Mr. Guthrie writes. At times, notably in the account of men marooned in a mountain pass in winter, he succeeds in communicating its reality. And the reality turns out to be a fabulous realm of snow and peak and sky of which the most fabulous element of all is a rock goat, alive and real, yet also an emanation of the ghostly landscape. The human characters here become mere figures in the landscape pointing up its overwhelming presence, yet are none the less real. This is the best passage of the book and I think it is no accident that it takes on a legendary quality.

Throughout the book it is the characters who are allowed to remain figures in the landscape who seem most real. The Indians, whose stream of consciousness Mr. Guthrie does not attempt to plumb—including Teal Eye, except when she is drawn too far into the orbit of her white man's consciousness—are more convincing than the three mountain men on whom he spends so much effort and space. (The little beaver trying to free herself from the trap, whose eyes remind Boone of Teal Eye, is more completely realized, in a couple of paragraphs, than Teal Eye herself. Mr. Guthrie does very well with animals.)

I can't help feeling that Mr. Guthrie has applied the realistic technique to material of which the reality cannot be captured by the documentary method. This method serves him well in one respect. The brutality and the plain squalor of life in the early West come through. On the other hand, one suspects that its rather solemn and pedestrian compulsions inhibit him in another respect. Though a few tall tales are spun around campfires, he makes very little use of the humorous myth-making which was and still is a constant and deeply indigenous American way of coping with the overwhelming presence.

The realistic approach, the technique of dogged documentation, has a prestige akin to that of virtue in this country.

Yet the American fiction which has survived and will survive is the fiction which may and usually does start off on the ground, along "a bright trail of fact," as if in propitiation, but ends in the fabulous. Melville and Mark Twain were realists in that they dealt with contemporary reality. But "Moby Dick" and "Huckleberry Finn"—and "The Great Gatsby," to take a more recent example—are fables, not documentaries. Aspiring writers should learn this, and let themselves go.

Mr. Guthrie's mountain men would be more believable if they were more legendary—by which I do not mean romantic. As it is they are not only unconvincing; they impose upon the wilderness, and they narrow the dimensions and wonder of the big sky. Mr. Guthrie is a competent and sensitive and conscientious writer. But the spirit of the West, whatever it was, has escaped him—partly I think because he used a realistic trap.

I went to the ballet at the City Center the other evening. I noted ruefully that the rows in front of me were only half filled, but hoped for the best. The worst ensued. Throughout the performance of the first number late comers, all of whom seemed preternaturally tall, slow, and awkward, stumbled into their seats—they always have seats in the middle of a row. They whispered, they panted from hurrying, they looked around to take their bearings as if they had been standing on a peak in Darien. By the time they had all helped remove each other's coats, had squirmed, sighed, and settled, the ballet was over. A least I assumed so because I heard clapping. I hadn't seen anything but a few stray motions of the dancers, glimpsed through the far less skilful but all enveloping motions of the late comers. And then of course it was time for them to move in reverse. They must get out into the lobby in order to come in late for the second ballet. At that point I yielded the field. Seeing the ballet at the Metropolitan, I might add, is beset by the same hazards, with the ushers aiding and abetting.

A friend of mine who has protested to City Center against being subjected, along with hundreds of other people, to the maddening interruptions and eruptions of not one or two but dozens of late comers, has been told that it is a "ticklish situation," that it is not legal to keep ticket holders out, that City Center patrons are a "pretty mixed lot" who feel that the Center is an informal place, that it is hard to get anywhere in New York on time, that when people are held in the lobby a representative of the press is likely to appear and demand admittance, that perhaps the answer lies in slow education!

All of which becomes ludicrous when you discover that at City Center, as at Carnegie Hall, people who arrive late at symphony concerts are held outside until they can be admitted without interrupting the performance.

Sometimes it is difficult to get to a performance on time. It is also sometimes difficult to get to a railroad station on time. Yet, as my friend points out, a railroad doesn't worry about late comers, and as a result of fast education relatively few people miss trains, and if they do they never think of reproaching the management. Yet railroad patrons are a pretty mixed lot.

People who go to the ballet and the opera are surely capable of understanding why they should not be admitted in the middle of a performance. It is too much perhaps to expect that they will insist on being kept out, but the idea that they will object is ridiculous. And no newspaper is going to penalize City Center for not allowing its critic the privilege of coming in late.

The people who are really entitled to the solicitude of the management are not the late comers but those who arrive on time—and the performers themselves. To dance or sing before an audience which is carrying on a noisy undirected performance of its own, complete with the double shuffle and the flying leap, cries of pain, and excuse-me-pleases, must be very trying. I wish the unions involved would specify, among other minimum working conditions, a relatively quiet and stable auditorium. If it would eliminate the people who go not to see the ballet but to be seen—and heard—seeing the ballet, the financial loss would surely be small, and it would be a gain in every other way.

Oil and Politics

THE UNITED STATES AND THE NEAR EAST. By E. A. Speiser. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

Americans know that they are up to their necks in the politics of the Near East, but few of them are well informed about the history and problems of that region. The editors of the American Foreign Policy Library did well therefore to choose this subject for the second volume of their series. They did even better when they persuaded Professor Speiser to write the book, for he combines a profound knowledge of the region's historical background with an acute understanding of its current affairs. Moreover, he has approached his task with a cool objectivity that contrasts pleasantly with the superheated emotionalism of much contemporary discussion of the Near Eastern question.

For the purposes of this book Professor Speiser rather arbitrarily considers the Near East as coincident with the territories of the Arab League nations plus, of course, Palestine. This area, he believes, is the new "strategic center of gravity" of the world—the point where the interests of the great powers converge and conflict. Here Britain has long been dominant, protecting its communications with the Far East, blocking the advance of Russia toward warm waters. And now the United States has appeared on the scene because as a world power it cannot ignore so politically tender a spot, because it has a major interest in Arabian oil, and because, in the new air age, the Arab lands are as much an international crossroads as they were in the age of caravans.

Stimulating, and stimulated by, the rivalries of the great powers are the boiling passions of the pan-Arab movement. This is a phenomenon sometimes treated as an artificial growth. Professor Speiser, though he recognizes the dynastic and sectarian obstacles to Arab unity, does not agree. He is impressed by the influence which the Arabs, by virtue of their historic prestige, exercise in the great Moslem belt which runs from Gibraltar to Singapore. Nevertheless, he does not support Arab claims to Palestine. The problem of the Holy Land, he declares, can only be solved by compromise, with all three interests involved—the Jews, the Arabs, and the British—making concessions. Such a solution will only be feasible if it has real international authority to back it.

On Palestine as on other Near Eastern questions Professor Speiser believes that America should pursue a more independent policy that it has in the past. Such a policy, he writes, "based on enlightened self-interest, may reduce general tension. But automatic American support of British policy in the region threatens to increase tension to the explosive point."

This book, it will be realized, is extremely topical, and like all topical books these days it has already been overtaken by events and needs revision. In view of developments in the last few months, for instance, it is no longer possible to speak of the United States as a junior partner in the exploitation of Arabian oil. Under American pressure the former British policy of restricting development has collapsed.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Family Portrait

AN AMERICAN DYNASTY. By John Tebbel. Doubleday and Company. $3.

THE strange clan—spell it with a K if you like—which peddles the Chicago Tribune, the New York Daily News, and the Washington Times-Herald to buyers of advertising space and to a huge cross-section of America has been posed by John Tebbel, a former newspaperman, for an anything but flattering family portrait in this well-written book.

Here is the story of the publishing Medells, McCormicks, and Pattersons, and no more fantastic yarns could be dreamed up by the writers for the Sunday News than are told here by Mr. Tebbel in documented detail. Mr. Tebbel is rightly concerned with the survival of what Henry Luce's $200,000 committee recently called "A Free and Responsible Press." His conclusion, however, after brooding over the antics of the essentially ignorant, hopelessly prejudiced, decidedly obnoxious persons who have such a seeming power over public opinion, is in reality no more helpful than the conclusions of the Luce committee—namely, that the newspaper publishers should clean up their own house. There is consolation in the fact that, as the author points out, the influence of the McCormick-Pattersons in terms of politics is "negligible." "I get a man or a measure soundly licked all you have to do is to get the indorsement of the Chicago Tribune. Consider the Chicagoan who announced that he was 100 per cent for coronary thrombosis—because he had read an attack on in the "world's greatest newspaper." Yes, Mr. Tebbel concludes that the American press can only be free "by ending the abuses of its freedom perpetrated by its own members." Which is like asking the Kluxers to throw away their nighties, burn down their Klaverns, and hand over their treasury to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Zionist Organization of America. The awful truth is that there ain't no such animal as a "free and responsible press," not even the New York Times, as Mr. Tebbel freely admits. Not under any system of "free enterprise" which makes millionaire out of dope peddlers, and "molders of public opinion" out of night-riding bigots. But cheer up, folks, Congress hasn't yet passed a law making it compulsory to read the News or the Tribune, or the Times-Herald.

MCALISTER COLEMAN

Man's Burden

AM I MY BROTHER'S KEEPER? By Ananda K. Coomaraswamy. An Asia Press Book. John Day Company $2.25.

IF BY being "my brother's keeper" we mean the white man's burden, the right and duty to impose upon benighted natives our own idols—gadget worship, the profit motive, the party system, and an exclusive theology—then the answer of Ananda K. Coomaraswamy is an emphatic no. He is a skeptic—and so am I—even about universal literacy, which we mistake for universal education. His challenge is well worth pondering, even by advanced liberals. Many are advocating a world state in which representation would be weighted

According to Western standards: industrial output and literacy. The Nazis were industrialized and literate.

But in another sense, according to Coomaraswamy, I am my brother's keeper. He believes in cultures which are happy because they have reached equilibrium: everyone knows his place. He even upholds the caste system, so dear to the Admirable Crichton. In such a community a non-conformist spoils the pattern and should be discouraged. We are familiar with this philosophy: it is that of the British Tories, of Marshal Pétain, and of the Un-American Committee. The remedy is to break up the reactionary and totalitarian idol of the anthropologists, culture, and to invite the whole world, not to be like ourselves, but to seek with us. It might spoil Bali, or Barchester. But it might help India as a whole.

The gist of the last essay—Gradation, Evolution, and Reincarnation—is found in the words of Schrödinger: "Consciousness is a singular of which the plural is unknown." This leads to solipsism as well as to pantheism. Metaphysics, like theology, is a paradox, because it attempts to express in human terms that which lies beyond human thought. The only valid metaphysical approach is that of the mystic, and as Ernest Hello put it, the only proper language of the mystic is silence.

Outside of History

CHRIST STOPPED AT EBOLI. By Carlo Levi. Farrar, Straus and Company. $3.

PLOT is always the essential—even, or perhaps especially, when it is so subdued as to seem negligible or secondary. When moments are big, it is the context that enlarges them. Overtly, "Christ Stopped at Eboli" is merely sensitive reporting of a year (1935-36) spent in exile by a cultured Italian anti-Fascist. Most of the book consists of description of the daily life and mind of the peasants who live in Gagliano, a village in Lucania, where Christianity—in its ancient or its modern version—has never become an integral form in life. Thus, to some extent outside of history, the peasants are pictured carefully, with interest, in detail. The silent plot of the book, however, resides in the attempt of "history" or "Christian civilization" or "consciousness"—in the person of Mr. Levi—to see, or establish continuity with, something that is very much not itself. The product of this attempt is a new kind of modern lyricism: the book is a well-wrought, lyrical vase.

There are two very striking aspects of this new lyricism: one is its great objectivity—the calm, almost total submission to the reality of the Other; the second is the silent, pervading dream quality which is created by this admission of an alien but genuine reality. Considering the material dealt with—the submerged, hopeless lives of peasants whose chief and almost exclusive relation to the civilization of the West (which we so much treasure) has been that of a deadly, even senseless exploitation—considering this, the rather complete lack of tension in the book is surprising. Its primary quality is charm! And Mr. Levi seems to represent, quite adequately, moreover, the highest expression of Western values. Justifiably one might expect an explosion—at least in Mr. Levi, if not in the peasants. But on the contrary the two come together as

A CONTRIBUTION TO POLITICAL RELIGION AND SCIENTIFIC FAITH

By Joseph Needham

This volume is an expression of Joseph Needham's faith (based on science as well as religion) that out of the evolutionary process will arise the good society. The diverse subject matter (see below) is unified by the author's keen social conscience.

CONTENTS:

1. The Two Faces of Christianity (An anatomy of western religion)
2. History Is on Our Side (An address to the clergy)
3. Father Aldous' Treatise on Politique Power (A critique of Aldous Huxley's book on Joseph du Tremblay)
4. Religion and Politics (A sermon in a college chapel)
5. Cambridge Summer (A digression)
6. University Democracy (A letter to an American friend)
7. Pavlov and Lenin (A commemoration of two great men)
8. The Gist of Evolution (A plain statement concerning the coming into being of our world)
9. Science, Capitalism and Fascism (A broadcast talk on history)
10. The Nazi Attack on International Science (A detailed indictment and a solemn warning)
11. The Liquidation of Form and Matter (An account of new ways of thought in science) lovers, with satisfaction. Essentially, I think, Mr. Levi was fulfilled by a thrilling awareness of the peasant sense of timelessness and death (p. 255, read in relation to his failure of will as a doctor). And the peasants were able, in their own way, finally to incorporate Mr. Levi into their pattern of life as a symbol of future good from the Christian civilization which had heretofore always manifested itself as a vile but powerful thief. They made of him a kind of witch-doctor.

I believe Mr. Levi got the best of the bargain, as is clear from the book. He had cleaned out of him enough of the Christian world to be able to perceive the basic meanings that that world attempts—so successfully—to deny. But this denial can never match the eternal willingness to wait of the underworld of instinctual reality. The peasants of Lucania have waited more than two thousand years. Mr. Levi seems to be saying that this fact is not to be bewailed too loudly, that it is perhaps just as well that Christ stopped at Eboli. But one likes to think that it would have been good if he had traveled farther, even all the way to Gagliano. One likes to think that he might have learned something from the peasants there. DAVID T. Fiction in Review

THE publishers of Herman Wouk's novel about the radio business, "Aurora Dawn" (Simon and Schuster, $2.75), announce that they are going to put a new, more modest jacket on the book. I suppose we must acknowledge this achievement as all to the credit of the reviewers. They have been pretty unanimous in objecting to Simon and Schuster's claim that Mr. Wouk has rescued the beautiful English language from Hemingway and restored it to the tradition of Fielding. But while I join in rejoicing that an author is going to be allowed, however belatedly, to make his way without the embarrassment of excessive promotion, I am afraid I cannot become very excited about this token of the wholesome influence of the reviewers upon our literary life. The critics neglected several rather important opportunities in the case of "Aurora Dawn." They did not point out, for instance, that Mr. Wouk's eighteenth-century affectations are pretentious and immature, that stylization is never style, and that there is something wrong with a society which thinks it is. Nor did they point out that the selection of "Aurora Dawn" by the Book-of-the-Month Club indicates that Mr. Wouk's mistakes have a considerable cultural backing.

Mr. Wouk should most certainly be spared the advertising genius of his publishers. But he should also be saved from the perversion of his own pleasant gifts. Behind the rosy anachronisms of "Aurora Dawn" there would seem to be a nice talent for light fiction; and talent for light fiction is no drug of our market. Of course, the reason we have no decent light fiction in this country is because we respect no literary work that is not heavy with portent or pretension. Mr. Wouk gives us plenty of evidence that he could write simple colloquial English if he thought it desirable. He is naturally witty. He is well educated. It is the sad mark of our times that he should nevertheless find it necessary or favorable to roll in the full periods of a bygone prose and display his book learning like a sophomore.

This perjury of a talent proceeds, of course, from the same intellectual unease that manifests itself throughout our culture. Mr. Wouk, it is important to note, affects his eighteenth-century manner chiefly in his chapter titles and in his pages of discursive comment, not in his pages of straight narrative. He uses it, that is, as a device for ridding his story of intellection and moralization for separating plot and commentary. He wants to take sides on his subject and to make moral and intellectual comment on his situations and characters; he therefore turns to the manner of a century which expected the novelist to do just this; and because the style of these excursions is so flamboyantly out of date, he is not only forgiven the excursions but celebrated for his style. How different would have been the response if he had taken it for granted that he had the right to digress from his narrative, and if he had incorporated his comments directly and colloquially into his story! He would have been accused of the very faults of which he is now guilty but of which he would then have been innocent. He would have been told he was pretentious, over-intellectualized, old-fashioned.

Obviously what is involved here is a deep distrust, on the part not alone of Mr. Wouk but of our whole literary culture, of mind. We feel that mind has no rightful place in fiction. If it insists upon intruding itself, we demand that it not try to act as if it belonged but that it proclaim itself a rank outsider—a comic echo from a past age. And it is

UN HEADQUARTERS

By Le Corbusier

U. N. Headquarters, by Le Corbusier, is in effect a complete report by this world-renowned architect of the entire story of the selection of the United Nations site. Le Corbusier was appointed by his country, France, as an expert in architecture and urbanism attached to the United Nations Headquarters Commission. The latter part of the book, written during the heat of the conflict, so to speak, carries the story right up to the final approval of the Manhattan site offered by Mr. Rockefeller. The whole book is an important historic document as well as an expression of the author's urbanistic philosophy.

his distrust of mind, this profound unease about our ideas and our relation to the people to whom we address our ideas, that accounts for the extremes of earnestness and sonority in current writing, for our inability to create a clear, honest, flexible contemporary prose.

Similarly—and this is the connection between Mr. Wouk's anachronistic style and the self-consciousness with which he parades his learning, his endemic references to the Hundred Best Books—we are very uncomfortable about education. We should like to think that knowledge is a private affair, but we now it is also a form of authority and power. And if it is power, best to wear it like a badge.

The fact that Mr. Wouk has to go back to the eighteenth century to find a style which permits him to make moral comment on his story does not mean that ours is any less a moral literary age than the eighteenth century. Quite the contrary; I doubt that there has ever been a period that matched ours for its emotional breast-beatings and threshings of conscience. But "Aurora Dawn" is not typical of the contemporary novel in this respect. That other novel about radio, "The Hucksters," is far more so. Mr. Wakeman was concerned with his share in the sins of radio; whereas Mr. Wouk, with commendable self-respect, does not believe himself to blame for his evil—except, perhaps, in so far as every member of society shares all its responsibilities. Indeed, it is precisely because Mr. Wouk wished to keep a moral distance between himself and his subject that he had to borrow a style so distant in time.

I have dealt only with the prose and use of "Aurora Dawn," to the neglect of its story. For the most part the story is neat enough—a matter of a young radio executive who has to choose between his true love and the daughter of his chief sponsor. The book ends with Mr. Wouk's hero reunited with his true sweetheart and saving his soul by deserting from the radio business entirely. We must pause, however, over the instrument of this salvation. Young Andrew Hale has come to fame by signing up for the Aurora Dawn programs a certain Reverend Stanfield, a Virginia preacher who captures the American radio audience by combining a short sermon with a public confessional; his followers come on the air to announce their misdoings and be forgiven. But this preacher and program, although they have their comic aspects, are not presented as part of the nonsense of radio. They are offered in salutary opposition to the cheapness and lack of integrity of the president of Aurora Dawn and his other programs. In other words, just as Mr. Wakeman answered radio with an apocalyptic dedication to art, Mr. Wouk answers radio with evangelistic religion. Perhaps even more than his affectations of manner, this false vision of virtue makes one hesitant about Mr. Wouk's future of comic seriousness. The good comic-serious writer lives by common sense, not by big gestures of the spirit. DIANA TRILLING

Drama Note

THE TELEPHONE" and "The Medium" are two operas in English by the Italian American composer Gian-Carlo Menotti. The second was first performed last year at Columbia University, and both are now being presented at the Barrymore Theater in a production made by the Ballet Society. They come within my province since they are being offered to theatergoers as experiments in music drama and since I found them interesting as such. The first is merely a curtain-raiser which is hardly more than a superior sort of revue sketch, but the second, billed as a tragedy, is both ambitious and original.

It deals with the story of a shabby

YEARS OF CRISIS

By Kenneth Ingram

*So says the author in his book, just published—the first complete International History of events from 1919-1945 including the War.

Tightly packed with information, YEARS OF CRISIS presents a complete survey of our world, from the League of Nations to the United Nations. It is the detailed story of a colossal, perhaps unprecedented, human failure to maintain peace.

Writing from a Liberal point of view, Kenneth Ingram exposes facts, hitherto unknown, to help the reader see his way through all the confusing maze of contemporary history.

ake spiritualist who falls victim to a fear of her own ghosts, and certain of the scenes, notably that of the seance rigged up for her dupes, are grotesquely very effective. I speak hesitantly of the music, which I am not competent to judge, but it struck me as both melodious and, especially, expressive; so that the emotional effect of the rather sketchily written text was often quite powerful. The conception of the text is better than its rather fumbling development, but I gladly joined the audience in hearty applause.

Whether music drama of this sort can ever find a real place in our theater I do not know, but it is worth experimenting with. American playwrighting seems to be dying of its own prosiness. If we can't get poetry, we might try music.

THE Spanish idiom, as Falla uses it with twentieth-century sophistication and fastidiousness, loses much of its vitality; and his works, for me, are exquisitely fashioned and moderately enjoyable miniatures. Of these, "El Amor Brujo" has been recorded for Victor by Stokowski with the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra and Nan Merriman (Set 1089; $3.85), and for Columbia by Reiner with the Pittsburgh Symphony and Carol Brice (Set 633; $4).

Stokowski's performance occasionally has more verve and more supple grace than Reiner's and more tonal beauty, and also occasionally the characteristic excesses of emphasis, inflection, and manipulation of beautiful one that distort the shape of the music; however even Reiner's more straightforward performance is not without its tussy details. Both singers are excellent; but Miss Brice's American enunciation of the Spanish t grates on my ears. The Reiner performance is reproduced with harper distinctness of detail, and also with sharp stridency of the violins; the recorded sound of the Stokowski performance has more natural softness, warmth, and luster. And finally the Columbia surfaces are not perfect, but the Victor surfaces are disturbingly noisy, and a couple of the Victor sides waver in pitch.

Chopin's E minor Piano Concerto is one of his loveliest works; but the F minor—which Rubinstein has recorded for Victor with the N. B. C. Symphony under Steinberg (Set 1012; $4.85)—I find extremely uninteresting. And the hectic, brash playing of the orchestra in the first movement sets the stage for the exaggeratedly impassioned and mannered playing of Rubinstein throughout. The performance is well-reproduced; surfaces are poor.

On a single disc (11-9414; $1) Victor offers Pari siamo and Cortigiani, vil razza dannata from "Rigoletto," sung by Leonard Warren with an orchestra under Weissmann. Warren's baritone is a delight to the ear when, in the quieter passages, he gives it to us in modeled phrases, but not when he hurls it at us in a deafening mass, which the Victor engineers make worse by stepping up the volume-level. The performance is well-reproduced; the surfaces of my copy are very noisy.

On another single (11-9262; $1) is Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and orchestra—the Prelude with some agreeable passages among the sour, the Allegro rattling along characteristically with a lot of rhythmic zigzagging in place of interesting ideas. The performance by Biggs and the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky seems good and is well-reproduced.

Victor also has issued five more records in its Heritage Series of red vinylite pressings ($3.50 each) of recordings made by the legendary singers of the past. McCormack's voice and phrasing are a delight in the duet Parigi, o cara from "La Traviata" (15-1009), which he sings with Bori, whose voice has its 1914 freshness, but whose singing already has the tremulous archness that was to become unendurable. On the reverse side, which is somewhat noisy, McCormack sings with Sammarco in an undistinguished performance of the duet Ab, Mimi, tu più non torni from "La Bohème."

Those of us who have heard Rosa Ponselle, Rethberg, and Milanov will not be bowled over by Boninsegna's voice in O cieli azzurri from "Aida" and Ma dall' arido stelo divulsa from "Un Ballo in Maschera" (15-1006; a little noisy)—a clear and powerful dramatic soprano which she uses with impressive authority and style, and occasionally with the liberties in tempo and phrasing that those old singers permitted themselves. I have heard early recordings by Amato (a superb "Trovatore" duet with Gadschi) in which his voice has its youthful richness; but in the 1913 recordings of arias from Verdi's "I Due Foscari" and Franchetti's "Germania" that Victor has issued (15-1005) it has the hardness and dryness and strain that it had when I began to hear him in 1914. I find myself unimpressed by Gerville-Réache's voice, a good contralto, or her style in the Habanera from "Carmen" and the Song of the Tiger from Massé's "Paul et Virginie" (15-1008; quite noisy). And I am at a loss to understand the release of Plancon's recordings of an aria from "The Magic Flute" and two trashy little encore songs (15-1007; extremely noisy).

Babs on Tour

Dear Sirs: Credit is given to Miss Barbara Hutton for the desire for freedom inspired in the Arab women of North Africa. To keep the spirit of freedom alive, I have encouraged an active, responsible group of cultured citizens of this city to form a League of Freedom of Women's Rights.

Many of the advanced business men have contributed to the fund, and I am happy to report for the benefit of American women that in a short time their underprivileged Arab sisters will no longer suffer their former humiliations, such as being arrested and handcuffed if found, alone or with their husbands, in a public park, arrested at once for entering any movie house, and beaten, handcuffed, and dragged by the chain of their handcuff, like a criminal, and thrown into jail whenever the Pasha feels like it.

The League of Freedom of Women's Rights needs no money, but it needs courageous moral support from all the women of the world. A nation whose women are stained with such humiliation has very little chance of progressing in the world.

Who Will Be the Judge?

Dear Sirs: It is quite true that strategic positions are occupied methodically by Communists, not only in departments of government here and abroad, but in our schools and universities, the press, the publishing business, industry, the motion pictures. You find them everywhere; they mean business and they are dangerous. But judging by the present drive against the Communists, I should say there are even more fascists in public office, or at least more powerfully placed: the Rankins of this country are as bitter enemies of democratic government as any Communist, and the legislation proposed by them seeks the suppression of all liberty of speech or opinion; if they are not stopped here and now, we shall find ourselves with a "subversive-thoughts" law on our books.

Both fascists and Communists have been strangely successful in persuading the liberals of this country that only a democracy has no right to defend itself from its enemies. Every suggestion that they be curbed in any way has always been met with outcries of wounded democratic feeling from the liberal left, which has defended, on the ground of safeguarding democratic government, the most cynical and base misuse of our civil liberties. I think the liberals had better clear their heads and look the situation in the face before they are driven underground to form a resistance movement to fascism or communism—the end will be the same—in our own country.

Yet in all this maggoty-minded proposed legislation I have seen no suggestion that Communist or fascist conspirators against our government shall be put to death. Let us therefore take a little warning from Mr. del Vayo's interesting article, Vatican Versus Left in Italy (The Nation, April 5). Mr. del Vayo says: "Another battle will no doubt be fought over the law on the Defense of the Republic—drafted by Togliatti and approved by the Council of Ministers—which provides sanctions, including the death sentence, against Fascists and Monarchists who conspire against the state."

Italy, we have been told, is to found a democracy. If it is right for a democracy in Italy to execute the death sentence upon Fascists and Monarchists, why not upon Communists too, who are equally its enemies? Granting this, why is it such a crime for a democracy in the United States to put fascist and Communist conspirators in jail, or at least to deprive them of their confidential posts in departments of our government? Does being a democrat morally oblige a man to consent to his own murder? And by what process of reason do the democrats of Italy or of America to say nothing of Mr. del Vayo, or the editors of The Nation, convince themselves that Togliatti, a Communist means to do anything to help establish true republic in Italy? Stalin played sinister game with Hitler when Germany was the center of power for fascism. The Vatican is now that center and the Communists are playing the old game again. How many jolts of the kind can the liberals of this country take, I wonder, and still preserve the dazzled innocence?

The Wayward Reviewer

Dear Sirs: May I call attention to slight "waywardness" in A. J. Liebling review of "A Free and Responsible Press" (Nation, April 12). It appears in his query concerning Mr. Hutchins statement in the foreword to the volume that "the commission did not conduct elaborate 'research.'" Mr. Liebling was inclined "to wonder uncharitably," as he read the book, "what they spent the $200,000 on." It is a fair question.

The answer is to be found by reading all of the commission's reports, not merely the general summary report. In the last pages of that summary report is a description of the special studies made for the commission which were judged by it to be worthy of separate publication. There is, in addition, a sizable collection of unpublished memoranda providing a substructure of fact underlying the commission's more general published statements. (Mr. Hutchins suggests this volume of background material in noting that 176 memoranda were distributed to the commission members.)

All this cost money. At times during the commission's life the staff rose to over twenty members, in addition to four assignments farmed out under contract.

Unfortunately for any general judgment as to the scope and quality of this factual underpinning, only three of the six special reports have as yet been published. But they indicate the essential nature of the work.

First to appear was "Peoples Speaking to Peoples," a study of international mass communication. As coauthor of is volume, I can testify that it was reaking new ground with sources scattered in many places, mainly in the form of unpublished memoranda or derived from interviews with participants in the communications process. Although it is only a beginning in a field deserving much more cultivation in the years ahead, competent reviewers judged the report "by every criterion the most authoritative and comprehensive description of the so-called mass media of communication between the United States and the rest of the world."

Second to appear was "Freedom of the Movies" by Ruth Inglis of our staff. Its reviewers have called it "a scholarly job" and "one of the best serious studies of the social aspects of the motion picture industry."

Third, and most recent to appear, is "The American Radio" by Llewellyn White, assistant staff director. The reviews say of it that it "is replete with information, historical and electronic," "by far the best-documented indictment ever published on radio."

There are three more books to come. . . . The last is a piece of research under any definition. It analyzes by quantitative methods the comparative completeness and objectivity with which big and little newspapers, religious, nationality-group, and labor journals, radio networks, news magazines, and news reels reported and commented on a major public event (the San Francisco conference) to the American people. . . .

Whether the $215,000 was well spent or not, it is surely too early for Mr. Liebling, Mr. Luce, or anyone else to say. Perhaps ten years from now if Mr. Liebling finds it much harder to find use material for his delightful Wayward Press series in the New Yorker, we will agree that it was not money wasted.

Dr Is He?

Dear Sirs: I wasn't really concerned about what had happened to Mr. Luce's money, just playfully curious. And I was reviewing a book called "A Free and Responsible Press," not the other six works (three published and three to come) mentioned by Mr. Leigh. As I tried to intimate, I thought the report is a whole was on the side of the angels, although perhaps not of the angel known as Luce.

The Shape of Things

THE MOST URGENT QUESTION BEFORE THE Palestine Commission, meeting this week at Lake Success, is whether or not to visit the displaced-persons camps in Europe as part of its inquiry. The need of going there would seem self-evident, but the violent protests of the Arab representatives have created a political issue where none should have existed. Only the most narrow legalistic view of the Palestine problem would exclude the wishes and plight of the remaining Jews in Europe, particularly those without homes or nationality. The situation in the detention camps becomes more critical every month, with a new spirit of resentment and disillusionment developing among the D. P.'s. British efforts to check at its various European sources the stream of refugees moving toward Palestine, have aggravated conditions still further. In next week's issue, we shall publish a report of a recent visit to the camps by an American correspondent, Marie Syrkin. No one reading the facts she gives could fail to realize the inescapable relationship between the survival of the Jewish people and the development of a Jewish Palestine. It is this realization that the Arabs are shrewdly trying to prevent.

A FULL-DRESS DEBATE ON FOREIGN POLICY is scheduled for next week's British Labor Party conference at Margate. The revolt of the backbenchers led by Richard Crossman and Michael Foot has not subsided. This group's recently published "Keep Left" restates the case against the Bevin foreign policy and calls for drastic curtailments of Britain's foreign commitments that tie up in the armed forces hundreds of thousands of men who are badly needed in home industries. Undoubtedly, the Truman Doctrine has increased the internal party dissent. A natural reluctance to be bound to America's doubtful economic fortunes has been converted into a determination to separate Britain from involvement in what is generally interpreted as America's imperialist adventure. Even if Mr. Bevin has not seen as great a light as Aylmer Vallance suggests on page 651, the government is evidently disturbed both by criticism and by the march of events. A Labor Party pamphlet issued last Friday under the title "Cards on the Table" anticipates the Margate debate. It is at once a defense of past British policy and a declaration of independence from American economic dominance and Soviet political pressure. The frank criticisms of "Russian encroachment" and the crippling Soviet tactics in the United Nations is balanced by a cool analysis of America's post-war role—"she was both unwilling and unable to shoulder the responsibility of this immense power." The statement concedes Britain's necessarily close economic ties with the United States but "does not propose to take sides in a line-up for the next world war." By choosing a middle ground on which to fight, the government has robbed the rebels of a little of their thunder. But perhaps the pamphlet means more. Perhaps it is a harbinger of a new British foreign policy which it is not politically expedient to define with any degree of clarity. In any case, we eagerly look forward to the report on Margate which Mr. Vallance will cable for next week's Nation.

WHEN SOUTHERN FILIBUSTERERS PREVENT the passage of anti-lynching legislation, they always do so in the sacred name of states' rights. The states are dealing with the problem, they say, and progress is being made. Federal intervention would spoil everything and set the cause of justice back by decades. After what happened in Greenville, South Carolina, last week this approach should prove too brassy for even a Bilbo. Here were twenty-eight men convicting themselves and each other in written confessions; here was an excellent and able prosecutor, with all the evidence a prosecutor could desire; here was a courageous and impartial judge. But here was one thing more—a local white jury. All twenty-eight were acquitted. This is no question, then, of perverted officials, poll-tax politics, or any of those other simple phenomena by which glib Northerners explain the South and for which they offer equally simple solutions. The defendants are local heroes. Among the defense attorneys, moreover, was a local C. I. O. counsel, a man considered one of the town's liberals; yet his courtroom behavior was as rabid as his colleagues'. And several of the acquitted lynchers plan to run for public office—probably for sheriff. Clearly, then, the lynching was not an aberration but an expression of the spirit of Greenville. It will take years of slow social change to alter that spirit. But in the meantime what of the potential victims of lynch law? They are citizens of the country and entitled to its protection. Since the state is unable assure that protection, the federal government must. Federal courts are able to draw on jury panels covering a much wider area than state courts and can thus escape in some measure the effects of local feeling. But federal civil-rights statutes will have to be greatly strengthened before the Greenvilles of the South will learn that they are part of the United States.

THE SENATE'S SUPPOSEDLY "MODERATE" anti-labor bill will probably be on the President's desk by the time this comment appears in print. Its moderation, of course, is merely relative, and can be seen only when it is placed against the measure originally passed by the House—the kind of moderation that characterizes hanging as compared with boiling in oil. The President, we earnestly hope, will not allow himself to be taken in by a brazen campaign now raging in the press to make the bad look good by contrast with the worst. The fact is that the Senate version, to which the House will in all likelihood give its assent, is one of the most dangerously drawn bills ever to be offered for the President's signature. The danger lies in its deviousness. Killing the closed shop outright, for example, it pretends to compensate by upholding the union shop, but the right to this form of security is so fenced about with provisos that in practice it would soon be meaningless. Indeed, the entire process of collective bargaining, which the bill piously defends in the abstract, would be made enormously difficult by provisions for hectoring the unions and denying them recognition for a variety of frivolous and implausible reasons, while making their internal disruption a progressive certainty. The President will enhance his prestige enormously if he accompanies his veto with a message that clearly and soberly exposes the bill as the hypocrisy it is—a piece of class legislation that pretends to correct abuses but is coolly calculated to destroy the nation's trade-union movement.

HAROLD E. STASSEN IS THE LATEST OF A varied assortment of advocates of a comprehensive, long-term foreign-loan program for building "worldwide peace and plenty and freedom." An analysis of current trade figures by Keith Hutchison which appears on page 659 shows how urgent has become action on these lines if we are to avoid an export slump that will be disastrous to us and our foreign customers alike. Mr. Stassen's recent tour of devastated Europe has evidently convinced him that the job of reconstruction to be done cannot be tackled by grudging dribbles of assistance. His bold proposal is that 10 per cent of net American production for the next ten years be allocated to a program of reconstruction and development. That would mean something between $15 and $20 billion annually. Unfortunately, the value of this plan is destroyed by some of the conditions which Mr. Stassen wants to attach to American loans. We do not object to the suggested requirements that debtor nations agree not to discriminate against American trade and to give "unwavering support to the United Nations," though in regard to the second a difficult problem of impartial interpretation arises. But we part company very sharply with Mr. Stassen when he declares: "We should expect agreements that the governments with which we work will not move farther away from individual economic freedom and will not go down the sad trail of increasing nationalization or socialization or government ownership." In other words, we should insist on usurping the legislative powers of the British, French, and other parliaments. This is dollar dictatorship with a vengeance.

THE DOWAGERS OF THE AMERICAN Revolution resolved last week at their annual convention that Constitution Hall in Washington will continue to be open only to white artists and that the United Nations is all right so long as it keeps its place. "If the U. N. can succeed, that is fine," said Mrs. Brosseau, chairman of the Resolutions Committee, putting it right up to the U. N. "Meanwhile the D. A. R. certainly doesn't want to sell out to world government. We do not want the U. N. to absorb us and do away with our sovereignty." It is not exactly news that the D. A. R. is determined not to be seduced. Still we think Mrs. Brosseau's remarks should be preserved—preferably under glass, beneath one of those drawings by Helen Hokinson.

Planning or Starvation

AT THE end of March, Congress renewed for a grudging three months the war-emergency legislation under which the government has been able to keep a check on the import and export of certain key commodities. Unless these powers are again extended before June 30, we are likely to have another demonstration of the folly of removing emergency controls before the emergency is past—this time on a world scale and with even grimmer consequences than marked the extinction of the OPA.

Without power on the part of government to direct the flow of commodities in short supply, it will be almost impossible to carry out a world program of relief and reconstruction on an effective and economical basis. As the retiring Under Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, pointed out in his speech of May 8, "It is wheat and coal and steel that are urgently required to stave off economic collapse, not just dollar credits . . . a continuation of export controls is required in order to direct exports where we want them to go and to cut down unnecessary and undesirable foreign buying in the domestic market."

But the need for controls goes beyond immediate aspects of reconstruction. More fundamental, from the standpoint of reviving a half-starved planet, is the necessity for promoting a healthy world trade, as free as mechanical arrangements can make it of the diverting effects of the almighty American dollar. This means a distribution of crucial commodities based on an over-all balance between the needs of individual countries and the total world supply. Normally, this balance might be achieved to a workable degree by the operation of the laws of supply and demand, but in the present state of world currencies those laws have little meaning. The commodities will go where the dollars are to be found, and the countries that need them most will be by-passed. There will be no inducement for Filipinos to send copra to France or for Chile to ship nitrates to the wretched farms of Greece when American soap manufacturers can buy all the copra that is available and American farmers can use all the nitrates—with payment in good American dollars. Sugar is an even more glaring case in point.

In the reverse direction, American grain, if uncontrolled, would find its way to countries with dollar credits. Removal of controls on food distribution in general would help some Latin American countries (Mexico, Venezuela, and Cuba), the Union of South Africa (amply supplied with gold), Switzerland, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, and, to some extent, China and India. But it would make for exceedingly rough going in France, Britain, the Netherlands, and Norway. Since these countries can tighten belts no further without dangerous malnutrition, their only recourse would be to use up more of their dwindling supply of dollars at the expense of other imports, such as machinery—a process that rules out reconstruction and can lead only to permanent dependence. As for the countries on relief—Greece, Poland, and the defeated powers—higher food prices, resulting from the abandonment of controls, would merely mean higher relief appropriations here at home.

The nerve center of world controls at present is the International Emergency Food Council. It is through this agency that representatives of thirty-two nations—unfortunately, the Soviet Union has refused to join—make known their needs and their total supplies of the world's crucial foods. After a process of intensive bargaining, cajoling, and mediation, periodic charts are worked out for each commodity, recommending the amount to be exported by each of the supplying nations to each of the purchasing nations. While the council's role is advisory, government acceptance has been forthcoming in a remarkably high percentage of cases, and the plan has been of inestimable help in heading off a disastrous maldistribution.

Should Congress allow the import and export controls to die, we would automatically forfeit our seat in the council, since the government would be without power to implement the recommendations of our representatives. This would be sad enough just as a setback in international sanity, but it can be disastrous in the light of the continued world emergency. In Britain it appears to be a matter of Parliamentary debate as to whether or not the country is "dying of starvation." A large part of France's winter wheat crop has been destroyed by one of the worst winters in Europe's history. The same tragic grain shortages afflict the Low Countries. Famine has raised its head in parts of Rumania, where drought destroyed the corn crop. Italians are a full thousand calories short of the minimum daily ration required for a full day's work, and Greeks, Bulgarians, and Yugoslavs are very little better off. If, in these circumstances, Congress denies the President's request for limited controls, it will shortly find out that the emergency it thought was past is just about to begin.

Dollars vs. Communism

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

WITH the President's signature attached to the Greek-Turkish aid bill, the new American foreign policy is now legally in effect. Hundreds of millions have been appropriated to carry the gospel to the heathen, with billions to follow. What remains is to select the missionaries and their leaders, arm them with dollars for gifts and credits, with guns and food, and with the sacred American "know how" which, above all benefactions, is considered a sovereign defense against communism and other disorders of ailing systems.

There are those who say the policy will fail or justify itself according to the men our government selects to administer it, and certainly any creed takes on some of the character of its prophets. But it would be foolish to bank too much on this popular notion, for the reverse is even more generally the case. Men very soon take on the character of the creed they are hired to expound, be it free enterprise or communism or Catholicism or the preeminent superiority of the Fuller brush.

Some liberal supporters of Mr. Truman's doctrine argue that opposition to communism only incidentally involves support of reactionaries: that it need not do so. They believe quite sincerely that we can and should, and even perhaps will, convert the Greek government to the democratic precepts applied in some advanced parts of the United States; or otherwise that firm American intervention will force the regime to adopt a sober and moderate course. They cite as hopeful evidence the apparent willingness of the Maximos government to accept U. N. supervision of the carrying out of an amnesty. What such people ignore is the essential meaning of the Greek struggle; with all the talk about Russian penetration and border violations they forget that a revolution is going on in Greece. The issues may be confused, but they will not be solved even by an internationally supervised amnesty. The peasants and guerrilla fighters in the mountains are not going to come out, I imagine, or give up their arms, until they know that the men responsible for the acts of the Nazi-trained security police and the armed gangs and the military repressions have been ousted from power. Otherwise their lives would be safe only as long as the amnesty observers remained on the spot. And their cause would be lost.

An amnesty in Greece will mean something when it is proclaimed by a government that wants to cooperate with the people in the mountains. And such an amnesty will not need to be supervised by Danes and Hollanders.

In spite of the efforts of its apologists, the Truman Doctrine is not supported by faith or enthusiasm. Its authors are on the defensive; its supporters are luke-warm. Nobody except a few rabid right-wingers wants to give "aid" to the interests and parties our government will have to back in a political war against Russia. They accept the new policy as the only available alternative to the proclaimed threat of Communist domination of Europe. They hope that economic and military support of weak regimes may dissolve that threat without war. They hope the operation will simultaneously revive true democracy; but they have no very live belief that it will. And soon they will learn that it can only do so if the United States is prepared, not merely to repair physical damage and stiffen weak governments and sagging currencies, but to accept and even subsidize the revolutionary changes that are needed in the countries penetrated by communism.

Since it is difficult to imagine our present Administration and, still more, our present Congress financing revolution in even its mildest and most legal forms, the chance of reviving democracy through the Truman Doctrine seems remote. And so the best administrators will be driven to a futile course of poulticing deep infections. I do not envy the man Mr. Truman finally induces to head his Greek mission.

Opponents of the new doctrine frequently insist that it will drive disgusted and despairing democrats into communism. And so it will, no doubt. It will tend to polarize political sentiment and weaken the center. But it is risky to assume that this will mean victory for the extreme left. It may have exactly the opposite effect, as was the case after World War I.

The situation in Europe then mildly paralleled the situation today. The fresh revolutionary impulse of the Soviets was spreading through the dreary wasteland left by the war. The economic system was in general collapse; populations were starving; governments were almost helpless. The central desire of the great powers was to stem revolution and restore some sort of stability.

In 1918 and 1919 the countries of Eastern Europe were mostly run by Socialists. There was a Socialist government in Vienna, a left-liberal government in Budapest; Social Democrats were dominant in the new Czechoslovak state. In Germany the moderate Socialists in control of the new Republican regime were threatened with left-wing revolts all over the country; Bavaria was briefly ruled by a left-Socialist soviet. The workers in Italy were seizing the factories. Further east, the Balkans and Hungary and Rumania were in the throes of an agrarian revolution—the “green” rising. Observers said then, as they say today: the Continent is heading into socialism; the old order is finished.

It headed into fascism instead. The process of change was checked or deflected, partly by the suicidal fight among the parties of the left, partly by the rise of counter-revolutionary forces encouraged by the big powers and financed by big business, partly by American loans which helped to patch together the frail economy of Europe. Until, at the end of the turbulent decade, the great depression knocked out the underpinnings and the whole structure crumbled into fascism and war.

It could happen again, I suppose. Only this time the destruction of values is so much more thorough, the middle class so much weaker, the need of fundamental change so much more obvious, that even a temporary renaissance of the pre-war capitalist society is hard to imagine. Perhaps the Truman Doctrine can do it. But it will take more dollars and guns than last time, both because the job is bigger and because people are reluctant to start the old cycle over again. They've “had enough”—and more. They want a change. And they will not thank the government that spends billions to prevent it.

Letter from Bilbao

[What follows is taken from a private letter smuggled out of Spain and received on May 22 in New York. It was written by a Basque labor leader whose name must obviously be suppressed.]

Bilbao, May 12

The strike is over and I want to tell you all that has happened in these past two weeks. The strike began on May 1. It was nearly total in the industrial region of Vizcaya and total in Eibar. It did not spread to San Sebastian and Pasajes as was believed the first morning. When on May 1 the workers failed to appear in the factories, the authorities were astounded. The governor immediately undertook the most drastic measures in order to smash the strike if possible the same day. Realizing that the strike was clearly a political one, he requested the owners of the factories to turn in a list of the workers, giving their full names.

In view of the measures taken by the governor, the U. G. T. (General Workers Union) and the C. N. T. (National Confederation of Workers) and the Solidaridad de Obreros Vascos met and issued a printed statement to the workers asking them not to go back to the plants until they had a guaranty that no reprisals would take place. The workers stayed out, and on the following day the strike spread to other factories. Besides, a good number of factory owners refused to deliver the lists of workers demanded by the governor.

The committee had made it clear in its first statement that the strike was not for any union or individual gains but had a definite political significance. It was a declaration on the part of the workers of their right to celebrate May 1 and an implicit condemnation of the regime. Enraged by this attitude, the governor requested the central government to send several military units from neighboring provinces. At the same time, armed Falangists began a hunt of workers through private houses and in the streets. There was a mass arrest of the most suspected elements. The prison was overcrowded, and 6,000 men were herded into the Plaza de Toros (the bull ring). You may imagine that it is not a very pleasant place to be held, with the memory of the terrible massacre in the Plaza de Toros of Badajoz [in 1936] still fresh in everyone's mind.

The strike lasted until May 12. On that day the various labor organizations ordered the men back to the factories. Although a policeman or Falangista watched the movements of practically every worker, the strike committee met regularly and was able to maintain contact with the strikers.

Now the reprisals have begun. The government is deporting the most suspected workers to other provinces of Spain as prisoners. Hundreds of others have gone to the mountains to join the resistance. Still others have succeeded in crossing the Pyrenees.

To show how jittery the authorities have become, let me name the outside contingents that were brought to Bilbao during the strike. These were the regiment of heavy artillery from Logroño, the Garellano regiment of infantry from Logroño, the Castilla regiment of infantry from Burgos, the Valencia regiment of infantry from Santander.

The spirit of the men was magnificent. The strike gave us an opportunity to take the pulse of the masses. The great majority didn't want to hear anything about the monarchy, a plebiscite, or any deal with the reaction. They want the republic only, and people who suggest compromise they call traitors.

I hope that the men who succeed in escaping will find in France the support they need. They are leaving here women and children whom we shall try to help. But we have not enough means to do so. For the moment, everything is quiet again—though not so quiet in the prisons where the Franco guards are beating the workers in the hope that they will denounce their leaders. They will have to kill all before they get a single name. It is possible that if the four hundred men still under arrest are not promptly released, a new strike of solidarity will break out. In that case, it may extend to the entire Basque country. Anyhow, people have learned to strike again; I do not say “learned to fight again” because they have never stopped fighting.

Atomic Energy for the Millions

BY LEONARD ENGEL

IT IS generally thought that the practical application of atomic energy is still ten or twenty years away, but if we want it, we can have atomic energy to use—millions of kilowatts of it—in two or three years. In ten years we can be on the way to an atomic standard of living—cities without smoke, super-convenient mechanized homes, and an inexhaustible abundance of goods without long or disagreeable labor. That we are not already on the road to the atomic age is due more to political than to scientific or technical circumstances.

At Hanford, Washington, three huge atomic piles have been in operation for nearly three years. Together they generate as much power as the Bonneville or Grand Coulee Dam. Of course, the power is not in usable form. In 1944, when the piles were built, power was not a critical need. It was time and materials that were short. So the piles were designed exclusively for the production of plutonium for bombs. Instead of being harnessed, the heat generated at Hanford is dissipated in the Columbia River by a mammoth cooling system which literally carries the river through the piles. Construction of the cooling system was a tremendous job. In fact, it would not have been much more difficult to dispose of the heat by raising steam for turbo-generators. The Hanford piles would then have produced power as well as plutonium, and half a million kilowatts—enough to meet the basic needs of a city the size of Seattle—would have been added to the nation's power resources.

Other large atomic-power plants could be built to spark the needed expansion of our economy. Yet only a small experimental unit at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, is under construction. When it is finished sometime next year, it will generate a few tens of thousands of kilowatts. No plans have been made for larger units.

The Atomic Energy Commission and top government and industry policy-makers have ostensibly been waiting on completion of the Oak Ridge plant before proceeding. But this is not the heart of the matter. It is an open secret among scientists that atomic-energy research has been at a virtual halt since V-J Day. Little work of importance has been done except possibly in the development of bigger and better bombs. Most of the great research projects that were blueprinted in the first flush of enthusiasm remain on paper. This state of affairs was exposed when the army, in response to determined scientific prodding, agreed a year ago to sell radioactive tracers—a vital tool of scientific research—produced in one of the Oak Ridge piles. A rush of orders from laboratories all over the country was anticipated. Actually, only a few hundred sales have been made.

The slowdown in atomic research was at first, no doubt, a reflection of the post-war letdown. However, when the men of science were ready for work again after their brief "holiday," they encountered a succession of formidable obstacles. The first was the Manhattan District's restrictive policies with regard to publication of war-time research. Months went by before any papers at all were released, and the final declassification of papers was so clumsily handled that the exchange of basic scientific information was delayed for many months more. Then the development of atomic energy was stalled by the long wrangle over the atomic-energy bill and the army's fight for a military veto over research. Later, the shameful campaign against Lillienthal was the road block. Finally, there has been the fact that industry is uninterested in, not to say hostile to, atomic-energy development. The thought of government-owned atomic-power plants gives industrial executives the heebies-jeebies. They show their displeasure by keeping their scientists and technicians busy in other fields; only a few of the hundreds of firms that took part in the atom-bomb project are now active in atomic research.

According to every one of the scientists associated with the development of the bomb, we already possess all the basic knowledge necessary for harnessing nuclear energy. No fundamental problem remains to be solved, declares Dr. Enrico Fermi, the man who built the first chain-reacting pile: "atomic power is solely a question of eventual technical development." This means that no necessity exists for waiting. Technical development, solution of the problems connected with the actual erection of plants, is a commodity that can be bought for delivery by a specified date. Industry buys technical development every day. If a quarter of the scientists and engineers who collaborated on the bomb were put to work on nuclear power plants, we could have half a dozen 500,000-kilowatt units in operation by 1950.

As a result of the lack of progress on the atomic front a great many serious misconceptions about atomic energy have gained wide currency. Perhaps they are a rationalization of our failure to push ahead. At any rate, they tend to suggest the remoteness and limited usefulness of atomic energy—except for military purposes.

There is, for example, a widespread notion that atomic-power plants will be dangerous and difficult to manage. We must have a whole new race of scientists and specialists, it is said, to assure their safety. Admittedly the erection and maintenance of atomic piles demand great skill. Without it serious accidents could happen. But the safety record of the war-time bomb project shows that we have the skill needed. Moreover, the operation of piles is another matter entirely. A pile is as easy to tend as an automatic coal furnace. Anyone of normal intelligence, says Fermi, can learn how in a few hours.

The atomic pile consists of lumps of uranium spaced within a graphite or heavy-water "moderator." A power pile differs from an ordinary pile mainly in being run at a higher temperature and in having some means of transferring heat to a boiler or an engine. The reaction which generates heat is the fission of atoms of Uranium 235 in the lumps of uranium. Fission occurs when neutrons collide with other U-235 atoms; this releases more neutrons, and so on in a swift chain reaction.

To regulate the flow of heat and power from the pile, one has only to control the stream of neutrons. This is easily done by inserting rods of a neutron-absorbing material like the metal cadmium into the pile. When the rods are pushed all the way in, the flow of neutrons is broken and fission stops; as the rods are withdrawn, the fission process resumes. The control mechanism is really so simple that it will in time be completely automatic.

It is also said that atomic-power plants will be prohibitively expensive (didn't the Manhattan District development cost two billion dollars?), that atomic energy will not greatly reduce the cost of power as delivered to the factory or home, and that the raw materials for its production are so scarce as to limit its usefulness. Not one of these statements is correct. For once, the truth lies with the "fantastic" stories of a new scientific discovery. The atom will quickly prove itself a limitless source of incredibly cheap power.

Three studies of the cost of atomic power have appeared in the past two years. The latest, prepared by the Northern California Association of Scientists for the Carnegie International Peace Endowment, declares that the atom is already competitive with coal at a delivered price of $6 a ton—a price for coal most of the world will never see again. And atomic engineering is in its infancy. As scientists and engineers gain experience, costs will drop. The Carnegie report, moreover, assumes a power plant that is unconventional only in having an atomic heating unit instead of a coal furnace. But the future will bring completely new methods of power generation and transmission. "Direct generation" of electricity, an old scientific dream that is now realizable, will eliminate turbines and dynamos. "Wireless transmission" will do away with expensive distribution systems. As a result, we can look forward to a reduction of power costs by a factor of ten in a generation.

When the atom flashed into the world's consciousness in August, 1945, uranium mining was under way in only four places—at Great Bear Lake in northern Canada, in Colorado, at Joachimstal in Czechoslovakia, and in the Haut Katanga district of the Belgian Congo. It has therefore been assumed that the raw materials of atomic energy are scarce. In fact, the prediction has been made that if we changed over from coal and oil to the atom, supplies would be exhausted in a few decades.

Of that there is no danger whatever. To begin with, a little fissionable material goes an astonishingly long way. Two or three pounds a day will meet the present electricity needs of power-hungry Pittsburgh. Three hundred tons a year will match the current American output of energy from coal, oil, gasoline, natural gas, and water-power. In any case, uranium is not rare. It is more abundant than antimony, mercury, and silver together. Much of it, to be sure, is widely dispersed instead of being concentrated in easily worked ore bodies. But the discovery of new deposits can be expected—after all, the search for uranium has scarcely begun. And uranium is not the only source of atomic energy. Another is thorium, which is three times as abundant as uranium. Thorium itself is not fissionable, but it can be converted into fissionable Uranium 233 by a process similar to that employed at Hanford for transforming non-fissionable Uranium 238 into fissionable plutonium.

The one really scarce raw material is Uranium 235, the only natural fissionable element. U-235 is found in conjunction with U-238. At present U-235 is essential both in power generation and in the manufacture of plutonium and U-233. For every pound of plutonium made, somewhat more than a pound of U-235 is consumed. Thus a shortage of U-235 could delay the coming of the atomic age. Piles can be designed, however, to generate plutonium, or U-233, faster than U-235 is used—to produce, in other words, an ever-growing surplus of fissionable material. Nuclear physicists are confident that such piles will be built and that they will reduce requirements of U-235 to zero long before the world's reserves of it are gone. Incidentally, the elimination of U-235 will be a major factor in reducing costs, for the processing of U-235 is one of the most expensive operations.

Clearly, then, atomic energy is entirely and immediately practicable. Now that Lilienthal has finally been confirmed, perhaps we shall move a little faster toward its development. We need it sorely. In the United States we are sliding into a new depression; in other countries hundreds of millions of people are suffering desperate hunger and poverty. The atom can change all this overnight; it can open up new agricultural and industrial frontiers in every state of the Union and every corner of the world. Those who disregard these possibilities, those who would leave the atom in military hands, are either fools or knaves.

One Country: Equal Rights

BY ELLIS ARNALL

THE Supreme Court of the United States has sustained the Interstate Commerce Commission's order in the "class-rate" case in such sweeping language as to justify a belief that the United States, after all these years, will again become one nation. It means that the South is well on its way to readmission to the Union!

The mandate of the ICC, now upheld by the Supreme Court, directs the ultimate equalization of transportation charges upon such manufactured products as move under "class rates" within the various sections of the United States. These class rates are basic measuring rates by which other rates are established. Until complete equalization is achieved, the order of the ICC puts into effect new tariffs by decreasing certain Southern and Western class rates 10 per cent and increasing corresponding Northern and Eastern rates 10 per cent.

The economic consequences of the decision are much less important than the political consequences. Of course, if the Interstate Commerce Commission proceeds to apply the same remedies to the inequities in other rates, an immediate impetus will be given to the industrialization of the South and the West. That, however, is too much to hope for. The ICC moves with a slowness that is without equal among regulatory bodies in this country.

After much prodding by the Southern Governors' Conference the ICC some years ago instituted a cost investigation and study of class rates from which stems the order so recently upheld by the United States Supreme Court. When in May, 1944, Georgia, as a sovereign state, applied to the Supreme Court of the United States for equitable relief under the Sherman and Clayton acts, the ICC took a renewed interest in its dockets and studies. It then quickly issued the order in favor of the Southern and Western states.

ELLIS ARNALL, former governor of Georgia, has taken active leadership in the fight against discriminatory freight rates.

Ellis Arnall

As seen by Oscar Berger

While the order is limited in scope it is enormously significant because it shows that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Supreme Court have recognized the existence of discrimination against the inhabitants of three-fourths of the area of the continental United States. More important than the opportunity offered a limited number of Southern and Western industrialists to compete on the national market is the establishment of the principle that the United States is one country without internal trade barriers. This is certain to evoke angry protests from the groups which are convinced that America can exist one-fourth empire and three-fourths colonial area for ruthless exploitation and spoliation. The banking interests that control the railroads of "Official Territory," sometimes through ownership of less than 5 per cent of the outstanding stock of the lines, the industrialists who have benefited by freight and wage differentials and by Western and Southern colonialism, the political puppets who work energetically for these interests—all these will be angry and shocked at the straightforward language of Justice William O. Douglas.

And a few Southerners also will agree with them. You can list such Southerners: the scalawag spokesmen for absentee or carpetbagger enterprises, the political quacks whose professional Southernism is the most lamentable misfortune to stem from Appomattox Courthouse, the men interested in retarding industry in the South so that its labor supply may be used to produce raw materials cheaply. Their screams will match those of the Eastern monopolists.

In political terms the Supreme Court's decision means that the United States is committed to at least one New Deal concept—that this is one country and that all Americans have equal rights.

The next test will come when Georgia's case reaches the nine justices. Special Master Lloyd Garrison has at his disposal an enormous mass of evidence through which Georgia seeks to prove that a conspiracy violative of the Sherman and Clayton acts exists in railroad circles. Georgia is asking that competitive free enterprise be restored in this most important field of business.

The domination of almost all the major railroads by a limited number of banking houses, the establishment of a vast hierarchy of associations, conferences, bureaus, boards, committees, agencies, and commissions for rate-making, and the use of this machinery to throttle competitive industry outside "Official Territory" constitute a challenge to the entire history of free enterprise. Obviously, whoever controls the railroads controls the economy of America. Two-thirds of the freight traffic of the nation is handled by the rail lines, compared with less than one-sixth by inland waterways and less than 6 per cent by truck. Not only individual business enterprises, not only communities, not only states, but whole sections of our country find their economic security dependent upon the freight rates they must pay to ship their goods to distant markets or to obtain their supplies. Thus the economic future of every part of the country, and of every individual, rests ultimately with the Board of Directors of the Association of American Railroads, which is dominated by representatives of Eastern lines controlled by certain banking interests.

Private government is fascism. Public ownership and operation of enterprise imply some degree of socialization, heretofore acceptable only in the case of highways, the postal service, and a limited number of local utilities, except in emergencies such as created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Georgia proposes that competition-plus-regulation be given a fair trial before the railroads force the nation into a dangerous political and social experiment that violates our customs and our way of thought.

It is significant that transportation should provide the battleground for these two major issues: the unification of our divided country, and the reversal of the trend to private government. The Supreme Court has at last answered the question whether the United States is to be a political as well as a geographic entity. The results of that decision will be jeopardized unless the court holds that private government is forbidden under our laws. But if we win the victory on both fronts, we shall be able to establish a decentralized national economy, with a better distribution of population and a more equitable distribution of wealth.

Justice Douglas's opinion holds much promise for the future. At the very least it affirms that the United States is the common country of all its citizens.

Ernest Bevin's Great Light

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, May 17

WHEN Paul of Tarsus saw a great light on the road to Damascus, his friends can hardly have been more astonished by the change in him than was the British Foreign Office by the sudden conversion which Mr. Bevin appears to have experienced during his brief stay in Warsaw on the way home from the Moscow conference. His talk with Premier Cyrankiewicz seems to have brought him abruptly round to the view that, after all, the new government of Poland is reasonably "democratic," that there must be no more sentimental British support for Mr. Mikolajczyk's right-wing Peasant Party, and that, in any event, Polish dairy produce is worth more than ideological prejudices. Back in England the Foreign Secretary lost no time in telling the Anders Poles here that it was their patriotic duty to return to their country and work for its reconstruction, and he has let his lieutenants in the Foreign Office know that the new Anglo-Polish trade pact has his unqualified blessing. Signs of a new orientation of British foreign policy are also to be seen in this week's announcement that a great expansion in British trade with the U. S. S. R. is hoped for: steel rails, machinery, and scientific instruments are to be exchanged for shipments of timber—badly needed here for the wood-starved and delayed housing program—and an allocation to Britain of a good share of the three million tons of wheat which the Soviet Union hopes to be able to export in the coming year.

How interpret this sudden change of front, coming so swiftly after Mr. Bevin's adoption at Moscow of an attitude toward the U. S. S. R. at least as "tough" as that of Mr. Marshall? One explanation suggested is that the Foreign Secretary recognized one fine morning that the Truman Doctrine would give Britain a chance to do a useful bit of export-trade promotion. Just as England's weakness was Ireland's chance, so America's unpopularity among the non-Trumanized might give its junior partner a golden opportunity. If the U. S. S. R. and the Central and Southeastern European countries within the Soviet sphere of influence were to be denied any share in the "discriminating" outward flow of loaned dollars, they would be unable to satisfy their needs by importing goods from the United States. Why not, then, encourage them to have recourse to the British market? And if supplies of Russian timber and wheat enabled Britain to draw more slowly on the dwindling dollar loan and to be a bit more "choosy" about two-dollar wheat in Chicago, so much the better!

AYLMER VALLANCE is our London correspondent.

An alternative explanation is that Mr. Bevin has been thinking primarily not of a mere stroke of good business for Britain but in terms rather of the current trend of political opinion in both the Labor movement and the electorate as a whole. The situation is complex; in weighing it up one has to take account of personal tensions and ambitions within the Cabinet and also of the growing realization within the Labor Party that though the issues have not yet come fully to the surface, it is the consequences of foreign policy that will ultimately determine the voting in the general election of 1950.

The easy success of the Labor candidate in the recent by-election at Jarrow, a Tyneside town left bankrupt by capitalist rationalization of shipbuilding in the inter-war period, showed clearly that in industrial centers, where the memories of unemployment and the means test are still vivid, there is undiminished loyalty to the government which came to power in 1945. A visit by this correspondent to the constituency during the campaign convinced him that the electors of Jarrow were unreservedly satisfied with the government's record. Any dissatisfaction is in the constituencies of Greater London and the Midlands, which did not experience the North's desperate unemployment in the thirties, and whose voters—particularly the women—are chiefly conscious now that war-boom earnings are falling, that prices are rising, and that shortages in the shops continue.

These disgruntled electors, many of whom voted Labor for the first time two years ago, have not yet got round to formulating in their minds any very intelligent criticism of governmental planning on the home front. Grounds for such criticism do, indeed, exist: though coal output under the newly inaugurated five-day week in the mines has not shown the drop which was feared, fuel supplies—allocated without real distinction between essential and unessential units of factory production—will keep the whole British manufacturing industry working during the summer months at only 80 per cent of capacity, and for even this the risk must be taken of starting next winter with barely adequate stocks and banking on the kindlier weather next February. But if by 1950 the government has been able to "get by" without cuts in rations or serious unemployment caused by shortage of raw materials, and to fill the shops a little, then London and the Midlands will as likely as not vote Labor into power again.

Indeed, so far as domestic policy is concerned, the Labor Party has even less cause for anxiety in that the long-awaited Tory program, published this week under the title of "Industrial Charter," makes singularly little appeal to the great mass of the electors. Admitting that a Tory government could not in practice do away with rationing and controls until scarcity had been replaced by abundance, the program also concedes that there could be no wholesale denationalization of industries taken over or about to be taken over by the state, and that, in fact, laissez faire is dead. What the Tories advocate instead is a sort of concordat between big business and the state which bears a suspicious resemblance to the corporative étatisme of Hitler and Mussolini. Trade associations—in plain words, monopolistic associations dominated by the big concerns—are to be responsible within each industry for allocating the use of resources distributed by the state to each sector of the nation's economy. This is not an appetizing dish to set before a country which learned a good deal of the results of monopolies, price rings, and restrictive policies during the recurrent crises and unemployment of the period between the two world wars.

The government, in short, has little to fear from a politically bankrupt opposition. If it fails to get a renewal of its mandate three years hence, the reason will be that it has dug its own grave. It need not do so, but there is a danger that the whole of Britain's experiment in gradualist socialism may be wrecked by a grandiose foreign policy and the attempt to carry excessive commitments abroad—as has been emphasized cogently by "Keep Left," a pamphlet recently published over the names of Richard Crossman, Michael Foot, and a dozen other members of the left-center group of Labor Party "rebels." "Keep Left" shows convincingly that the only sort of planning which can extricate Britain from its economic difficulties requires a big shift of man-power from the armed forces to productive industry. Already the authors of this pamphlet have scored one major success: they persuaded the government hastily to amend the conscription bill and to reduce the period of compulsory service from eighteen to twelve months. This means that even if an optimistic view be taken of the results of voluntary enlistment for the regular army, the ceiling for Britain's armed forces after 1949 will be 600,000 men. The army will have a strength not exceeding 300,000 men, of whom about half will be partially trained recruits not available for garrison duty outside Europe. The bearing of these figures on Britain's ability to play the part of a great power will doubtless be emphasized by the "rebels" at the Margate conference of the Labor Party on May 27. They will urge that we should lose no time in recutting our foreign-policy coat to conform to this prospective 50 per cent reduction in our cloth.

According to most British newspapers, Mr. Bevin was furiously angry that his Cabinet colleagues should have agreed during his absence in Moscow to a reduction in the strength of the services which is bound radically to modify British foreign policy. It is possible, however, that this interpretation of his reaction was Tory wish-fulfilment. He may have begun to be impressed by the insistence of the "rebels" that shortage of man-power is Britain's Achilles heel. He is unlikely to ignore the fact that the "bread-and-butter" Ministers in the Cabinet—Bevan, Strachey, Cripps, and Shinwell—share the point of view of the "rebels" that Labor will go down to defeat in 1950 if, like the French government in the twenties, it pursues la gloire at the expense of building up solid prosperity at home. Moreover, the Foreign Secretary can hardly overlook the return to the arena, after his illness, of Herbert Morrison, that astute supporter of the winning side.

Is it, then, to be supposed that Mr. Bevin is "bending"? Certainly in his lengthy speech to Parliament on foreign affairs he seemed to be cautiously veering away from the idea of an Anglo-American bloc against communism. While adhering to the view that money should not be poured into Germany from the west in order that reparations from current production might flow out to the east, he was at pains to speak of Russian—and Polish—claims in sympathetic terms, to refer to "friendlier feelings" in the relations between Britain and the Balkan countries, and to express confidence that when the Foreign Ministers next met, an acceptable compromise on all the issues which had defied agreement at Moscow could be worked out.

Too much perhaps should not be read into these signs of conversion: Mr. Bevin's new-found appreciation of the virtues of trade with Eastern Europe might not survive another wrestling match with Mr. Molotov in November. But at least the impression here is general that he is now sincerely opposed to a "two-world" peace which would partition Europe and leave Britain with no alternative but increasing dependence on the financial generosity of the American Congress.

India Drifts Toward Civil War

BY SHIVA RAO

Simla, May 19

MOUNTBATTEN'S dramatic dash to London yesterday for direct consultations with the British Cabinet emphasizes the urgency of a generally acceptable solution of the Indian problem. It is less than two months since he succeeded Lord Wavell as Viceroy. On the eve of this change, on February 20, Attlee announced that Britain would withdraw from India by June of next year.

It was generally understood that Mountbatten would be given a free hand to make appropriate variations in British policy so long as its broad features stood unaltered: namely, continuation of the work of the Constituent Assembly, the orderly transfer of power until the final phase of British withdrawal, and encouragement of unity in India. During these seven weeks of his viceroyalty Mountbatten has impressed everyone with his whole-hearted acceptance of the Labor government's India policy, though many officials occupying high places have been not only critics but almost saboteurs.

Analyzing the Indian situation last month, I told Nation readers that Mountbatten, having heard all sides, must begin to frame decisions of his own. That this phase had been reached was indicated early in May by the dispatch of Lord Ismay, his chief adviser, to London with proposals which would demonstrate beyond doubt the genuineness of British intentions. One point Mountbatten is generally believed to have underlined is that the situation was rapidly deteriorating and Britain could not hope to control it much longer.

Lord Ismay's discussions with Attlee and other Labor Ministers led to the announcement that the Viceroy would unfold British plans on May 17, after the first preliminary conference of the five top-ranking Indian leaders—Nehru and Patel of the Congress Party, Jinnah and Liaquat Ali Khan representing the Moslem League, and Sardar Baldev Singh as the Sikh spokesman. Within twenty-four hours came a laconic statement that the conference had been postponed until early in June. Then came the third startling report that the Viceroy would fly to London for direct consultations with the Cabinet and return to New Delhi for a conference with Indian leaders, now scheduled for June 2. The report delicately referred to the Cabinet's "general agreement" on the Viceroy's proposals. It is widely held that his visit will enable such differences as do exist to be smoothed out.

Until almost the moment of his departure from New Delhi yesterday Mountbatten busied himself with ascertaining the views of different party leaders on the latest proposals. His personal reputation is high among most classes of people. His lack of conventional rigidity has pleased the common man. He persuaded Gandhi and Jinnah to issue a joint appeal for peace, having brought the two leaders together for a talk. Gandhi has frequently spoken of the Viceroy as an honest statesman pledged to carry out the British promise. He believes, however, that withdrawal should not be delayed until June of next year but effected immediately.

What are the Viceroy's proposals which have necessitated his visit to London? No one can say authoritatively. The feature of the situation that chiefly demands a new approach is the widespread conviction among non-Moslems of the two key provinces, Bengal and Punjab, that partition of some sort is not only inevitable but eminently desirable. Last year, when three Cabinet Ministers spent several months in New Delhi, the demand for the division of India came from the Moslem League alone, all other parties opposing it. The plan which they left behind visualized a single central administration—with its jurisdiction limited, however, to three or four departments—and condemned the division of the country as dangerous to defense.

The massacres which have disgraced India since August have brought about strange political shifts. The Moslem League, while continuing to preach a divided India, demands undivided provinces so that Pakistan may include all Punjab and Bengal as well as Assam and Sind. The Hindus and Sikhs retort with a suggestion for dividing Punjab and Bengal if India as a whole must be divided. Jinnah detests the idea of divided provinces but cannot deny to non-Moslem majorities in East Punjab and West Bengal the same right to secede which he claims for Moslems throughout India. The Pathans in the northwest, in the region adjoining Afghanistan, have started a line of their own. What have they, their leaders ask, in common with the Hindus or the Moslems of India? Racially, linguistically, culturally, their affinities are with the Afghans.

It is clear that once the process of redrawing the map of India starts, alterations will not be so simple or so few as Jinnah now imagines. The princes, too, have long memories. The Nizam of Hyderabad wants to get back the rich area of Berar which he somewhat absentmindedly gave to the British a half-century ago. He wants access to the sea. When India becomes independent he will probably proclaim Hyderabad's independence. The Sikh princes, finding their territories on the boundary line which will divide the Punjab, have shown a remarkable tendency to acquire implements of war. The Sikhs have suffered terribly in the devastating riots in West Punjab, and tens of thousands of refugees have poured into the territories of the princes for relief and protection. Barely a century ago the Sikhs were the masters of Punjab and even beyond. The Rajputana princes have been holding secret conferences at which, according to reports, they are forging defensive alliances.

Thus the imminence of British withdrawal is stirring memories and ambitions of all sorts among many kinds of people. Gandhi may wander around India preaching the cult of non-violence, the unity of India, and the gospel of forgiveness—verily a modern Buddha—but how many, though they may admire or even worship him, practice his teachings? It is no secret that private armies are being formed. Crude bombs, hand grenades, flame-throwers, and rifles, not to mention knives and swords, are coming into common use when riots break out. More than a million men have been demobilized since the end of the war. They enlisted not because they were moved by principle but because they were attracted by the pay, the better food, and the clothing they received in the army. Now unemployed, they desperately seek a comparable standard of living.

These post-war problems are sufficiently formidable to tax the energies and resources of any administration. They have been almost neglected because of the pre-occupation of India's leaders with independence. British officials say that they are going and these problems are not their concern any more. A number of Indian officials have been affected by Hindu-Moslem differences. The administration no longer claims their undivided loyalty.

Mountbatten has seen the danger that India will drift toward civil war unless something big and striking is done immediately, though even that may prove too late. Wavell, whom Churchill chose for India's Viceroy when Linlithgow was too tired to continue, was a soldier, not a statesman, and proved a failure. One thing that might yet spare India the horrors of civil war would be the immediate declaration of full dominion status, coupled with the determination to stamp out all incitement to violence, whoever preached it. If Mountbatten returns to New Delhi with full authority to put such a program into effect, India may still ride out the storm. But a storm there is bound to be, and the utmost skill and vision will be needed to avert disaster.

V. Big Push Against the Valley

Knoxville, Tennessee

THE South is in many ways the social laboratory of America. A constant search goes on here for ways of improving relations with minority groups, extending political democracy, and bringing the fruits of industrialization within reach of the people of the region.

This last effort is perhaps the most spectacular and encouraging. And almost none of its inspiration can be traced to communism: the South knows little about communism as a theory and has too few resident Communists to be affected by their words or actions. This is important to remember in Knoxville, headquarters of the TVA; and it is doubly important just now when the TVA is being assailed as never before by the private-power interests and their political henchmen. While the real purpose of the TVA's enemies—to regain control of the power business—has not changed, new slogans have been coined to take advantage of the present drive against world communism and its corollary, public ownership in this country. The reactions of the people in the Tennessee Valley to these slogans are singularly illuminating. Is the TVA employee resentful or fearful because his boss is the government? Is the employee of the Alabama Power Company, which serves adjacent areas, glad that the company for which he works is privately owned? It turns out that neither is concerned about this aspect of his work. Both think well of their employers; both discuss their jobs in terms of hours, wages, and security. When they compare the two utilities they speak of the conditions of work, or the opportunities for advancement, or the pension system. "Regimentation," "collectivism," "capitalism"—these ideas do not creep into their talk.

The consumers of power, the people who use it in their homes or factories or on their farms, are just as little concerned with the boggy of communism. They are interested in the cost of power, and they favor the TVA because it sells power more cheaply than private companies. In the hills that march up almost to the borders of the city of Chattanooga, mountaineers have lived for generations, remote and isolated in their unpainted cabins. Now the city of Chattanooga is bringing TVA power to these people. And though the Tennessee mountaineers have long been celebrated in song and story as fanatical individualists, not one has refused the chance to get light or heat because it is supplied by a publicly owned generating plant. Nor have any of the other three and a quarter million people in the seven states of the Valley refused for that reason. Even the gigantic monopolies, by using so much of TVA's power, testify to the irrelevancy of arguing about the sin or virtue of public ownership.

PRIVATE INDUSTRY DEPENDS ON PUBLIC POWER

Du Pont, Alcoa, Monsanto, and Eastman are organizations which Representative Rankin himself could hardly accuse of collectivist leanings; yet they are among the ten great corporations which, with the United States installation at Oak Ridge, use 48 per cent of all the power developed by the TVA. America's great monopolies have built huge plants in the Valley because TVA power is cheap and abundant. The presidents of these companies, however, damn public ownership every time they speak at their 1947 versions of Liberty League dinners. Recently Gwilym A. Price, president of Westinghouse, one of the world's greatest producers of equipment for utility companies, went all out against collectivism. He was afraid people might fall for it in the belief that government ownership would lower prices. A survey made by the "Psychological Corporation," he said, had discovered that almost one-third of the people of the United States believed government ownership might bring lower prices. "This means," he added, "that one-third of our population has swallowed the Communist Party line and doesn't know it." Perhaps they have, but have du Pont, Union Carbon and Carbide, and Alcoa also fallen for it? They seem to be convinced that the government sells its product more cheaply than do private plants or they would not have located in the Valley. The private-utility bloc must think the same thing or they would not be trying to get Congress to make them the sole recipients and sales agents of all government-owned power.

Their actions of course have nothing to do with communism. They do, however, raise another kind of doubt. The TVA was developed with public money, yours, mine, and that of 135,000,000 other taxpayers. Monopolies use almost 48 per cent of TVA's electric power in their industrial operations; an additional 20 per cent is surplus and exported to the power lines of privately owned utility companies. On every cent's worth of that 68 per cent of TVA's power output these huge companies, in and outside the Valley, are getting a subsidy from the rest of us, for our taxes made possible the savings in power costs which they now enjoy. The success of private enterprise may be more dependent on public ownership than anyone has guessed—an idea not likely to attract the study or the sympathy of the N. A. M.

Public subsidy works queer changes. In neighboring North Carolina a textile bourbon who has opposed not only the TVA at every stage, from planning through completion, but also the REA (Rural Electrification Administration) and everything connected with either has had a conversion. When I talked to him the other day, he described with great enthusiasm a new electrically powered knitting-machine designed for home use on farms. (The textile industry would like to revive the old work-at-home contracting business, which might develop into a strike-breaking and union-busting device, especially if the farmer's wife could be listed as a textile employee with a vote in National Labor Board elections.) I asked my bourbon acquaintance whether he had changed his mind and come to the conclusion that public power was really a fine thing. The answer was pithy: "It doesn't make any difference what I think about it; TVA is here to stay, and the textile industry is going to get what benefits it can from it."

ONSLAUGHT OF THE UTILITIES

Under the protecting wing of a sympathetic Congress, David Lilienthal, in a demonstration of brilliant leadership as head of the TVA, managed until 1946 to fend off the private utilities' opposition. Now he has moved into the atomic field, and they have renewed their offensive with redoubled energy. They have launched their onslaught from many directions. One Congressional committee disapproved the appointment of Gordon Clapp as the new chairman of TVA at the same time that another was listening to the widely publicized outburst against Lilienthal. Both of these sallies failed, but in the attack the private-ownership interests revealed their long-range aims. They seek to take advantage of the Congressional mood of reaction to recapture the TVA and other public-power projects. That done, they plan to gain control of all but the military aspects of atomic energy. The stakes in both undertakings are gigantic.

Rates may be lowered to consumers, crops may be vastly improved as a result of TVA teaching and TVA phosphates, the whole region's standard of living may rise—from 1933 to 1939 it rose more than 70 per cent—but none of this counts with the utility companies. They want to control the sources of power, and now they see their big chance. They have been preparing for some years. More than a hundred big private electric-power companies have banded together as an association, the top executive of which has just registered with Congress as a lobbyist. His salary, he has disclosed, is $650,000 a year, which make him the highest paid lobbyist in Washington. In addition to this direct pressure on Congress the association employs high-powered publicists to sell the people on the incomparable virtues of private ownership. The approach is national, using pages in color in Life and other slick magazines and network radio time, locally sponsored of course. Local propaganda is not neglected by a long way. In every town and hamlet where private utilities have influence the private-power boys arrange speakers for luncheon meetings, buy local advertising, and spread the word against communism in general and the TVA in particular. Their henchmen operate in the legislatures of any state where public power is for sale or its development contemplated. In the far Northwest the private-power interests fight Bonneville with the same venom they show against TVA. They fight it even while they admit, as they did recently in the state of Washington, that only the national government can or will make the necessary investment to provide the additional power now so badly needed.

CONGRESS ON THE RAMPAGE

In Congress the House has voted for the virtual elimination of public power in the West by denying any funds at all for its future development. Senator Thomas of Oklahoma has another proposal for killing public power. His bill seems to exempt TVA's existing operations but undermines TVA's base. The Senator from Oklahoma would also take from the Department of the Interior its real power of decision over the Bonneville and Central Valley projects and place the final authority over rates and the sale of power in the hands of the Federal Power Commission. Municipalities and other agencies which now distribute electricity would lose their present preferred status, and private utilities would get first crack at the purchase of public power wholesale. This would not only end the career of public-power districts and cooperatives with one blow but wipe out yardstick rates—a consummation devoutly to be desired by the private utilities. Finally, Senator Thomas's formula adds the last straw which will break the back of every public-power project. After the Federal Power Commission gets control it will be required to include the cost of the dam in its basis for public-power rates, even though the main purpose of the dam is flood control or irrigation; as a further guaranty of high rates the Thomas bill bars the building of any dam for the specific purpose of generating power. This will effectively kill off the possibility of any differential between the rates of public and private power.

Certain private utilities would like to raise their rates now, but they think it would be politically dangerous to try it. If they did, municipalities would redouble their efforts to take over the systems and operate them under public ownership. The power boys reason that the way to stop that trend is to force existing public-power projects to sell all their power to private utilities, which will charge the consumer all the traffic will bear.

At least six bills have been introduced in Congress to check the expansion of public ownership. Some slash directly at the TVA. Action already approved on the floor of the House deprives the Department of the Interior of funds for Western irrigation and flood control as well as for public power. In order to make absolutely certain that public utilities are not even planned for, the House has eliminated funds for geologic and engineering surveys. No one in the Valley is in sympathy with this legislative rampage except such notorious pork-barrel politicians and spoilsmen as Senators McKellar and Stewart of Tennessee, who represent Crump, the czar of Memphis, not the people of the Valley.

No farmer, worker, or business man wants to see these legislative hatchet men succeed. They know that the TVA is very much more than a generator of electric energy. It is a deep waterway 650 miles long for carrying all sorts of goods, unimpeded by rapids or shallows or the snags of discriminatory freight rates. It is a chain of beautiful lakes where millions of persons can go fishing and boating. It is freedom from the fear of floods, for the Tennessee now is a completely "engineered" river, controlled as a unit, with every mile safeguarded. The TVA is industry, new industry—Valley-trained men and women work in factories which range in size from a two-man shop to the largest aluminum rolling mill in the world. Many small home-owned plants have come into being with the help of the TVA.

For the Valley people the TVA means more than a livelihood; it means almost a way of life. In former years the region was infested with malaria; in 1946, 9,300 examinations revealed only twenty-eight positive cases. Farm living has become a new experience. Electricity eases the burdens of overworked women and helps the farmers with their heavy chores. The radio brings entertainment—music and news of the world.

FERTILIZER PROGRAM ENDANGERED

When Secretary of Agriculture Anderson said recently that the United States would become a second-class nation if it did not reclaim its exhausted and eroded farm lands, he was, perhaps unintentionally, pointing up the value of what TVA has already done for farmers in checking erosion, enriching the soil, creating new pastures and forests. The improvement wrought by the TVA depends fundamentally on its fertilizer program, and this is now in jeopardy. The private-utility interests have combined with the fertilizer interests to kill it. Though the country, and the whole famine-stricken world, is terribly short of fertilizer, that does not matter if TVA plans interfere with the operation of monopoly. The National Fertilizer Association has been part of a cartel for years and has paid three fines, one of $260,000, for monopolistic practices restricting the use of fertilizers.

Were the TVA out of the fertilizer business, this monopoly would have things all its own way. The result would be particularly serious in the matter of quality, for the phosphates produced by TVA have about three times the plant-food value of commercial fertilizers, and experiments have prepared the way for stepping up even this high efficiency. To the fertilizer interests in all parts of the country all this represents a very real threat. TVA fertilizer is used in twenty-nine states under the guidance of land-grant colleges. Forty thousand farmers have already demonstrated on over five million acres that yields can be increased 30 per cent by crop rotation and the use of phosphates of high plant-food content.

These experiments have aroused so much interest that in Montana, where there are large deposits of phosphate rock, a strong movement has emerged to get Bonneville to build a dam at Hungry Horse with which to power the manufacture of the new type of fertilizer. The forces opposing public power and cheap fertilizer came in with a rush to block this proposal. The Montana Power Company, which has made a nice thing of its monopoly of electric power in the inter-mountain area, protested vehemently against the whole idea—for two reasons: Montana Power wants no competition from public power in its domain; and Montana Power is controlled by the Anaconda Copper Company, which is a large producer of the regular commercial type of phosphate fertilizer. No clearer illustration of how interlocking monopoly ownership operates to restrict industrial and agricultural development could be imagined.

Millions of farmers want fertilizer; the security of the country, Secretary Anderson said, depends on its greater use. But the private-power interests are fighting for the maintenance of the rigged fertilizer set-up. The entire country is menaced, but the Tennessee Valley is most aware of it. Here people know the stakes. They have seen the Valley progress from primitive agriculture through the electrical age. Now it is on the threshold of the atomic age. Better than any other section of the country, the Valley knows that if the production of fertilizer and electricity go under private control, the production of atomic energy will also, and then every dream of industrial democracy will be shattered.

There is strength in the Valley to fight these threats to its future. The 138 municipally owned power companies and farmers' electrical cooperatives have been tempered in previous assaults upon the TVA. They will have the support of the newspapers and the chambers of commerce of the towns which have benefited from the Valley's development; and the growing trade-union movement is taking up its share of the load.

They will win—with the country's help—and the issue on which they will win is as real as the power bloc's talk of collectivism is phony.

Del Vayo—Perón on the March

MAY 21 will remain a memorable date in the history of the Western Hemisphere. Crossing the frontiers of his own country, President Perón has set out to become the Führer of Latin America. Like every dictator of his type, he considers himself a man of destiny. His destiny is to unite all the countries south of the Rio Grande under the leadership of Argentina. The dream of a Latin American League that inspired the Congress of Panamá in 1826 is constantly working in his mind. Certainly he lacks the stature of the initiator of that idea—"the man who freed one continent and filled another with his name," as the children in the schools of Paris described Bolívar 125 years ago. But Perón possesses ambition and skill and even that fascination for the masses that throughout Latin American history has won for dictators a certain popular complicity.

His fascism has several original traits, and one can almost understand his unwillingness to appear a mere pupil of the European dictators of the thirties. But it has in common with German and Italian fascism the tendency to dominate beyond its own domain. "The revolution that does not expand dies in time and space," said General Perón last fall, in true Hitlerian style. His initial step in affirming this view was his meeting last week with President Dutra of Brazil.

Not much about that conference will come to the surface except general phrases about its symbolic importance. But whether acknowledged or not, it was the first act in the creation of a pan-American military bloc with Argentina as its center. This is a scheme that would never have had a chance of becoming a reality if the United States had not given Perón the green light by admitting Argentina to the United Nations at San Francisco. Now, thanks to that suicidal move, Argentina has become too strong diplomatically to be pushed around. In spite of the courageous but unsupported resistance of Mr. Braden, Perón already has in his pocket the key to the next pan-American conference. But this is not enough. He wants to appear there at the head of his own bloc and in a position to speak to the United States at least as equal to equal.

The movement began months ago. It first took the form of economic penetration. Chile, in spite of having elected as President a genuine anti-fascist and progressive, Gabriel Gonzales Videla, was in an extremely difficult situation. Having obtained little help from the United States, it was compelled last December to sign a trade and financial treaty with Argentina which increased Chile's dependence on its powerful neighbor and is beginning to influence its political life. To win Bolivia, which had partly slipped out of Perón's clutches through the last revolution, Argentina offered to buy as much tin as Bolivia wanted to sell at the price (76 cents a pound) La Paz was trying vainly to get from the United States and Great Britain. Bolivia was drawn back into the Argentina system. Uruguay needed financing for big hydro-electric projects; Argentina was ready with the money.

Benefiting from its neutrality in the war, which not only relieved the country of heavy military expenditures but insured an uninterrupted market for its goods in both Axis and Allied nations, Argentina today is able to extend much needed favors to its poorer neighbors.

Perón's happiest hour arrived when President Truma announced his policy of general resistance to the encroachments of communism. Franco in Europe, Perón in Argentina became volunteers in the great democratic mobilization. As a fellow-member of the United Nations, Perón's value as an ally, and even as possible leader of a continental coalition is very evident. I have not verified the rumors of an impending conference of American chiefs of staff at Rio, preliminary to the long-postponed pan-American conference and designed to lay the groundwork for what is called a "continental army." But in Argentina there is little doubt that should such a scheme materialize, the nucleus of the continental force would be the Argentine army. Undoubtedly the best-trained and equipped in Latin America, accustomed to the task of repressing Argentina's own anti-fascists trained by German Nazi officers, it would provide an effective instrument in the fight against communism.

To make this proposal more digestible to Americans who are addicted to the philosophy of the four freedoms, Sumner Welles, like other defenders of "continental solidarity," rejects the very idea that "this government should impose its own views as to the kind of representative government other independent and sovereign peoples should enjoy." But no talk about representative government can make Perón's regime anything other than pure fascism. Identifying himself as the champion of Argentina's "shirtless ones," Perón, as the report of the A. F. of L. commission to Argentina conclusively established, has liquidated the whole independent labor movement—former Congressman Rodriguez Araya, who dared expose the government's frauds, was shot in the back. In the nation's six universities 1,500 professors and instructors have been dismissed. Catholic study in the schools has been imposed by a special law. Anti-Semitism is increasing. The Congress has been made an instrument of the President-Dictator. The Supreme Court too. Habeas corpus still exists, but mainly for the benefit of certain Nazi personalities whom the United States wanted to have deported. Those who have recently been sent back to Germany are belated offerings on the altar of hemispheric solidarity.

In itself the idea of a free union of Latin American countries to resist imperialist pressure or subjugation to foreign capital is a tempting one. The trouble is that progress toward continental unity is taking place under the sign of reaction, with a fascist state in the lead. The incorporation of Latin America in the crusade against Russian totalitarianism and Communist infiltration will only result in the strengthening of a Latin American totalitarianism. American liberals who honestly want democracy and hate fascism should realize that the new foreign policy they have accepted, however reluctantly, will force upon them the role of fellow-travelers of Franco and Perón in the fantastic enterprise of destroying democracy in the name of democracy.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Bridging the Trade Gap

IN HIS recent speech at Cleveland, Mississippi, retiring Under Secretary of State Dean Acheson referred to "a disparity between production in the United States and production in the rest of the world that is staggering in its proportions." Here, even though the pace shows signs of slackening, we are still turning out goods at a rate far in excess of any previous peace-time year. In large parts of Europe and Asia production remains much below normal, thanks to war-time destruction and dislocation and, in the former continent, to a series of "acts of God" in the shape of droughts, storms, excessive cold, and floods.

One result of this disparity is the dangerously lopsided state of American foreign trade. Figures just released by the Department of Commerce show that in the first quarter of this year our exports of goods and services totaled $4.9 billion while our imports of foreign goods and services were only $1.9 billion. Assuming a flow of trade at the same rate for the rest of this year, this would mean exports of $19.6 billion and imports of $7.9 billion, and a difference between payments in and payments out of $12 billion. How is so vast a gap to be bridged? In a forecast published earlier in the year the Department of Commerce estimated the size of this gap at $7.2 billion. American loans and gifts to foreign countries, it is believed, would cover $5.8 billion of this sum, and the balance of $1.4 billion would be met from foreign reserves of gold and dollars.

Clearly, unless the trade trends of the first quarter are sharply reversed, the whole basis of this calculation is destroyed. In the absence of additional loans and gifts from the United States, foreign countries, in order to sustain their present excess purchases of American goods, would have to deplete their reserves to the extent of $5.9 billion altogether. But these reserves amount to only $17.5 billion—they have declined by a round billion in the past twelve months—and they are very unevenly distributed. Switzerland and South Africa, for instance, have ample supplies of gold and dollars in relation to their needs, while British, French, and Dutch reserves are dangerously low.

Speaking in Philadelphia on May 19, Thomas C. Blaisdel, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, said the obvious meaning of the growing trade gap was that "in 1947 either exports must be cut drastically, or imports must increase by 50 per cent, or additional loans must be made."

Current United States exports to Europe and Asia consist very largely of necessities—grain, cotton, coal, steel, transport equipment, machinery, and so forth. Any serious curtailment in their volume must entail either shorter rations or slower reconstruction or both in the importing countries. Moreover, we have to consider the effects of a sharp reduction in exports on the American economy. Until recently the tremendous home demand for goods of all kinds has overshadowed the role of exports in maintaining production. But now that the sellers' market is ending and domestic orders in some lines have fallen off, foreign customers are of increasing importance to American industry and agriculture. Certainly a sharp cut in exports would accelerate the recession which most economists believe is in the making. We must consider, too, the effect on American prestige of a marked fall in our production while other countries are still afflicted by acute shortages. As Chester Bowles's Committee on Economic Stability points out, "It would be nothing short of criminal to permit unemployment of men and factories to develop here in the face of desperate needs abroad."

The most satisfactory solution to the problem of the gap would be an increase in imports from foreign countries. To some extent the American tariff is an obstacle, but at this time it is believed that the chief reason for the lag in imports is the sheer inability of many countries to ship more goods abroad than they are now doing. In an effort to improve their trade positions and reduce the necessity for further American loans, Britain and other countries are forcing exports to the utmost, depriving their own people of badly needed commodities. But until the reconstruction and modernization of industry has proceeded farther they cannot hope to sell to America the equivalent of what they need to buy.

What of the third alternative, a substantial addition to the large amount of credit which the United States has furnished to the world in the last two years? A very astute business man whom I know, a leader in his field, has recently prepared a memorandum advocating the foreign lending of $10 billion a year for at least five years. He points out that such a program, apart from its political significance as a means of laying the economic foundations for a peaceful world, would provide a practical guaranty of sustained full production in this country. He believes that most loans would be repaid, but argues that in any case we should still be getting value for our money. Ten billion dollars is rather less than 5 per cent of present near-capacity production, and, my friend asks, what business man would not pay a 5 per cent commission to insure all-out operation of his plant?

It may be said that the United States has already poured out enormous sums in foreign aid. This is true, but the fact is that, unscathed ourselves by war, we have greatly underestimated its economic consequences in the countries that were battlefields. The job our dollars have performed so far is mainly one of relief. We have kept Europe alive, but if it is to proceed from bare sustenance to a moderate degree of prosperity, we shall have to underwrite its reconstruction. This means a sustained program instead of haphazard, last-minute rescue operations, and one directed purposefully toward the increase of productivity and the development of idle resources. Both American producers of the capital goods that will be needed and the foreign nations that will purchase them must be given an opportunity to plan ahead. As so conservative a mouthpiece of business as Barron's wrote recently, in the course of an editorial advocating more foreign lending, "Much as we may deplore it, intelligent policy planning on an over-all national and international level has become essential."

Dialogue of a Dilemma

(Scene: The Elysian fields. It is eternal spring. Herodotus and Aristophanes are having a peripatetic conversation.)

Herodotus. I have just finished a book by one of my able successors, William Hardy McNeill.* It looks as if there is much trouble in our native land.

Aristophanes. What, the Persians again?

Herodotus. No, it's more like Athens and Sparta. Furthermore, the inhabitants of Atlantis, which Poseidon raised from the ocean, are anxious to stop communism and to restore democracy.

Aristophanes. As I remember, our democracy was destroyed more than 2,000 years ago. And there was little democracy in the Byzantine or Ottoman empire and not much more under the Bavarian tyrannos Otho, his German successors, or the dictators Metaxas and Pangalos.

Herodotus. That's true, but did not the British, after defeating the E. L. A. S., instal the democratic Papandreou government?

Aristophanes. They certainly did. But, you see, this democrat in some respects resembled Cleon, whom I assailed in "The Knights," and in others resembled Alcibiades.

Herodotus. How do you mean?

Aristophanes. Well, as you know, Alcibiades, after having been dishonored as a politician in Athens, became a general, first in Sparta and then in Persia, and was recalled and made an admiral by Athens. Papandreou started as a liberal, turned Social Democrat, flirted with the E. A. M., and was a premier of the Government of National Unity, which eventually developed into a disguised dictatorship. History repeats itself—of course with slight differences. Byron in 1822 helped the Greek insurgents to conquer Athens, and in 1944 Winston Churchill, with the British army, helped to drive the Greek E. L. A. S. from Athens.

Herodotus. When you read McNeill's clear-sighted, impartial book you will see that the situation is not so simple as merely the betrayal of democracy.

This American historian, who by the way was for two crucial years assistant military attaché in Athens and is certainly no fellow-traveler, gives us a complete picture of the resistance movement, the civil war, and the ensuing reaction. I wish the Truman doctrinaires could have read this amazingly lucid, factual narrative before putting their "theory" into practice.

Aristophanes. You mean he says it was not just a fight between Communists and Democrats, the E. L. A. S. and the E. D. E. S.?

Herodotus. Certainly not, unless we indulge in the oversimplification of calling "red" or "fascist" everyone who is not in our camp. Originally every patriotic Greek supported the E. A. M. and the E. L. A. S., the National People's Liberation Army created by uniting the separate bands, the E. K. K. A., P. A. O. X., and other alphabetic combinations, into one guerrilla force which the most prominent military figures joined. The trouble began, indeed, when the British, in order to obtain the return of the King, sent enough equipment and gold for 15,000 men, to provide for the E. D. E. S. of General Zervas. This estranged all liberals and leftists.

Aristophanes. Is E. D. E. S. not short for Greek Democratic National League and is the guerrilla leader Zervas not a democrat? True, he was once commander of the bodyguard of the dictator Pangalos, but in betraying his master he became a democrat, and he recognized the Papandreou government. As I wrote in "The Frogs," "he was easy there, is easy here."

Herodotus. Whatever the democratic convictions of "Papa" Zervas, we are told by McNeill that the E. D. E. S. had no popular support, only that of the British, and that "Zervas's strength never approached that of E. L. A. S." It was, indeed, a case of nationalistic antagonisms "entangled with ideological struggles." In the elections of 1945, which the Popular Party won—though only 49 per cent of the electors voted and even so the royalists won but 231 seats out of 354—the party, McNeill says, "often advocated measures that could plausibly be called fascist."

Now when we learn that Americans want to reconcile the government supporters and the guerrillas, perhaps we should keep in mind McNeill's belief that "institutions of Western democracy hardly fitted the social and political situation in which Greece found itself."

Aristophanes. As you know, I wrote the often-quoted sentence: "Who has brought the owl to Athens?" Democracy is no commodity to be imported, and in Greece, too, it must grow out of the native soil. But is this fight between the army and the guerrillas or, as some people prefer to call them, the Communists, not just a new Barachomyomachia, a battle between frogs and mice? After all the army numbers 146,000 men and the bands at most a few thousands.

Herodotus. Number alone does not matter. Greek reactionary and Slav revolutionary are, as McNeill puts it, "an explosive mixture." Slavic peasants, in this case the Macedonians, have for many centuries had a tradition of guerrilla action. Don't forget what Philip of Macedon used to say: "The Macedonians are uncouth and boorish, and call a tub a tub." This is why they are not inclined to call the Maximos government democratic.

Aristophanes. So according to your American colleague the prerequisites of democracy are lacking. But is not the Truman doctrine aiming to create them?

Herodotus. The way to Hades is always paved with good intentions. As McNeill so convincingly proves, the crux of the Greek problem is overpopulation. This could be alleviated by considerably increasing the immigration quota to the United States and by a program of industrialization—which would, however, require an enormous expenditure. This paltry $300,000,000 would be but a drop in the bucket even if the whole amount were used to build up industries instead of to support a warfare of which no doctrinaire can foretell the end. It is a pity they have not read in my histories that "he acts most wisely who makes his plans with caution, recognizing that any untoward event may occur."

Aristophanes. How do you expect politicians to read your histories, which are commonly despised as "philosophy"? I wish they would read "The Greek Dilemma" instead. This might perhaps avert the dress rehearsal of World War III with Greece in the role of Spain—though at least Franco did not have American aid. You know the proverb: When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war. I wonder if it makes a difference when one of the Greeks is American.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

An Epic Game

BEHIND THE SILKEN CURTAIN.

By Bartley C. Crum. Simon and Schuster. $3.

THE United Nations Assembly is preparing to send out another, the nineteenth, commission to investigate the problem of Palestine—one of the world's most vexing and ominous headaches. It is therefore both timely and instructive to learn what happened to the previous commission. Bartley C. Crum, a San Francisco lawyer and American member of that body, tells its story in revealing if not complete detail, with many illuminating personal touches; and the public will be lucky if the next batch of investigators includes such a frank reporter.

The Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine, consisting of six Britons and six Americans (including Mr. Crum), was appointed by the British and American governments in December of 1945. Its purpose was to examine the situation of the European Jews and their need for emigration; to survey the political, economic, and social conditions of Palestine; and consequently to determine how best to accommodate the rights and claims of Jews and Arabs in a final settlement of the status of Palestine. The committee concluded its five months' study just one year ago. Its report was shelved, its recommendations were ignored, and it is now as though it never had existed. Mr. Crum calls its fate "one of the scandals of this post-war period." Yet his own account of how the committee worked and of the forces that undermined it emerges from the wreckage as a beacon for the future—a beacon that throws a penetrating light on the power politics which in every quarter of the globe makes peace impossible and if unchecked will make another world war inevitable. Behind the silken curtain which Mr. Crum found conveniently draped before every corridor that could lead to unpleasant facts or hopeful conclusions sounded the rustlings of fear, greed, and chicanery that might well be the death rattle of civilization.

Mr. Crum introduces his eleven fellow-members to us as one might introduce the characters of a novel. Anecdotes and suggestive snatches of talk acquaint us with men who, however competent in their own field, were—with one exception—innocent of any knowledge of the peoples whose fate they were to consider or an understanding of the conditions in Palestine they were expected to alter. Lacking this knowledge or understanding, they were free to indulge their native genius for speculation and prejudice. The composition of the committee was in fact what one might expect from the nature of the governments that created it. The British members, selected by a government that had brought Palestinian affairs to a crisis and was seeking to throw the blame for this crisis upon the momentarily obstreperous element in the Palestinian population, were—again with one exception—anti-Jewish. The American members, appointed by a government unwilling to reveal its Middle East policy, if indeed it had one, were on the whole either impartial out of indifference or pro-Jewish as a matter of sentiment. Yet despite the prevalence of purely emotional attitudes to the very last, the integrity of the committee members was such that its recommendations were indorsed by a unanimous vote. For basic honesty and an ability to adjust diverse opinions no better committee is likely to be constituted. That their work was sabotaged from the start and destroyed in the end by the forces of power politics as embodied in Washington and London makes it clear how useless it will be for the public to scrutinize any new committee or be concerned with how it functions. If we are wise we shall ignore the puppets who are now about to dance before a silken curtain under U. N. management and, instead, follow with our eyes the strings that lead to the master showmen backstage.

An intimate record of the Irish literary renaissance

Lady Gregory, beloved Irish playwright and moving spirit in the Abbey Theatre, kept intimate and revealing journals between 1916 and 1930. Here are the most interesting passages selected and edited by Lennox Robinson, and topically arranged. Lady Gregory was so deeply a part of the Celtic literary renaissance that she was known as "the god-mother of the Abbey Theatre." In her journals are vivid back-stage portraits of Sean O'Casey, Shaw, Yeats, James Stephens, and a dozen other famous figures. $3.00 at all bookstores.

At the outset these showmen revealed their hand to Mr. Crum. In Washington, before the investigation even got under way, Loy Henderson, chief of the Near East Division of the State Department, buttonholed Mr. Crum. "He took me aside and told me, 'There is one fact facing both the United States and Great Britain, Mr. Crum. That is the Soviet Union. It would be wise to bear that in mind when you consider the Palestine problem.'" The same view was conveyed to Mr. Crum by a British representative of the Foreign Office aboard the boat which took the committee to England—a representative who followed the committee in Europe, reiterating this view, and who managed to turn up in Lausanne, with the identical view, when the committee sat down to formulate their recommendations.

On the boat Mr. Crum was vouchsafed his fullest glimpse of what happens behind the curtain. He was given a résumé of the State Department's secret file on Palestine—"the existence of which," suggests Mr. Crum, "apparently not even President Truman had known." In sum, its seventeen items proved that since 1938 "each time a promise was made to American Jewry regarding Palestine, the State Department promptly sent messages to the Arab rulers discounting it and reassuring them, in effect, that regardless of what was promised publicly to the Jews, nothing would be done to change the situation in Palestine." At this point Mr. Crum adds that up to the publication of his book the State Department has not refuted the authenticity of these items or his charge that it was sabotaging American public policy. In other words, the real but secret policy of the United States government with respect to Palestine coincided with the real but secret policy of the British government. It was the policy succinctly expressed by the ubiquitous British representative of the Foreign Office when he told Mr. Crum that "the United States would do well to join Britain in establishing a cordon sanitaire of Arab states [against Russia]" and that "if Palestine were declared an Arab state, it would be a strong link in this chain."

These revelations rather amused the British members of the committee. Sir John Singleton—a judge of the King's Bench—set things straight. "Really the Jews are not the most important factor at all," he said. "The important thing is Anglo-American cooperation. Since these promises of yours [to the Arabs] have put both nations in the dock together, it only serves to bring us closer in the world ahead." "In a way unmeant by his cynicism, Sir John was right. As evidenced by their behavior even more than by their words or secret files, the American and British governments do not consider the Jews an important factor. And as evidenced by the contrast between the public promises of the Labor Party in England and the Democratic Administration and Party in America and their public actions as well as inaction with respect to the Jews of Palestine, the American and British governments are truly "in the dock together."

From this episode, as indeed from all the cloak-and-dagger stuff, secret shenanigans, and false-witnessing which are recorded by the candid Mr. Crum, one crucial inference is unmistakable. The United Nations commission which is to duplicate the work of Mr. Crum and his fellows will not and cannot reach a just or abiding solution of the Palestine problem unless the British and American governments are put in the dock and their case sifted and tried with the same impartial probing as the case of the Jews and the Arabs. The world—the American people above all—are entitled to an inquiry which will answer a few questions. What is the actual policy of the American Department of State in the Middle East—and why? What are its commercial as well as its political aims? Why—whether for the sake of oil, politics, or whatever reason—is the American government willing to deprive American manufacturers of large markets in the Middle East by perpetuating Arab feudalism and consenting to a British near-monopoly of those markets? What is the actual policy of the British Foreign Office; and under what conditions and for what ends is Britain to be allowed a permanent military base in Palestine? And what are the intentions and purposes of the Soviet Union in the Middle East? The American people are entitled to get the most accurate answers possible from the best sources available, for it is they who are now supporting both the British and American governments with their money, and it is they who may be called upon to support them with their blood.

On the surface, the Jews in Palestine and Europe are an important factor only to themselves. Britain, the United States, and the Soviet Union are playing a game in which the Jews are the ball. And when a game is played, it is always the ball that is hit. The game, however, is an epic one; and when the final score comes in, it will be found that the stakes are world war or peace. In this larger and truer aspect of the game, the Jews of Palestine and the scores of thousands more who must go there and help build a democratic, industrialized, and modern bulwark or else die of desuetude in the D. P. camps of Europe are more than a football or a pawn. It is they—and our attitude toward them—that will determine the final score.

Mr. Crum, in his conclusions, shows an eloquent understanding of the issue. "We can throw our lot," he states, "in with the forces of reaction who prop up feudalistic regimes in the Arab states in the hope that they will serve as a cordon sanitaire against the Soviets. Or we can throw our lot in with the progressive forces in the Middle East. . . . I say to my fellow-Americans that not only for the sake of the masses in the Middle East but for the sake of world peace we must encourage this development, a development of which Jewish Palestine is thus far the outstanding example."

The immediate danger, as Mr. Crum came to understand, lies in procrastination—in allowing, under a curtain of secrecy and delay, the present forces which control American and British policy to bolster Arab feudalism, slowly strangle the Western civilization inaugurated by the Jews, and perpetuate the duplicity which eats like a dry rot into the pillars of peace. Mr. Crum was quick to appraise the vileness of the Arab regimes and the misery of the Arab masses; he was quick to appreciate not only the substance but the beauty of what the Jews have accomplished in their small portion of Palestine and its promise of bettering the whole Middle East. He was alert, too, in sniffing out the spying and sabotage to which the committee was subjected. However, he was reluctant to admit—as Einstein told the committee at its first sessions—that its work was a waste of time and would serve only as a smoke screen to cover up an endless delay. Finally he saw the point—the real point of the problem and the book. "We cannot have peace," he concludes, "with a Middle East divided, half fascist, half democratic. Palestine symbolizes the crossroads, not only for our foreign policy, but for the world. Which way shall we choose?"

The Human Story

THE ANCIENT MAYA. By Sylvanus Griswold Morley. Stanford University Press. $10.

WHY—the general reader may well ask—why should anyone today take an interest in the ancient Maya? Why give your life to digging the story of a dead civilization from the overgrown ruins of Mexico and Central America? Any popular book on archaeology must deal, at least tacitly, with such questions. That is one reason why writing for the public is so much more exacting than writing for the inner circle of experts. It constitutes, in a sense, a test of the scholar's appreciation of his material—whether he can see it in the perspective of everyday life, appraise its sociological and aesthetic implications, and present it to the average person, not as an odd esoteric preoccupation, but as somehow relevant to his life and his interests.

In this case Jean Charlot's hilarious jacket design is no snare: it implies the lively fascination of the story of pre-Columbian Maya culture. Actually archaeology is not a dry and dead concern; it deals with the record of human life, and Egypt or Yucatan will yield generalizations that help to clarify the meaning of all civilization. This is peculiarly true of the American civilizations. Everything indicates that before the arrival of Europeans this hemisphere had developed quite on its own, without assistance or influence from the rest of the world, and so it serves as a kind of check on the character of human invention. If we find pyramidal structures in Yucatan as well as in Egypt and Babylon, if we find nature gods and animal fables in Mexico as well as in Greece,

It's Sinclair at his amazing best!

THE NEW LANNY BUDD NOVEL

For more than twenty years the central figure in the intrigues of two continents, Lanny Budd now engages in his most perilous missions. As President Roosevelt's secret agent, he adds still another continent to his spying and counter-spying, for he is sent to Africa before our invasion, and narrowly escapes—into wartime Germany. There, in hourly danger of discovery, he plays his undercover role among leading Nazis. Never has Lanny been so close to death as in this book when the game of international intrigue has become a desperate war for survival.

Like the other books in this great series, the latest novel is complete in itself—the amazing career of one of fiction's best-loved heroes behind the scenes of recent history.

it means, not that Egyptians and Atlanteans have been in Yucatan, but that these are some of the things the mind of man naturally tends to invent. Ways of securing food and shelter, the development of government and social forms of community living, speculation about the nature of the universe (from which religion and philosophy and the sciences spring)—human beings are concerned with these things as naturally as they breathe and sleep. To see how such problems were met by a people which had no wheat and no rice, no Arabs or Romans to borrow numerical systems from, no Phoenicians to hand on an alphabet, is a curious and fascinating study. It may well give us pause to realize that—at the time of the Middle Ages in Europe—the Mayas had the most accurate calendar that had ever been developed in this world. In a way it is the most hopeful observation that can be made about humanity, this tendency to make itself into a civilization, to invent over and over again not only the fortress but the observatory.

Actually Maya culture offers more than a proving ground for cultural speculation. It offers also art—the visual arts of some twelve hundred years of civilization, certainly the finest body of art to come down to us from pre-Columbian America. The sculpture of Quirigua and Copan, or the architecture of Tikal and Uxmal, is worth looking at for its own sake: it can hold its own with the great art of the world. Here is an artistic tradition quite distinct from those we have known, rich in its own particular mood, not only astonishing but aesthetically rewarding.

This volume has been put together with imagination, without skimping, and at a very high level of scholarship. It is not so heavy or so long as it looks, for the type is large and the illustrations frequent. The writing is clear and simple. Every tool for understanding the material has been included: there are maps, charts, and chronologies; there is a good index; and the text itself is constantly clarified by cross-references. Difficult and controversial matters, such as the correlation of the Maya chronology with the Christian calendar, are not shirked but are put out of the way in appendices. It is true that the illustrations hardly convey the high level of quality of the material, but their number and selection are excellent. This is, indeed, the very model of a popular book on a scholarly subject, written by an acknowledged expert, without compromise and without condescension. It is also our first satisfactory opportunity to read one of the most exciting stories in the history of mankind.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

THEO VAN DOESBURG, the Dutch painter, architect, and designer, was a herald of the new rationalist enlightenment that dawned with the opening of the century and faded away at the approach of Hitler. The close of that period saw Van Doesburg's own early death in 1931 at the age of forty-eight. He was for a time a collaborator of Mondrian's, but whereas Mondrian confined his energies to easel-painting, Van Doesburg extended their common ideas into architecture and interior decoration, for which they were ultimately intended by Mondrian himself. In both fields these ideas now seem somewhat premature, but only because of historical circumstances; they were not premature in easel-painting.

Yet Van Doesburg has been the only one to paint in the same direction as Mondrian with both independence and success. This was made very clear by the recent retrospective show of his paintings and designs at Art of This Century. His gift for painting was such, in fact, that one regrets that he dispersed that gift in other fields and did not concentrate more exclusively on painting. His first cubist efforts, in 1917, already show a crispness and originality that make them much more than promising apprentice pieces. And no less than six of his seven post-1920 canvases at Art of This Century are actually and sufficiently successful—which, if this is a truly representative show, is a phenomenal rate of success, equaled, perhaps, in the twenties only by Mondrian of all the School of Paris.

Van Doesburg did not confine himself to pure or primary colors, and therefore his color is somewhat duller than Mondrian's. Where Mondrian's art is stronger, intenser, more profound, we see in Van Doesburg's a greater openness, not at all the same fanaticism but rather an exuberant doctrinairism. Mondrian, perhaps, foresaw a period that would demand tenacity and fanaticism on the part of the rationalist; Van Doesburg still belonged completely to the open, all-embracing, almost irresponsible hopefulness of the first quarter of our century. Et ego in Arcadia...

The Van Doesburg show, incidentally, is the last to be given at the Art of This Century gallery, which will not reopen next season, since Miss Guggenheim plans to transfer her permanent collection of contemporary art to Italy, where she will make her home. Her departure is in my opinion a serious loss to living American art. The erratic gaiety with which Miss Guggenheim promoted "non-realistic" art may have misled some people, as perhaps her autobiography did too, but the fact remains that in the three or four years of her career as a New York gallery director she gave first showings to more serious new artists than anyone else in the country (Pollock, Hare, Baziotes, Motherwell, Rothko, Ray, De Niro, Admiral, McKee, and others). I am convinced that Peggy Guggenheim's place in the history of American art will grow larger as time passes and as the artists she encouraged mature.

Robert Motherwell is among the newer painters who received their first showing at Miss Guggenheim's gallery. At that time—almost three years ago—this writer pointed out Motherwell's promise if not his achievement. Since then I have also pointed out his failure to fulfil that promise. Now, on the occasion of his most recent show, at Samuel Kootz's last month, I have the happier task of saying how well indeed he has, in two or three pictures out of sixteen, begun to live up to it. It is not only a matter of two or three items, but that the general level of his work this year is so much higher than ever before.

The most important reason for this improvement seems to be the shift of emphasis from collage to oil; for the few collages in Motherwell's most recent show betray the same chaos that disastrously characterized the many in his previous ones. The great difference lies the oils. These used to suffer, in their turn, from an absence of ideas and substance; now they body forth in their quasi-geometric purism and accomplished implicitly a quantity of feeling and experience such as one had hardly expected of this artist. It appears as though, for Motherwell, the activity of lacing and selecting, as required by collage, could elicit nothing of that indispensable order which art demands of the artist's personality; this, in his case, could be provided only through the activity of drawing on canvas and applying paint. The resistance of the physical stuff itself was needed to produce such a splendid picture as the "Yellow Still life," which was the best thing in the show. And if the large "Construction" had not been over-painted on gravel, it could perhaps have equaled it. "In Yellow Black" is another canvas that probably would have been completely ruined if there had not been a certain reluctance to trust thin paint, an anxiety about texture and surface.

Motherwell's ambition, which is to simplify and to manipulate the results of the simplification into expression, is one that places him at the very center of a painting that is serious and ambitious in contemporary painting. The expression is that of a desire for order and rationality, and its success means that the artist has achieved such order and rationality at least for himself.

his possession; murders them and eliminates their corpses; plays the market with the whole of his profits. We see him at work on four such women. One is going up in smoke when Verdoux first appears. One is a socially prominent widow (Isobel Elsom) whom he woos industriously through most of the film; she takes him for a boulevardier. One is a sour old small-town dame (Margaret Hoffman) whose money he cajoles by stop-watch and whom he promptly murders; she thinks he is a globe-trotting civil engineer. One is a half-daft ex-tart (Martha Raye) who has hit luck in a lottery. She takes him for a sea captain. His efforts to kill her are almost the only passages of pure slapstick in the film.

A very busy little man—his business dashes him all over France and from top to bottom of society—Verdoux can visit his true home seldom. Even when he does he is likely to mix business with the pleasure. He learns from a druggist friend (Robert Lewis) about a new poison, painless and untraceable. He picks up a friendless young woman (Marilyn Nash) to try it out on, but spares her when he realizes that she, like himself, "could kill for love." When he meets her later, by accident, he cryptically brushes her off. Late in the film, long after he has retired from business, they meet again. But just then and there he is recognized by relatives of a former wife. After showing how effortlessly he could have escaped, he deliberately puts himself in the way of arrest. The film ends with the famous scenes in which Verdoux hears his sentence and explains himself, more or less, to the court and the world; pays his equally cold respects to journalism and to God; and walks to the guillotine.

Disregard virtually everything you may have read about the film. It is of interest, but chiefly as a definitive

ALTHOUGH I have been granted extra space, and propose to disregard most other considerations for brevity's sake, I can say here only a few of the things that I feel need to be said about Mr. Chaplin's new film. I can only hope that these notes may faintly suggest the frame-by-frame appreciation, the gratitude, and the tribute which we owe this great poet and his great poem; and may help some readers to enjoy more of what he has done than they otherwise might.

measure of the difference between the thing a man of genius puts before the world and the things the world is equipped to see in it. There is room neither to analyze nor to argue much about this peculiar criticism; yet in all conscience a few points must be mentioned. The ruck of these reviewers have said, for instance, that the film isn't funny; is morally questionable; is in bad taste; that Chaplin should never have stopped playing the tramp; that Raye steals her scenes with Chaplin; that Chaplin is no good at casting, writing, directing, producing; that he should have hired people, for all these jobs, who knew the techniques which have been developed since talkies began. Some brief replies:

Not funny. Not much of it is, unless you have an eye and mind for the far from cliché matters which can be probed and illuminated through poetically parodied cliché; an appetite for cold nihilistic irony; respect for an artist who subdues most of his outrageous fun to the grim central spirit of his work.

Morals. For later discussion. I could take more seriously those who have objected on these grounds if any of them had shown himself capable of recognizing an act of moral and artistic heroism when he saw it. Not one did.

Taste. "Verdoux" is in bad taste if death is, as so many Americans feel; and if it is in bad taste to treat a serious matter seriously, and to make comedy cut to the bone.

The tramp. Very young children fiercely object to even minor changes in a retold story. Older boys and girls are not, as a rule, respected for such extreme conservatism.

Raye. Verdoux cannot properly get many of the big laughs; that is what Raye is there for. She does her job beautifully, and Chaplin feeds her and feeds her beautifully. One of the finest aspects of his miraculous performance is his quiet skill and graciousness, in these many other scenes, as a feeder, a donic ringmaster, an inspired emcee.

Casting. Raye's mere presence proves that. So does Marilyn. Name one trained actress who could get that role, besides her lovely demeanor, her exactly right spirit, vitality, freshness. So does every player and player in the cast. Chaplin is the perceptive, imaginative, exact man at casting; these reviewers are less so.

Writing. Verbally most of "Verdoux" is inferior to its visual achievement; that is to say, it is only one of the most talented screen plays ever written. Chaplin also wrote the story and its eties; designed one of the few really formed movies in years; invented at least twenty-five characters who live very keenly both as social types and as individuals; and reproduced, just as cleanly and quietly, that entire grand cadé of a society which was germane to his theme. (The significant omissions are farmers and industrial workers; the world of "Verdoux" is the world of sin, gotten ill, by chance, by heritage, by crime.)

Directing. He directed this film—all the people mentioned and successes suggested above, and still others as great and greater, handling a munificent complex of characters, ideas, milieux, and tributary styles and tones with all that perfect visual wit and expressiveness and with an all but unblemished grace, force, and economy. For directing as brilliant I refer you to his own "Modern Times" and to Dovschenko's "Frontier"; there has been none since.

Production. Is criticized as stingy, and is unlike France. Instead, it is a manifesto against a kind of vulgarity in which Hollywood is drowned—the attempt to disguise emptiness with sumptuousness. It looks hand-made, not machine-turned. Like the casting and acting and directing it is poetic, not naturalistic, though naturalistic elements are finely used poetically. Verdoux's France is a highly intelligent paraphrase, or more persuasive of its place—half in the real world, half in the mind—than most films are of their supposed place, foreign, native, or imaginary.

New techniques. They are on the whole weakened derivations from styles developed before sound came, in Russia, Germany, and, in this country, by Chaplin among others; virtually nothing has been done with sound. Such as the new style is, it can be used decently; that is proved by "The Best Years of Our Lives." But in the average well-made movie, such as these reviewers praise, it signifies just this: the art of moving pictures has been so sick, for so long, that the most it can do for itself is to shift unceasingly from one bed sore to the next. Chaplin, by contrast, obviously believes that if you can invent something worth watching, the camera would hold still and clear, so that you can watch it. That is still, and will always be, one of the best possible ways to use a camera; Chaplin is the one great man who still stands up for it.

To be sure, you have to be competent to see what he puts before you; and thanks to the depravities of the latter-day "style," most of us have spoiled eyes. We cannot appreciate swiftness and un insistence; nor the bracing absence of fancy composition and prettiness; nor Chaplin's genius for "mood" when that is important (the first great shot of Verdoux's closed garden); nor for atmosphere, authenticity, and beauty in mock formlessness (some wonderful loose group shots, full of glass, gravel, gray sky, pale heads, and dark clothing, at the garden party); nor for visual wit (the astoundingly funny long shot of the lake, with the murder boat almost imperceptibly small). We are just smart enough to recognize a cliché; never enough to see how brilliantly a master can use it. So we sneer at Chaplin's frequent use of locomotive wheels, charging ever more desperately across the screen, this way and that, to mark another business trip or return; saying that he tries thus, unimaginatively, to bind together his formless continuity. But in fact these wheels do a lot at once. They are in the best sense economical; they are cumulatively funny; they cumulatively express Verdoux's ever more frantic busyness; and they wind the film up like a tight spring.

B. H.
HAGGIN

NOW I understand: what Gertrude Stein was writing all the time—with those repetitions—was opera librettos! exclaimed my companion at a performance of Virgil Thomson's "The Mother of Us All." Opera librettos for Virgil Thomson, I would say. In his new work he treats the text in the same unique way as in "Four Saints in Three Acts," and achieves similar delightful and moving results.

"By separating and differentiating the flat repetitions of a Gertrude Stein verbal sequence," I once wrote after a performance of "Four Saints," "Thomson's music articulates and differentiates them, gives them point and even sense; the music also imparts to them its own structure and climax; and its effect is often the most delightful humor. Some of the humor consists in skilful musical pointing up—by the high-lighting of a group of words, the placing of it in relation to its context—of Miss Stein's surprises and irrelevances of juxtaposition; and to these Thomson adds occasional incongruities of his own contriving between words and music—words of little or no sense or weight, music with style and structure of great emotional import and weight. But when such music is given to words like the 'led, said, wed, dead' sequence the result is very moving."

The words of "The Mother of Us All" have less poetic imagery and music, and more rational meaning—on the one hand the meaning of a sentence that is amusingly discontinuous and isolated in its context, like "He digged a pit; he digged it deep; he digged it for his brother," stated by a group of men who march across the stage during the political rally; on the other hand the meaning of a longer train of thought like Jo Loiterer's explanation of how to be funny, or Susan B. Anthony's discourse on the nature of man, with its wonderful insights. But Thomson's method is the same—by which I don't mean that he uses it mechanically; on the contrary, one is delighted by the attentiveness and freshness of attack at moment after moment that produce, so simply and often artlessly, the results that are so witty, so touching, so grand.

In addition to the pleasure from the work there was the pleasure from the beautiful performance staged by John Taras and conducted by Otto Luenig, with costumes and sets by Paul du Pont—as part of the third annual festival of contemporary American music at Columbia University.

The opera of last year's festival, Gian-Carlo Menotti's "The Medium," which I heard only recently at the Barrymore Theater, is a rather extraordinary example of the theatrical effectiveness that a sense for the theater can achieve with poor materials. The play as such is not a good play; the music as such is not good music; but each is well-contrived for the other in a combination that is extremely effective. And the work gains by the excellent performance staged by the composer and conducted by Emanuel Balaban, with costumes and sets by Horace Armistead. The curtain-raiser, "The Telephone," a sort of expanded revue-sketch, is very amusing.

One admires Laszlo Halasz's enterprise; but one wishes it were guided by the discrimination that would prevent the waste of a production of rubbish like Giordano's "Andrea Chenier." And one wishes also that it were restrained by a sense of reality—of the realities of New York City Center that make it impossible to stage a work like Strauss' "Salome" properly (I am assuming the limitations of the City Center stage were responsible for the set that lacked the cistern from which Jokanaan should ascend and into which he should descend again, and from which the arm of the executioner should thrust the silver charger with Jokanaan's head). The musical performance conducted by Mr. Halasz seemed to me excellent—with superb singing of the title role by Brenda Lewis. I speak as one who doesn't know the score; and I therefore mention one German conductor's opinion that the performance was "ohful" the orchestra was sometimes five bars separated from the voice"; but I should add that this conductor once said of Toscanini's performance of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2—the one with the impossibly high trumpet part—that "fifty percent was left out, twenty-five percent was falsch, and the rest was all right," and that I am inclined, therefore, to trust my own impression of the performance of "Salome."

Letters to the Editors

Ought to Be a Law

Dear Sirs: The Nation recently printed an article by me entitled We Need a Better Housing Bill. The New Masses of May 20 contained an article on Palestine signed by a "Charles Abrams." I am not that person, have never written for the New Masses, and am sure the New Masses will never want me to write for it.

CHARLES ABRAMS

New York, May 20

The Old Dilemma

Dear Sirs: I want to comment briefly on the letter by Katherine Anne Porter printed last week in The Nation. It was an interesting plea for a more energetic attitude on the part of American liberals. But I must confess I cannot quite make out what Miss Porter wants liberals to do—how much suppression of the far left and far right she thinks they should stand for. She seems to approve of Togliatti's severe measures for the defense of the republic mentioned in a recent article by Del Vayo, although she challenges Togliatti's good faith in proposing them and if she had her way would apply them to him as well as to the conspirators of the right.

May 31, 1947

In the United States she apparently advocates a mild version of the same theory; she would jail, or at least fire from government jobs, fascists and Communists in order to save our democracy from subversion. But what she fails to explain is how we are to accomplish this without ourselves instituting laws which would subvert our democracy; without, in fact, finding ourselves, as in paragraph one she fears we soon may do, "with a subversive-thoughts law on our books."

The Net Profit Is Less

Dear Sirs: I have difficulty in reconciling two statements appearing in the issue of May 3, 1947.

On page 501 you comment upon statements by President Earl Bunting of the N. A. M. that an increase of 15 cents an hour in wages will cost industry $4,058,000,000. You say, "It is absurd to deduct the cost of wage increases from net profits; obviously they are a charge against gross earnings, and the effect on net is much less severe than Mr. Bunting indicated."

On page 503, with reference to Harold Ruttenberg's remarks in Life, you say that "an increased steel price of $1,750,000,000 annually, . . . would be extra profit for the steelmasters."

In the first instance you state that an increase in costs would not reduce profits by a corresponding amount, and in the second instance that an increase in selling price would increase profits by a corresponding amount.

In the interests of objective thinking, don't you believe that further comment is necessary?

H. L. VAN HORN

Wayne, Pa., May 8

[We confess that we slipped in commenting on Mr. Ruttenberg's proposal. We should have written that an increase of a penny a pound in the price of steel would add $1,700,000,000 to gross profits. After the tax-collector had taken his 38 per cent cut, only $1,054,000,000 would remain as extra net profit.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 164

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 7, 1947

The Shape of Things

THE REPLACEMENT OF ONE MEMBER OF THE "moderately conservative" Smallholders Party by another as Premier of Hungary has been widely described in the American press as a "Communist coup." This is about as accurate as was the general acceptance of the Smallholders' success in the 1945 elections as a "victory for Hungarian democracy." Both comments derive, no doubt, from our easy habit of applying American political terminology to happenings in a country where, after twenty-five years of semi-fascist dictatorship, even the elementary prerequisites of a democratic election are lacking. Americans are further misled by the idea that the social attitudes and political ambitions of Hungary's dispossessed ruling class have changed overnight; whereas events have shown, as history might have led us to expect, that persons who have lost both power and property are not inclined to relinquish them for good without a struggle. One could gather from comments here that our government and press believe Hungary, occupied since its defeat by the Red army, has suddenly become a Russian satellite as the result of a change of persons, though not of parties, in the coalition Cabinet. Every country under foreign military occupation, whether an ex-enemy or an ally, is a "satellite"—as the situation of Greece convincingly proves. For the State Department to protest the forced departure of Mr. Nagy and the accession of Mr. Dinnyes is not unexpected; but from the standpoint of the Truman Doctrine it is unfortunate that threats of a "stiff note" and "strong political measures" were accompanied by an admission that "the United States will not be able to accomplish much." This advance concession of impotence is unlikely to enhance American prestige; while the threats may encourage romantically minded Hungarian reactionaries, who yearn for times past, to believe that America will help them realize their dreams. They apparently forget that the "stiff notes" will be intended primarily to appease the mounting Russophobia in this country and to express fraternal sympathy with the Hungarian banks which are about to be socialized. ✕

THE TAX REDUCTION BILL IS NOW ON THE President's desk. Although, in its passage through Congress, the beautiful and inequitable symmetry of Mr. Knutson's original 20 per cent across-the-board cut has been considerably modified, the measure remains a thoroughly bad one from every point of view except that of the moneyed supporters of the G. O. P. To these, it is the first fruit of last November's victory and they are eager to grasp it. But the President's signature is not yet assured for both he and the Secretary of the Treasury have on numerous occasions voiced their opposition to tax reductions at this time, urging the importance of using any surplus for debt reduction. Nevertheless, and in spite of the fact that a veto would probably be sustained, Mr. Truman's problem in regard to this bill is not simple. There are two major questions which he must consider: (1) Does the general economic situation call for a reduction in the current revenue surplus? (2) If so, are the tax cuts proposed by Congress well designed to insure continued prosperity? On the assumption that we are actually heading into a sharp recession, there is much to be said for reducing the current excess of government receipts over government payments. On a cash basis, taking into account payments into social-security reserves and similar items, a government surplus is now accruing at the rate of seven to eight billion dollars a year—an amount sufficient to exert a very considerable deflationary influence. Thus the President might reasonably decide that some reduction in taxes was now warranted.

BUT EVEN IF THIS IS HIS DECISION, HE IS almost bound to reject the cuts selected by Congress. What we need, as the Committee for Economic Stability pointed out in its recent report, is a tax program which leaves more money in the pockets of the low-income groups, whose purchasing power has been sharply pinched by rising prices. The present bill, however, definitely favors the higher brackets. In a full year, the $2,500 a year married man with two children will secure relief equivalent to 1.6 per cent of his net income before exemptions, while the $100,000 a year man in the same family circumstances gets 12.63 per cent of his net income. Moreover, Congress has deliberately ignored the regressive excise taxes, so swollen during the war, which bear much more heavily on low incomes than on high ones. The levies on such articles and services as cigarettes, light bulbs, cosmetics, gasoline, electric energy, telephone calls, and transport ought to be drastically reduced before relief is afforded to high-bracket incomes. We would suggest to the President, therefore, that he refuse his signature on the tax bill and ask Congress for a new measure which would spread the benefits of tax reduction more equitably.

IN EXCLUDING TWO UNITED NATIONS experts from the staff of the Palestine Inquiry Committee because one was an Arab and one a Jew, Secretary General Lie made a bad political blunder and violated an important principle. Mr. Lie explained his decision by two unconvincing statements. He said, according to the New York Times, that he wanted to prevent any possibility of "unfair criticism regarding the impartiality of the investigation." If dropping a Jew and an Arab is the method by which criticism is to be averted, presumably because both may be suspected of bias, how can Mr. Lie justify the appointment of four or five British subjects to the secretariat group attached to the Inquiry Committee? He also said that he wanted to reduce the number of political experts, since the committee could doubtless form its own opinions as it went along. The first explanation probably reflects Mr. Lie's recent unhappy experience over the staff of the Greek Border Commission, certain members of which were charged with bias and improper acts. The men were cleared after an inquiry by Mr. Lie's assistant, William H. Stoneman; but the episode may have inclined the Secretary General to err on the side of caution this time. He may also have been urged to drop the two experts by the British and Americans, who are said to prefer a staff unencumbered with either much knowledge or many opinions. The men in question, William Epstein, a Canadian, and Salek Mahmoud, an Egyptian, are generally recognized as the members of the secretariat who did the main job of preparing the material on the Palestine case. The idea of shoving the committee off on its tour of inquiry without staff experts to turn to for basic information is either stupid or it conceals a political interest that is highly questionable.

BUT QUITE ASIDE FROM ITS PROBABLE EFFECT on the quality of the job to be done, Mr. Lie's decision contravenes the theory on which service in the United Nations is based. Members of the secretariat, from Mr. Lie down, are responsible to the organization; they are U. N. employees first, and whether they are also Norwegians or Egyptians or Canadians, Protestants or Moslems or Jews is supposedly of no concern to anyone. To set up a new standard, one based on nationality or religion or a person's political views, goes beyond Mr. Lie's proper authority. He has let it be known that if the committee requests any individual expert, it can have him. This offers a possible way to restore Mr. Epstein

Mr. Mahmoud to the staff. But it is not enough. Lie should hasten to rescind his mistaken decision. the name of impartiality he has created a precedent of discrimination which should be broken immediately, before it has a chance to harden.

THE LEBANESE ELECTIONS ON MAY 25 WERE deceptive. The overwhelming majority won by the government bloc seemed to indicate popular support of a game elected in 1943 under the extraordinary stress of war, conflict over the French mandate, and the British occupation. But the four-year record of Bechara el-houry's government is one of such incoherence and corruption and such abject subservience to Britain's alignment of Lebanon with the Arab League that the regime has become increasingly unpopular, particularly in the Christian core of the country, Mount Lebanon. The defeat of the opposition group of parties, headed by former president Emil Eddé, was accomplished by the most unashamed electoral frauds; in some districts the number of votes cast was more than ten times the number of inhabitants. Many impartial observers believe that Eddé's national bloc would have won if the vote had been fair, but neither a new election nor a recount is politically conceivable. As a result of the government victory, the Lebanon will be integrated more solidly than ever into the Arab League and can be counted on to oppose strongly the Jewish cause in Palestine.

THE ONE TRULY GREAT DEMOCRAT I HAVE ever known," Carey McWilliams wrote of Evans Carlson in these pages not two months ago, "he is a man in whose presence, in these ragged times, one can still feel some confidence that greatness in human nature is not a myth." Now Carlson is dead at 51 of an overworked heart and an exhausted body. His unbroken spirit had been battered by the sledge-blows of the military system, the vilifications of his inferiors, the indifference of his complacent countrymen. "I've fallen apart like the one-horse shay," he told his friends last year, a terrible facing-up to reality for this tall Vermonter who had fought for his country and for mankind on three continents during four decades, who had once marched 2,000 miles with the Eighth Route Army. Evans Carlson was, if anything, too good a fighter. Like Stilwell on another front, he infected his troops with an enthusiasm and a devotion that could only appear unseemly to less gifted and less democratic officers. He worked so untiringly, after the formal end of the war, not to lose the war—he was one of the people who greatly helped in the early days of A. V. C. —that he was branded as a red or at least a fellow-traveler by any who could profit by such derogation. It simply happens not to be true and the only truth about Evans Carlson is that he was an independent man.

SOME DAY A HALT MAY BE CALLED BY THE American people to the psychopathic fear of communism which afflicts a large section of the present Congress. Meanwhile, the hysteria spreads, endangers liberal movements, and gives comfort to dozens of hate-mongers. Last week Representative MacDowell, chairman of the subcommittee on fascism of the House Committee on Un-American Affairs, told Washington reporters that his group had given ten minutes to the subject of fascist trends in America and had come to the conclusion that the whole thing was a bogey worked up by the Communists. As for the booklet, "Fascism in Action," prepared by the Library of Congress, he did not know when it would see daylight. The Nation reported more than a month ago that Representative Patman's bill to get it into print had been "interred in a committee pigeonhole" since February 5. Apparently, it is still there. Later last week the House Veterans' Affairs Committee reported out a bill that denied G. I. educational benefits to veterans who are Communists or belong to Communist organizations. During the war, however, we never heard any objection to a Communist serving in the armed forces or even getting killed. The bill, we trust, will not pass the House. But meanwhile it stands as a dangerous symptom of political insanity. In contrast to all this, a sane note was struck, fittingly enough, by the nation's oldest university. In issuing a charter to a chapter of American Youth for Democracy, Harvard admitted that organization's probable Communist coloration but based its decision on "a faith in the American form of government to prove its values in the free market of ideas." Could Harvard possibly put on a summer course for Washington legislators?

IT WILL COME AS A SHOCK TO A DEVOTED core of our readers to hear that Jack Barrett, the constructor of our crossword puzzle, was drowned last week when his canoe overturned in rough water on the lake at Ste. Agathe des Monts in Quebec. Barrett was an acknowledged genius in his field. He began composing crossword puzzles in New York in 1924 for the Evening Journal. Going to England in 1926, he was soon signed on to do the weekly competition puzzle for the London News of the World. When the staid Times decided upon a daily crossword, it was Jack Barrett who was called in to work out the type of puzzle that has since become world famous. In February, 1943, he came to The Nation and since then has been the delight, the bewilderment, and the dismay of our more intellectual and nimble-witted readers. There have been few jugglers of words and spaces who have so well projected a living personality into their product. We have a handfull of Barrett's last puzzles yet to be printed. A worthy successor will be hard to find.

Pass the Stratton Bill

WHAT John Gunther calls the "mixedupness" of America is magnificently and maddeningly demonstrated in our behavior toward those luckless figures of the world, the D. P.'s. We begrudge them relief, we will not repatriate them against their will, and we do not allow them to immigrate. Of the eight million "displaced persons" who wandered through Europe and Asia at the close of the war—liberated slave laborers, concentration-camp inmates, and other victims of the Third Reich—between six and seven million found their way back to what were once their homes. At most, a million and a half remained, idle and restive, huddled in bleak barracks from Belgium to China, liberated but not free.

For two years we have cared for a large share of these people through UNRRA and Military Government. There is good reason to believe that both UNRRA and army officials brought heavy pressure on their displaced wards to go back to their own countries. In some cases, according to the Refugee Defense Committee, D. P.'s who refused repatriation were constantly shifted about and subjected to harrying restrictions. But most D. P.'s remained. Their composition indicates why.

Of the 800,000 who decline to go home, the majority are Poles, Yugoslavs, and refugees from the Baltic states, fearful for various political reasons of returning to Soviet-dominated territory. Some 82,000 are Ukrainians, who are in this same category. Roughly 170,000, not more than a fifth of the total number, are Jews, many of whom fear the anti-Semitism rampant in Poland and most of whom want to go to Palestine. Others are Greeks, who with good reason desire to keep a safe distance from the little Gestapo of Napoleon Zervas; and there is a sprinkling of Czechs.

Faced with a problem more delicate than difficult, Congress so far has fallen back on its characteristic formula: when in doubt, stop spending. UNRRA was killed and Military Government appropriations were slashed. But the D. P.'s remain, and so does the problem. The next step, therefore, is to temporize—at a somewhat lower cost. To this end, the House Foreign Affairs Committee has just approved American participation in the International Refugee Organization, which will take over administration of the D. P.'s where UNRRA left off.

We are glad, of course, that the United States will take part in the I. R. O. But what does this achieve beyond immediate relief? The Russians, who will have nothing to do with the organization, still want forced repatriation or forced assimilation of the D. P.'s into the German and Austrian populations. To have their way, they need only wait until we once more tire of relief—unless in the meantime we take the only other course open, which is resettlement. Yet the Senate would not have voted in favor of I. R. O. had not Senator Vandenberg first given assurance of "completely air-tight and copper-riveted" provisions that participation would imply no change in our immigration laws.

It is at this point that perhaps the most striking instance of our national "mixedupness" occurs. A bill for dealing with the problem in the only simple, intelligent and morally defensible way has been introduced in Congress, not by a broad-minded liberal, but by Representative William G. Stratton of Illinois, a Republican isolationist of the McCormick school and a one-time member of America First. The Stratton bill has its weaknesses. It provides only for refugees now in D. P. camps in Germany, Austria, and Italy, ignoring those in North Africa, Shanghai, and elsewhere; and it is directed to the resettlement of those driven into exile by "events subsequent to the outbreak of World War II," which leaves anti-Franco refugees still out in the cold. But by and large, it is a remarkably good measure, the crux of which is that 400,000 D. P.'s would be admitted to the United States over a four-year period.

Naturally, introduction of the bill was a signal for shrieking by the self-appointed guardians of the gate. But the reaction on Capitol Hill has been far less feverish than it would have been had the proposal come from a more liberal Congressman than Stratton.

The arguments in its favor are overwhelming: We cannot indefinitely oppose the Russians on forced repatriation, and we cannot indefinitely condemn the British on Palestine, unless we are prepared to admit some of these people. The number proposed is insignificant. Under our drastic immigration laws—which incidentally would be left intact by the bill—1,076,733 persons were entitled to admission in the years from 1940 to 1946. Primarily because of the war, only 161,971 were actually admitted, with 914,762 quota numbers left unused. The Stratton bill would, in effect, merely ignore for this emergency the distribution of these quota numbers by country, and it would make use of something less than half of them in a period of four years. The immigrants would of course be subjected to the usual screening process. Expenses, temporary shelter, and guaranties against their becoming public charges would be provided by individuals and organizations. And the government would save money now spent on camps in Europe.

There is not a single argument that can decently be brought to bear against the bill—and the chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee has already discovered, to his annoyance, "a very definite propaganda movement from all over the country" in its favor. We hope he is right, and that the movement gets stronger, louder, and more insistent. It would be a national crime if the survivors of slavery were allowed now to perish of slow liberation.

Chiang Falls Back

DISPATCHES from China indicate that the stagnant political situation that has prevailed since General Marshall's return to the United States has ended with a sudden weakening of the Kuomintang's position. This is due to a long series of unfavorable developments—political, military, and economic. If the recent reorganization of the Cabinet to include the Young China and Social Democratic parties was designed to broaden the government's base of support, it has failed to gain its objective. Chinese newspapers speak scornfully of the tossing of "dog-bone" ministries with little power or influence to the hungry politicians of these insignificant minor parties. The most dramatic evidence of the growing opposition to the Kuomintang regime is furnished by the great student "peace" demonstrations in Nanking, Shanghai, and Peiping. Chinese students have always been the bellwethers of political change. The fact that they could organize such demonstrations in the face of the strict "thought control" in the universities reveals the depth and scope of anti-government feeling.

This feeling has undoubtedly been intensified by the pessimism found even in government circles over the progress of the anti-Communist military campaign. In the early part of the year, Kuomintang spokesmen declared that the Communists could be crushed in three months. The ease with which Yen-an was taken seemed to justify this claim. But except for Yen-an the government has little to show for its three-month "annihilation drive" against the Red Army. Important gains have been made in northern Kiangsu and southern Shantung, but these have been offset by Communist gains in Shansi and northern Honan. And the Kuomintang's promising Shantung campaign, designed to restore north-south railway traffic, ended disastrously when the crack 74th Division was cut to pieces by the government's own planes and surrendered to the enemy with its arms and equipment. Meanwhile, the Communists have scored surprising gains in a broad offensive in Manchuria, threatening such vital railroad centers as Changchun, Szepingkai, and Chinwangtao. There are indications that the heavy fighting in Shantung and Manchuria has seriously depleted the government's stocks of American-made munitions and supplies, while the Communists have added to their meager stocks through the capture of Kuomintang equipment. American observers who came in contact with the Communist troops in the Chinwangtao area are reported to have been deeply impressed by their appearance and morale.

The Kuomintang's authority is further threatened by the deepening financial crisis in the government-controlled areas. For a time it seemed as if the drastic revaluation of the Chinese dollar and measures to control foreign exchange might head off the disastrous inflation. But in recent weeks Chinese prices have again soared. On the black market, the American dollar is being quoted at nearly double its official value. China's supply of foreign exchange—abnormally high after the war—is reported to be practically exhausted, and there is little prospect of replenishing it through exports as long as Chinese currency is officially overvalued. Because of the inflation and the throttling of export trade, business activity is virtually at a standstill throughout the government-controlled regions. Famine conditions have developed in Hunan and Kwangsi since the diversion of UNRRA supplies to military use.

Although the worsening in the Kuomintang's position has provoked the usual crop of peace rumors, the attitude of the government delegates at the recent meeting of the People's Political Council makes it clear that there will be no early peace bid. Even if there were, the Communists would be unlikely to accept it under present conditions. Behind the government's firmness is undoubtedly the conviction of the C. C. and other right-wing group that the United States will intervene rather than allow the Chiang Kai-shek regime to collapse. Although Secretary Marshall has given no grounds for such a belief, the extent of American assistance in the past and the continuation of American naval and technical aid have encouraged the right-wing groups in this hope. They also believe that the logic of the Truman Doctrine operates in their behalf. To get over this stumbling-block, the middle parties have asked the United States to issue another clear-cut statement of neutrality such as President Truman made in December, 1945. Such an announcement at this time, if lived up to, would discredit the intransigent right-wing and thereby lay the basis for the only kind of coalition that could win popular support in China—a combination of the Communists and Democratic League with the center and left Kuomintang.

Five-Star Foreign Policy

BY THOMAS F. REYNOLDS

Washington, June 1

THE demise of the Department of State as the originator of the foreign policy of the United States might well be dated from May 26 of this year. That was the day on which President Truman renewed his demand on Congress for power to sell arms to the Latin American republics—to nineteen at the moment and later to twenty, when a deal can be worked out with dictator Juan Perón of Argentina. The Presidential message demonstrated that foreign policy is now and in the future will be the product not of the State Department alone but of a combination of the State, War, and Navy departments, a combination in which State is not necessarily the dominant factor.

Dean Acheson once called down the Jovian wrath of General Douglas MacArthur by reminding our proconsul in Japan that it is the role of the State Department to make policy and the role of the generals in the field to execute it. MacArthur, even at that early date, probably had some reason to doubt the complete validity of this dictum. In the present state of Washington departmental organization Acheson's thesis probably has even less validity. The State-War-Navy combination is the maker of policy, and the ingredients of political decisions, as often as not, more accurately reflect the thinking of the generals in the field and the brass on the Joint Chiefs of Staff than of the civilians in the State Department.

It is a matter of common knowledge in Washington that Spruille Braden, the Assistant Secretary of State for American Republics Affairs, opposed the whole concept of the inter-American arms-cooperation bill. By virtue of his position and responsibility Braden's opposition should have been controlling. A definition of his responsibility, for instance, was offered before a House appropriations subcommittee this spring by Ellis O. Briggs, director of the Office of American Republics Affairs. Briggs set forth that Braden is charged with "the formulation and conduct of our relations with the twenty other American republics" and "has complete charge of our relations with those countries." Were that true, President Truman's message on arms would never have gone to Congress on May 26. If the State Department official in charge actually could exercise the powers assigned to him, he could and would have recommended adversely to Secretary Marshall; Marshall would have transmitted the adverse report to the White House; the arms bill would have had a still birth.

But in the new Washington dispensation that did not happen. While Braden was conducting a valiant offensive against the War and Navy departments on the basic principle, he found himself gradually surrounded both by the generals and admirals and by former officers in his own department. Major General Donald H. Connolly, foreign liquidation commissioner in the State Department, was working busily with the Joint Chiefs of Staff in carrying out an "interim program" in South America while the larger program was still under dispute. Under that interim program $37,149,309 worth of surplus arms were peddled to the Latin republics at the bargain price of $5,063,837. "Within the limits of a small program on the list agreed to by the Joint Chiefs of Staff we have been selling limited quantities of ground equipment, navy, and air," Connolly told Congress.

The interim program was a small-scale defeat for Braden. The large-scale defeat came when President Truman sent up the arms bill and told Congress that "the army and navy, acting in conjunction with the Department of State, would be permitted to continue in the future a general program of collaboration with the armed forces of our sister republics with a view to facilitating the adoption of similar technical standards." That collaboration, if authorized by Congress, may go no farther than technical standardization, as Mr. Truman suggests. But should that be the case, Braden would be surprised and the army officers would be disappointed.

The influence of the military, of course, did not begin with the arrival at the State Department of Secretary Marshall. James F. Byrnes during his eighteen months at the foreign-policy helm was steadily nudged and sometimes buffeted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Secretaries of War and Navy, and Admiral Leahy, the Presidential Chief of Staff. Cordell Hull encountered less heavy pressure, but still was influenced by the then Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, and the consecutive Secretaries of Navy, Frank Knox and James V. Forrestal. But with the military in mufti extending their activities inside the department itself, the impact of the thinking and theorizing of the armed services is likely to be considerably greater under Marshall. Marshall is, above all, a military man, and the quality of his political statesmanship cannot escape some degree of khaki coloration. The clue to his approach in the department is perhaps best found in his final and historic report to the President as Chief of Staff—a soldier's valedictory after the day of victory, in which he incorporated some of his philosophy on a practical foreign policy.

"Our diplomacy must be wise, and it must be strong," he wrote in this report on September 1, 1945. "Nature tends to abhor weakness. The principle of the survival of the fit is generally recognized. If our diplomacy is not backed by a sound security policy, it is, in my opinion, forecast to failure. . . . The world does not seriously regard the desires of the weak." The true significance of this statement may perhaps lie in its emphasis on the importance of leading from strength. With that emphasis, the components of strength—that is, the army and navy—will become important if not deciding factors in achieving all paramount decisions.

Under that approach the actual arena of decision tends away from the State Department and toward the consultative machinery set up among the State, War, and Navy departments. It tends toward that strange, vowelless alphabetical hybrid identified as SWNCC—the State, War, and Navy Coordinating Committee. Marshall, Secretary of War Patterson, and Secretary of Navy Forrestal, a Cabinet triumvirate, will thus shape the course on which this country must seek enduring peace.

That may seem a strange composition for what amounts to a "Department of Peace." But SWNCC long has been making policy for the occupied areas. The War and Navy departments now have stepped over into the Western Hemisphere in the arms decision. It is only one step farther to assume command of over-all policy. Once that step has been taken, the civilian political planning of the Department of State becomes not the base on which the President acts but merely one-third of the grist from which the alphabetical coordinating agencies grind out a base for action.

This trend toward reliance on the generals and admirals may have a more dynamic impact on this country's final role and direction in the world than any reorganizations or perfections Marshall may accomplish inside the State Department itself. It also sheds light on the confidence with which the new Secretary is proceeding to establish a top State Department command scantily equipped with experience in the tortuous paths of diplomacy and foreign politics. If this country's course were to be shaped, as in the past, according to the findings of the technicians and experts inside the department, Marshall might have graver concern about organizing a top executive group devoid of men who have distinguished themselves in international politics. But when his department is considered one of three shaping policy, the choice of his principal assistants takes on a somewhat different complexion.

The Secretary, it appears, has out of necessity or choice discounted specialized experience in favor of aggressiveness and vigor in his initial realignment of the department. In his official hierarchy of two under secretaries and six assistant secretaries, Braden alone has detailed experience in the political problems he is assigned to handle. And Braden is on his way out. Will Clayton, the economic under secretary, has acquired an effective conversancy while working at his job. Robert A. Lovett, who is succeeding Dean Acheson as the principal under secretary, has had a distinguished banking career with Brown Brothers, Harriman and Company and proved a notable war-time administrator as Assistant Secretary of War for Air. But his former Wall Street connections and his experience in cracking production bottlenecks for the army are not necessarily preferred qualifications for a career in diplomacy at a time of great crisis. The department, moreover, will miss Acheson's painfully acquired skill in handling relations with Congress.

Of the six assistant secretaries Major General John H. Hildring is an army officer transplanted into the department by Byrnes but is also heading for retirement. Garrison Norton, the new Assistant Secretary for Transport and Communications, will not complete the second year of his State Department career until next November. William Benton is under heavy Congressional fire for his fight in behalf of the "Voice of America" and has fallen out of favor with Marshall because he could not swing his program through Congress. John E. Peurifoy, Assistant Secretary for Administration, is a still-young graduate of West Point whose fire and zeal for his job are insulated from political problems by the nature of his administrative assignment. Willard L. Thorp is an able economist whose assignment likewise largely separates him from political matters except those in the bailiwick of Clayton, his chief.

It was notable at the Moscow conference that when Marshall went into secret sessions with the Foreign Minister, he passed over the Counselor of the department, Benjamin V. Cohen, and relied instead on a former general, Walter Bedell Smith. Cohen has no protracted background of experience in world politics. But as confidant and adviser of former Secretary Byrnes, his intimate State Department background did transcend that of Smith. Cohen's friends believe that he too is on his way back to private life.

Cohen's departure would leave a serious gap, but technicalities of the Foreign Service Act threaten equally serious problems on the geographical level. John Carter Vincent and H. Freeman Matthews, the top political experts for the Far East and for Europe, have completed their span of service in the department and must, under mandate of the act, go abroad some time this year.

While beset with problems of replacement Marshall has also been attempting to reorganize constructively inside the department. Borrowing his technique from the army's general-staff system, he has created for the first time a high-level planning board in an effort to capture an over-all perspective for American foreign policy. The concept of the new Policy-Planning Staff is not unlike that of the army General Staff, under which top officers are detached from other duties and assigned to make comprehensive plans for all possible contingencies. Like the General Staff, it will have only the power of recommendation, without operational authority or responsibility. To head this committee Marshall selected the department's chief specialist on Russia, George F. Kennan, a career minister who has been lecturing at the National War College as deputy for foreign affairs.

It is worth noting, however, that as director of the staff of the planning committee Marshall selected Carl Savage, a career man of twenty years' service. Savage may be remembered as the principal author of the department's war-time apologia for pre-war events, the so-called white book "Peace and War." In the 853 pages of exposition and documents that formed that work Savage was able to find room for exactly 39 lines and only unrevealing documents on the Spanish civil war in a praising events of the ten historic years of American policy antecedent to Pearl Harbor.

The Policy-Planning Staff is directed to work through and be responsible to Under Secretary Lovett. Marshall is well aware that the exigencies of negotiating German, Austrian, and Japanese peace treaties may necessitate prolonged absences from Washington over the next twelve months. Accordingly, it is impossible for him even if time were otherwise available, to take personal control of such planning work. Thus the success of his general staff in a "Department of Peace" must, in final appraisal, rest largely on the ability of Lovett to adapt himself to the problems of modern power diplomacy and become a creative adjutant to the Secretary inside the department.

In justice to Marshall, however, the record of his operations as Secretary of State must be viewed against the hard fact that he found his department in close to an impossible situation. An agency which in 1933 counted 5,421 employees and operated on a $17,000,000 budget has been transformed into one whose activities encompass the globe. After swallowing 6,000 war-agency workers in a single gulp in 1945 in post-war consolidations, the department now is asking Congress for $178,000,000 for 24,561 employees. That is mushrooming on a gigantic scale, and it provides a very persuasive defense against the Congressional charge that Marshall is attempting to govern an unrelated jumble of bureaus.

In testifying before Representative Stefan's Appropriations subcommittee prior to his departure for Moscow last March, Secretary Marshall pointed out that the State Department is participating in the control and government of approximately 200,000,000 people in Germany, Austria, Japan, and Korea. Since then the problems of Greece and Turkey have been superimposed on that mountain of troubles. The department also is working desperately on plans to take over from the army in the not too distant future the administrative responsibility for Germany and Austria.

Anyone familiar with the difficulties of the department in attempting to convert from a "policy agency" to an "operating agency" during the war years would predict without qualification that its new operational responsibilities can lead only to chaos. But Marshall believes he can make the department work. He usually adds, in talking to his friends, "I would like to have a few weeks of grace to get started."

Bevin Wins Again

BY AYLMER VALLANCE.

London, May 31

MEETING under brilliant skies which made past and prospective fuel shortages seem remote, Margate politically was a conference held in mid-cream, where, traditionally, horses cannot be changed. The large attendance of foreign journalists and diplomatic observers, all expecting dramatic clashes between ministers and rebels or a significant reorientation of the party line, was disappointed. Unlike the Zulus who go forward to die because going backward means death, the delegates evinced a less heroic determination to die politically, even if death was unavoidable by standing still and marking time. But though the consciousness of difficult days ahead was everywhere present, the complacent temper of the delegates excluded serious expectations of electoral mortality.

A conference which defeated all rebel candidates for election to the executive committee, rejected a motion for cutting down the strength of the armed services in 1948, and gave Bevin an overwhelming demonstration of support cannot be called progressive, but neither can it be exactly described as reactionary. Left-wing speakers were generously applauded partly because they studiously disclaimed any intention of mutinously seizing the steering wheel but mainly because the conference, conscious of the massive solidarity behind its leadership, felt the party could afford the pepping-up influence of the essentially not disloyal "ginger group." Indeed, it might be said that for clearness of vision and independence of thought the conference substituted an astonishing degree of blind fidelity to a leadership which gave no convincing proof of knowing where it was going. It is admitted that the floor successfully outvoted the platform on motions condemning tied agricultural cottages and demanding equal pay for women state employees, but these are not major issues. It was obvious from the outset that whatever sympathy for the pacifists and against the Bevinites individual delegates might feel, this conference would not vote against the government on any question of confidence.

The most important day, Wednesday, was allotted to a discussion of economic policy, thus giving the rebels an opportunity to urge their central "we-can't-afford-imperialism" line. The keynote of social-democratic moderation was struck initially by Morrison, who was clearly anxious to allay the animosity caused by Shinwell's earlier declaration that only organized workers matter a tinker's curse. Morrison urged the conference to eschew a sectarian attitude, seek the cooperation of the middle class and employers, and recognize that nothing more was attainable by squeezing the rich and that the improvement of the conditions of the workers was dependent on increased effort. Although Dalton added that Britain must not bank on further foreign credits, the conference nevertheless declined to press the government to economize on military man-power and concentrated instead on one patent British weakness, the undermanned essential industries.

The discussion disclosed a conflict between the political and industrial wings of the party which left the policy in a gloriously unclarified muddle. First, Dalton announced the acceptance by the executive of the Miners' motion urging differential wage advantages for mines and other tough industries. Whereupon Deakin of the Transport Workers, indignantly voicing the right-wing Trades Union Council view, opposed any state interference with the traditional union-negotiated wage structure, and when a resolution formally advocating a comprehensive policy of wages, hours, and distribution of national income came up, it was overwhelmingly rejected.

After an inconclusive debate on man-power, Bevin's triumph on Thursday was a foregone conclusion. The rebels halfheartedly repeated the economic arguments against grandiose foreign commitments, but they neither made nor appeared keenly desirous of making any significant impression. Tactfully avoiding verbal anti-Soviet harshness, Bevin exuberantly defended his "plain, blunt, British, independent" attitude toward all sorts of troublesome foreigners. The conference applauded his declarations that, like Churchill, he declined to liquidate Britain's position in the Middle East, that he would not accept the United Nations' decision on Palestine unless the decision was unanimous, that the British diplomatic service was the best in the world, and that he still had hopes of reaching agreements on Germany and Austria which would permit further demobilization.

To sum up, the dominant impression of the conference was an unabated trust in the leadership, combined with a prevailing sense of responsibility lest differences impair the government's ability to cope administratively with the crisis which recognizably threatens to shipwreck the Cabinet's excellent legislative achievements, which were universally admitted. The result of the conference gives little indication whether Labor wants more socialism or less or closer attachment to the United States or to Europe. The exhibition of solidarity was magnificent, but the comment might be made that it was the solidarity of migratory lemmings moving en masse toward the intractable sea.

The D.P.'s—How Much Longer?

BY MARIE SYRKIN

THE Jewish D. P.'s in Germany are no longer the gaunt figures with tragic, hollow eyes we saw in the newsreels immediately after the war. The graveyard look that shocked us two years ago is gone. The men and women I met in various camps of the American zone have put on flesh, they are not visibly sick, and they are not penned behind barbed wire. They can walk freely out of the former S. S. barracks where they are housed and visit the nearby town.

Yet despite these blessings they are more bitter than in May, 1945. They talk constantly about the days when Eisenhower's troops liberated them and the G. I.'s showered the starvelings of Buchenwald and Dachau with sympathy, chocolate, and cigarettes. Then the American soldiers were friendly and the Germans were afraid if not ashamed; and then the survivors of the Nazi holocaust were sure that the world would be eager to make good the wrongs they had suffered. "We thought all doors would be opened to us," person after person said to me.

Now the D. P.'s know better. Their early naive hopefulness has given way to a mixture of despair, cynicism, and resolution. They feel abandoned and betrayed; they are sick of visitors and skeptical of committees; and they are determined to get out.

For Germany is a trap as well as a dead end. The savage irony of German soil becoming the haven for hundreds of thousands of Jews fleeing from anti-Semitic outbreaks in Eastern Europe is not lost on the D. P.'s. Of the 153,000 Jews in the American zone only 29,000 were liberated in Germany proper. The rest are "infiltrates," Jews who sought the shelter of the American zone, particularly after the massacre of Kielce. They came in the conviction that the sojourn would be brief. To use the Hebrew slogan blazoned in every camp, they were b derech, "on the way" to Palestine. None expected the temporary asylum provided by the American flag to become a virtual imprisonment on German soil.

It is a situation whose implications grow more dreadful the more one examines them. The American army, which generously kept the borders open, has grown weary of its role of host; General Clay has made that clear. The German population no longer bothers to conceal its hostility, held in leash only by the presence of the occupation authorities. In a recent poll eight out of ten Germans admitted to anti-Semitism. During the four months I spent in Germany I repeatedly heard of acts which could be interpreted either as individual crime or as anti-Jewish violence. In Regensburg a Jewish family of four was clubbed to death on the eve of Passover. The army reported, "Murder—motive, robbery." But the Jews of Regensburg were not so sure. As to lesser incidents, such as insults and brawls in street cars and trains, all agree that they indicate an increase in overall ill-will on the part of the Germans.

Along with the bitterness and despair in the D. P. camps one notes a paradoxical vitality. In many of the barracks huge figures of storm troopers are carved on the wall, but blue and white flags with the Star of David and placards bravely designating the unit as "Herz House" or "Shalom Aleichem House" have been tacked over them as if in defiance of the warriors. There is a fierce will to live among the inmates. Weddings are frequent and the birth rate is high. Many of the marriages are between persons each of whom is the sole survivor of a broken family. Photographs of the groom's wife who was gassed, the bride's husband who was shot, the children who were seized in an "action" stand on the table of the new ménage. And the middle-aged, as well as the young, bear children.

Even the much-criticized black-market operations are an expression of this extraordinary energy. One must bear in mind that the living conditions of the D. P.'s are on a wretched subsistence level. People are herded together without regard for elementary privacy or decency. In the "old" camp of Landsberg I saw squalid rooms each corner of which was occupied by a couple, or a single man or woman. Pathetic attempts to secure privacy were made by stringing blankets and newspapers across the room. The basic food ration of 2,000 calories may be adequate in quantity but is not in quality; recently the army removed the additional 200-calory ration which the Jewish D. P.'s had received, declaring that there was no further reason for preferential treatment. The food allotted consists mainly of carbohydrates. The German ration, which has fewer calories, is actually more wholesome because it has a larger proportion of protective foods. People hunger for proteins, fats, and fresh vegetables.

Warm clothing for children was seriously lacking all winter. Naturally those who do not wish their children be cold and undernourished barter whatever they can for milk, meat, or, if they are lucky, a pair of shoes. Most of the so-called black-market activity is simply trading for necessities. There are undoubtedly some slick operators among Jewish D. P.'s, but no more proportionately than in other groups, including American and British army officers.

Cigarettes are currency in Germany, and every American—G. I. or UNRRA official—knows how to get Chanel 5, Rosenthal china, or good service for the appropriate number of cigarettes. No odium seems to attach to the transaction. But the well-fed American M. P. who cheerfully displays the camera he got for two cartons of Lucky Strikes is outraged by the Jewish "black marketeer" whose stock consists of badly needed oranges, shoelaces, and soap.

Among the displaced Jews' most impressive achievements are their schools. In every camp I visited, whether an old one like Landsberg or a new one like Pocking, built for "infiltrates" eight months ago, I saw a building set aside for classrooms. In cold, dingy surroundings, with few books or other school supplies, an educational system ranging from kindergarten to high school has been established. Some of the instructors were professional teachers before the war in the great Jewish schools of Poland. Others are untrained boys and girls who managed to finish at the Gymnasium before they were driven into ghettos and concentration camps. The language of instruction is Hebrew, with English taught as a secondary language. These children are in a peculiar sense already citizens of Palestine. They know that they are "on the way" to "our land," where all griefs will be eased. "Our land" is the place where they will forget the barbed wire and the crematoriums. I have seen this simple faith in only one other group—the sabras, or native-born youth, of Palestine. The child of the Emek, rooted in the warm assurance of the soil of Palestine, and the rootless child of the D. P. camp, shivering in the chill of a German winter, dwell in the same emotional climate.

There are vocational classes for older boys and girls. Courses are given in millinery, dressmaking, radio, automobile mechanics, and the like, but the young people taking them are less content than the children who study geometry and history in Hebrew. I attended a vocational students' meeting at which grievances were voiced. I heard one plaint repeated over and over: "We have finished the course in dressmaking—or mechanics, or radio—and what now? What is the use of learning trades we can't practice?" They turned to me and asked me bitterly, "How long are we going to rot here?" "We have lost so much time," the young people cry, "the years in the ghetto, in the concentration camps, and now here!"

The leaders of the D. P. community, as well as the representatives of the voluntary agencies, are aware of the danger of enforced idleness and are busily trying to create work projects. Such available work as the maintenance and cleaning of the camp does not provide an adequate outlet for the great abundance of energy and ability pent up in intelligent, active people. Schemes are therefore being evolved for various kinds of profitable occupation. In one camp I saw a newly installed sewing project: several hundred skilled tailors were turning out coats and uniforms for an army order. The success of this undertaking showed what good work could be produced when the workers felt that their labor had social and economic value.

However, what the D. P. needs most is not to have his lot improved but to stop being a D. P. Normal human beings, with a normal will for life and useful activity, cannot be cooped up indefinitely in an intrinsically abnormal situation without catastrophe.

The "illegal" movement to Palestine is bound to increase during the summer. Few will be deflected by the fear of Cyprus. I was present at a meeting which received the message: "Kibbutz X has already reached Cyprus";

the audience burst into applause. I have heard over-aged men and women and others physically disqualified plead with the persons in charge of unauthorized immigration for permission to attempt the difficult mountain climb necessary to pass one of the borders. A man past fifty kept insisting, "But I am as strong as twenty years ago; I climbed those mountains in the first war." And an obviously feeble, middle-aged woman assured a skeptical examiner, "I am actually only thirty-five. I look older because of what I went through." When she was told gently that the road was beyond her strength, she burst into tears: "How much longer must I stay here."

A few will return to Poland, but for the majority that chapter is closed. I saw a sweet-faced little girl of twelve in a children's camp in Ulm. The matron pulled away the curls from her forehead and showed me a deep, wide cleft. The girl's history was to a certain point conventional: the father had been killed in a ghetto; the child had been hidden in a convent; the mother had somehow survived a concentration camp. After the war mother and child had been reunited in a Polish town and had set up a home again. Then came a pogrom in which the mother was murdered and the child left for dead with her head bashed in. Somehow she was found alive, nursed back to health, and sent with a group of children to the haven of the American zone, b derech. Now she speaks Hebrew and wears her hair low over her forehead to hide the monstrous injury. This child cannot return to Poland. Others have less visible but just as genuine scars.

Though the overwhelming majority still cling tenaciously to the hope of Palestine, a growing number would be willing to go to any country where they could rebuild their lives. The American consulate is besieged with applications, but so far only a few thousand of the 39,000 visas permitted by the "Truman plan" have been granted. Current quota regulations are interpreted so strictly and arbitrarily that one can only conclude that the Presidential directive to facilitate immigration is being deliberately sabotaged. Of the 39,000 visas allotted, 26,000 were reserved for persons born in Germany; a grand total of 6,524 was made available for those born in Poland, who constitute the bulk of the refugee population in Germany. So the "German" quota goes unfilled—there aren't enough eligible German survivors—while the "Polish" waiting list, at the present rate, would not be taken care of for years. And the "liberal" Truman project ends this summer.

Prospects for emigration to other countries are no rosier. Belgium wants only coal-miners. Huge, underpopulated Brazil sent a commission and finally offered to take a few hundred hand-picked individuals. And so it goes.

The Jewish D. P.'s are in a trap which they must break out of or perish. The imminent close of UNRRA and the uncertainties in regard to the U. N.'s International Refugee Organization leave no doubt that conditions will deteriorate still further. What this will mean in human misery is hard to imagine.

Palestine is still the most realistic choice. Whatever course the deliberations of the special session of the United Nations take, the trek toward the shores of the Mediterranean is bound to continue at an accelerated tempo. This is a factor which the United Nations should take into account.

Curtain Raiser for '48

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Vancouver, Washington, May 25

ADRESS rehearsal for 1948 is taking place in this mountainous corner of the state of Washington. So far it has been a pipsqueak performance, particularly on the part of the Republicans, who are too busy saving the country from Henry A. Wallace to take notice of such embarrassing matters as the 66 per cent reduction inflicted on the Bonneville Power Administration by their party in the House of Representatives.

On June 7 the voters of the Third District of Washington, which stretches from the Columbia River to the tidal flats at the lower tip of Puget Sound, pick a Congressman. The Republican nominee is Russell V. Mack, an amiable, unimaginative man who publishes the Grays Harbor Washingtonian. The Democratic candidate, Charles Savage, served the district in Congress once before. Last November he was beaten by Fred Norman, a Republican. Norman's death as the result of a heart attack made necessary the coming special election.

The Third District contains the most shockingly logged-over hillsides in the Far West. There are many deserted sawmill towns. The rails of logging railroads rust in the rain. But the region has been resuscitated by Bonneville power. Aluminum factories and shipyards have risen on backwoods meadows around Vancouver and Longview. Practically every county in the district has a publicly operated power system. Thus when the Republican House of Representatives cut the Bonneville appropriation from $20,278,000 to $6,907,800, it furnished the Democrats with a ready-made issue.

Under these circumstances it is likely that Savage will regain the seat. Another factor in his favor is the continued rise in living costs. The cheap milk and honey which, according to the 1946 promises of the Republicans, were to follow the end of the OPA have not materialized. High prices contributed more than anything else to the downfall of the Democrats last year. Now, the Republican Oregonian of Portland points out, the same issue may confound the party which has assumed responsibility on Capitol Hill.

As yet the Republicans in the district have trotted out only one issue—communism. Savage, a New Deal Democrat, won the nomination over Attorney General Smith Troy, who campaigned in support of the Truman plan for aiding Greece and Turkey. Savage polled 16,536 votes, Troy 11,555. Savage said his victory indicated that he people "intend the tide of reaction to be turned." From the Republican utterances an onlooker could reasonably assume that Stalin's name was on the ballot with Molotov as his manager. Henry Wallace's presence in the Northwest this week has intensified the red-baiting. Attila the Hun could not have aroused the G. O. P. to greater fury.

Yet this "issue" too is clouded. Last autumn Representative Hugh De Lacy became the most decisively defeated Democratic Congressional candidate in the history of the Seattle district. For sixteen years Seattle had voted overwhelmingly for the Democrats. De Lacy lost by 50,000 votes, and carried down the whole Democratic ticket.

The De Lacy contest demonstrated conclusively that voters who will support New Dealers, liberals, and left-wingers cannot be induced to vote consistently for a man whose fundamental loyalty seems to be to the Communist Party line. In 1940 De Lacy cast the only ballot against Roosevelt's renomination at the Democratic National Convention. He feared the President would involve America in the "imperialist war." When Russia was attacked, De Lacy's opinion of the war changed. And after V-J Day getting our marines out of China appeared to interest him a good deal more than such questions as public power, high prices, and veterans' housing.

Savage, a bespectacled young logger, is a liberal. A member of the C. I. O. Woodworkers, the largest union in the district, he is backed by the strong anti-Communist faction in the organization. One of his chief supporters is Manley J. Wilson, editor of The Woodworker, who has sought to eliminate Communist influence in the union. Yet the one danger to Savage's candidacy is that the Republicans may succeed in identifying him with the De Lacy crowd. They are working overtime to accomplish it, for they realize how G. O. P. prestige will suffer if the Democrats win back a House seat lost last November.

Their anxiety about the June 7 election has already had a salutary result. Western Republicans have been importuning the Senate to restore funds to Bonneville, the Fish and Wildlife Service, and the Bureau of Reclamation. The political vindictiveness which underlay the so-called House "economy" may be seen from the fact that the agencies that were cut most heavily had actually been returning money to the Treasury. The New York Times pointed out editorially last week that "as of June 30, 1946, the Bonneville Power Administration had returned . . . some $80,000,000."

Perhaps not governmental extravagance but public development of natural resources is the real target of Mr. Taber's budget balancers. Realization of this in the towns along the Columbia, Cowlitz, and Lewis rivers may send a Democrat back to Congress on June 7.

Food and Wages in France

BY LEON BLUM

Paris, May 23

THE bulk of the French people are convinced that under present economic conditions the only way to raise the purchasing power of wages, salaries, and other forms of income is by progressively lowering prices. They are equally convinced that the reduction inaugurated by governmental decree cannot be carried beyond a certain point unless there is an increase in output. This twofold conviction is at the very core of our people's thinking. Their present discontent does not mean that they are deceived or doubtful about the situation. It stems from the worry and irritation caused by the insufficient amounts of food obtainable.

In an economy of penury and disorder like ours the joint problem of wages and prices is of course inextricably bound up with the food situation. The general level of prices and in consequence the purchasing power of wages depend to a considerable extent on what proportion of the supply of food and other commodities is available at controlled prices and what proportion has been diverted from the public to the "parallel" market, commonly known as the black market. This is especially true with respect to food, whose cost is the largest item in the workingman's budget. Now it is clear that the inefficiency of the supply service, the lack of continuity in its policies, of coordination and firmness in its practice, the confusion in its administration, have hindered the regular distribution of such necessities as food and wine, have favored the development of the black market, and have provoked a race between wages and prices.

These errors in the service of supply—to which must be added in the case of wheat the natural catastrophe of the winter's intense cold—have unquestionably had repercussions in the field of wages and prices. Nevertheless, the present popular agitation seems to me largely of psychic origin. It is remarkable that public opinion is apparently less aroused because food is expensive than because stocks are inadequate and variable. It is less irritated and embittered by the abuses and scandals of the black market than by the failures of the whole provisioning system. People have reached the point where they exclaim: "Clear up this mess! We don't care whether things cost more or less, whether they are sold on the black market or not. We want to eat."

Undoubtedly the difficulty of buying food is the prime mover in the demand for higher wages. The workers who want more pay know perfectly well that it would be followed by a rise in prices, and that their real wages, above all their power to buy food, would not be increased. They have learned that once for all. But they are thoroughly exasperated by the food situation, and their wage demands are the natural, spontaneous expression of their irritation. If this discontent should continue and be aggravated, it might take a still more dangerous form.

The National Assembly is discussing the problem. In coming weeks no more important matter will come before the government. Realization of this fact has led Paul Ramadier to take on himself the direction of the supply and distribution of food.

Disunion in Vienna

BY G. E. R. GEDYE

Vienna, May 19

IN THE last five weeks Austrians have reached new depths of hunger. There has been no meat, fresh or tinned, no potatoes, no butter; grimly enough, there have been issues of "pudding powder" to people who have neither the fat nor the sugar to make a pudding, and of frozen fish when there is no fat to cook it in.

UNRRA supplies are moving steadily toward depletion. Austrian peasants, finding they can buy practically nothing with the money offered them for their produce, are withholding more and more rationed foodstuffs for barter or for sale on the black market. The output of industrial goods is hopelessly inadequate, both to supply home needs and to export in exchange for food from abroad—it is all the more so because the output of so many concerns is destined only for the Russians. But, above all, the zonal controls, which are being continued despite repeated promises that they will be done away with, are preventing the government from attempting to solve the problem of hunger by intelligently planned distribution of food stocks.

Just how bad the situation really is for the starving worker may be inferred from the following figures issued this month by the Allied Control Commission. In reading the table remember that a semi-skilled worker here earns about $6 a week, an unskilled woman $3.

Commodity	Rationed Price	Black-Market Price
Bread (kilo)	2½ cents	25 to 40 cents
Beef "	None available	$4 to $5.50
Shoes (pair)	$2.50 to $3	$40 to $100
	Rarely available
Cloth (meter)	$1.50 to $4	$30 to $100

American cigarettes (each)		10 to 12 cents

G. E. R. GEDYE is the Vienna correspondent of the London Daily Herald and the Overseas Press.

The Minister of Agriculture, Krauss (Volkspartei), recently demanded in Parliament that the Socialists agree to a 70 to 80 per cent increase in official prices paid to the peasant; failing which, deliveries would cease. He was warned by the Socialists that the only possible reply to such a move would be a general strike of the workers. No more has been heard of his demand.

There has been, all the same, a Communist-inspired drive for a general strike, which had its culmination in the scattered strikes and street demonstrations of May 5 in Vienna, but which has been completely stalled by the steady opposition and sound party discipline of the Socialists with the cooperation of the trade unions. The Communist May Day procession was interspersed with a number of lorries, moving at snail's pace in order to create the illusion that there were more of them, and chiefly supplied by Soviet-operated business concerns. These vehicles bore the slogans which were to crop up again four days later: "Away with the Calories Chancellor!" "Make the Peasants Give Us Our Potatoes!" and "Down with the Hunger Government!" And then, on May 5, came the newest slogan: "We Want a General Strike!" A number of unarmed policemen outside the Chancellery were beaten up, and some demonstrators broke into the building. Afterward the Socialist Minister of the Interior, Oscar Helmer, took pleasure in pointing out that the policemen who had been beaten were organized, as are all Viennese policemen these days, in trade unions, mostly Socialist or Communist unions.

The demonstration itself turned out to be a flop; not more than 5,000 workers allowed themselves to be exploited in the useless and wasteful event, and after eight hours of shouting slogans with Nazi-like precision the crowds dispersed.

The next day Chancellor Figl and various ministers, chiefly Socialists (Figl is of the conservative Volkspartei), received a delegation of trade-union leaders, including Communists. One of the latter sharply attacked the Chancellor, who is of peasant origin, for the failure of potato deliveries. The Chancellor replied pointedly that the main reason why Vienna got no potatoes was the refusal of the Russian authorities to permit the transport of these vital supplies from Lower Austria to the capital.

Meanwhile the shop stewards and workers' councils had reviewed the situation and decided against a general strike, especially in view of the Chancellor's promise that in the future their leaders would be consulted on all rationing questions. The situation was well summed up by a resolution of the Railwaymen's Union:

We record with great bitterness that the situation of the workers is getting steadily worse. The weekly rations announced are insufficient for two days, let alone an entire week. The health of the workers and their families is gravely threatened. But we further put on record our conviction that strikes and demonstrations are not calculated to produce more food, and only bring new dangers to the city populations. We demand that all officials should do their utmost to get food to the Viennese workers and rigorously punish all economic saboteurs.

On May 6, also, the Socialist Party held its Extraordinary General Party Congress. A long resolution was passed, expressing great indignation over the failure of the Moscow conference and demanding the earliest possible withdrawal of the bulk of the occupying forces without waiting for the conclusion of a treaty. It went on to ask for the release of schools, hospitals, and dwelling places from requisition; restoration of full control over Austria's resources to Austria's government; submission of all industries in Austria to Austrian laws and economic regulations; an end to the requisitioning of Austrian food and industrial products by any occupying power; and transfer of all costs of occupation from Austria to the power concerned.

A similar resolution was then introduced in Parliament and was accepted, with the Communists voting against every demand, though all must be obtained if the chaotic conditions in this country are to be remedied.

Taiwan: China's Unhappy Colony

BY PEGGY DURDIN

Nanking, China
WHAT was the cause of the recent uprising in Taiwan?" a correspondent asked Chen Yi, governor of the island at the time. "The fact that we had too few troops," he said.

Eighteen months ago the Nanking government had a chance to make Taiwan (Formosa) the show piece which Japan had planned it to be in the "Greater East Asia" sphere. A relatively efficient Japanese bureaucracy had monopolized the island's agriculture, trade, and industry, gearing them to Japan's economy, but in so doing, it had helped Taiwan achieve a high industrial and agricultural level. Before the war the island's annual exports were valued at $250,000,000, half the amount of the projected American loan to China. It was, and is, about thirty years ahead of mainland China in industrial development, with more factories than any Chinese province except Kiangsu. Although many plants suffered damage during the war, reserves on hand provided means for their restoration. Bank balances still existed; there were stocks of raw materials and finished products. Foreign experts calculated that with sound management and planning Taiwan industry could soon be put back on its feet. Although most top industrial positions had been held by Japanese, the Taiwanese were industrially minded and technically competent.

Before the war Taiwan had not only been self-sufficient in food but had exported half its crop. Given fertilizers and government direction, it could again produce large quantities of foodstuffs. The island was served with good highways, railways, and harbors. Its standard of living was well above that of the Chinese mainland. Electric power was plentiful; every little home had electric lights. Cities were neat and clean. Public health was good. The educational level was far above that of the average Chinese province. The people were politically alert. Japan had been forced to give them the outward form of democratic government; they had learned some of the mechanics of self-rule, and their hatred of Japan had given them a desire for the actuality. Clearly, Taiwan would be a great asset to China, and not least because the Taiwanese were happy to be reunited to the motherland.

Nanking proceeded to rule Taiwan as an inferior, subjugated colony. The government it installed was feudal, incompetent, arrogant, and corrupt. Nanking's policy was not to develop the island for the benefit of the people; it was to exploit Taiwan resources for the depleted national treasury.

To accomplish this purpose Nanking handed Taiwan over to an old-fashioned war lord. Governor Chen Yi was given absolute military, political, and economic power; Taiwan was not even granted provincial status. Chen Yi imported his government from the mainland.

PEGGY DURDIN is The Nation's correspondent in China. An article describing the March uprising and terror in Taiwan appeared two weeks ago.

Not a single department chief and only one deputy chief was a native of the island. Most of the magistrates, mayors, and judges were mainlanders. The Taiwanese soon decided they had only exchanged one oppression for another, with the Chinese as autocratic and more greedy but less efficient than the Japanese. "There are no shoemakers left in Shanghai," runs a scornful Taiwanese saying. "They are all running the government of Taiwan."

According to competent observers, corruption and nepotism riddled the administration, the operation of government-owned business, the law courts, and the police. "Take-over" of Japanese property made Taiwan a looter's paradise. Soldiers stole furniture and window panes; high officials made fortunes out of the government's strangle-hold on the economy. The Chinese mayor of one city sold the rice and cement "taken over" from the Japanese and pocketed the cash. When a local paper printed the facts of the case, the official prudently scurried to Shanghai. Several months later the government published a statement saying the matter had been "investigated" and the mayor found guiltless. The gentleman in question, whitewashed and safe, returned to Taiwan in an important army post.

During the recent riots the Taiwanese reported that huge amounts of money and gold were found in officials' houses. One school principal had been signing salary sheets for a non-existent staff and pocketing the money.

The manufacture and sale of cement are controlled by the government. Taiwanese are unable to get cement at the controlled price to repair their buildings and homes. Government agencies request and get greater allocations of cement than their projects require, sell the surplus on the black market, and pocket a nice profit.

Taiwan courts were reputed to be moderately honest under the Japanese. Chinese justice is often venal. The only sure way to get out of jail is to use bribery, say the Taiwanese. People can be arrested on suspicion alone and too frequently have no chance of a fair trial. Many wealthy Taiwanese have been arrested simply for purposes of extortion; many corrupt mainlanders have had immunity from arrest or trial.

When Japan owned or controlled the Taiwan economy, it put part of the profits back into the development of Taiwan. After the Chinese government "took over," the Taiwanese watched their country deteriorate before their eyes. "Formerly Japan got the banquet and we got the crumbs," they say. "Now there are no crumbs."

A small clique around the governor completely controls Taiwan's industry, agriculture, communications, shipping, banking. The National Resources Commission runs the petroleum-refining, aluminum, and copper-mining industries for the Nanking treasury. In cooperation with the Taiwan provincial government it manages the production of sugar, electric power, chemical fertilizer, cement, paper, and alkalies. Nanking gets 40 per cent of the profits, the Taiwan treasury the rest. The Taiwan provincial government owns and operates almost all other industries—building, coal, iron and steel, textiles, electrical supplies, glass, soap, tea, shipbuilding, printing. It owns and operates life insurance, navigation, transportation. The government has continued the Japanese Monopoly Bureau, which controls the production and sale of such popular commodities as tobacco, liquor, camphor, salt, and matches. A Board of Trade controls the island's import and export trade. This complete economic power has been used by Chen Yi's government mainly to fill official coffers—not, except to a very limited extent, to rebuild and rehabilitate the island.

Bank reserves and other assets of industry were seized by the government, and only small sums have been made available for reconstruction. Take the sugar industry. The war's end found half a million tons of sugar in Taiwan. This the Nanking government confiscated and is transporting to the mainland to sell. The proceeds go into the Nanking treasury while sugar factories lack funds for necessary repairs. Cement factories are unable to operate fully because China prefers to sell Taiwan's coal for high prices on the mainland.

Since many factories have not been repaired or are operating at low capacity, there is much unemployment. Repatriation of overseas Taiwanese has aggravated the problem, which the government has made no real effort to solve. During the war the Japanese built at Chiayi a large factory for making high-octane gas. Now it is closed, and one-fifth of the town's population are out of work. It is not surprising that at Chiayi last month there was fierce fighting against the mainlanders.

Only a program of immediate and generous reform can rehabilitate China in the eyes of the Taiwanese. But it is doubtful whether the present Nanking government is capable of establishing an honest, liberal, competent administration. What the Taiwanese really want is to be a United Nations mandate, under the United States. If they cannot get this status, three things are likely to happen: economic conditions will further deteriorate; the Taiwanese will revolt again against mainland rule; and the United States will lose its popularity and prestige as it has lost them on the mainland and for the same reason—that it supports bad government.

Del Vayo—Reaction in Latin America

ONE of the things that has surprised me most in the years I have spent in the United States is the limited interest in Latin America. It is not for lack of information; the big news agencies cover everything important that happens in that part of the world. But the average cultivated American, beginning with columnists and radio commentators, eagerly follows news from Europe or Asia while remaining indifferent to Latin American events. At this moment the southern continent is going through one of the most critical stages of its history, but only a few North Americans are paying the slightest attention to it.

The latest political episode "south of the border" outstrips in cynicism all previous records. To see General Anastasio Somoza of Nicaragua toss out of office the man whom he so recently planted in the Presidency and set up another subordinate as Provisional President may prove somewhat disturbing even to those State Department officials who are most tolerant of the peculiarities of Latin American democracy. In the final analysis Somoza is little different from Trujillo, the Dominican dictator. But at least Trujillo goes to the trouble of staging a "free election," while the Nicaraguan caudillo apparently assumes that recent developments in Washington make it safe for him to dispense with such formalities. The flaw in the Somoza system is that his Charlie McCarthy may any day imagine himself actually the President, forgetting that the real head of the state is not necessarily the one who wears the title. The late President Arguello made this mistake; he has been replaced by a man whose very name, Lacayo Sacasa, symbolizes the nature of his position. Lacayo means lackey.

But the buffoonery of this latest romance of power only caricatures the grave situation affecting all the republics of Central America. In 1944, encouraged by the general propaganda for democracy that accompanied the war, a movement of liberation swept those republics. It resulted in the overthrow of Maximiliano Hernandez Martínez of El Salvador and Jorge Ubico of Guatemala. The Martínez regime has been a disgrace to the Western world. His famous massacre of 1932, when he machine-gunned thousands of peasants, should have been enough to isolate him from the rest of the hemisphere. Twelve years later he treated himself to a second massacre, this time making effective use of the tanks that lend-lease had put at his disposal. But in 1944 the people of El Salvador gathered fresh strength and threw him out.

There followed the ousting of Ubico in Guatemala. For many years Ubico had been the idol of certain American business interests. As a business man himself he was of indisputable efficiency. In spite of a well-preserved legend of honesty, the present Guatemala regime has been able to expose the profits the dictator drew from his monopoly of the export of meat and the precious wood of Petén.

In El Salvador the popular victory was very ephemeral. The role played by its representative as Franco's advocate in the United Nations Assembly last December revealed the reactionary character of the regime that, after a few turns of the political wheel, had come to power. But Guatemala remains a spearhead of militant anti-fascism in Central America. In contrast to that of El Salvador, the excellent position taken by Ambassador García Granados during the debate on Spain and more recently on Palestine has gained for Guatemala general international respect. But it is democratic regimes like Guatemala's that would be most threatened if the Somoza coup won Washington's approval, for such approval would stimulate all the reactionary factions in Latin America.

Behind every pro-fascist maneuver it is possible to sense the encouragement and the money of foreign interests. Certain big American companies always prefer Somozas; and particularly they oppose the idea of a Central American federation, which has always been an object of the democratic trend in those countries. The day that a Central American federation is established it will no longer be possible for the little local tyrants to use their personal "elite guards" to appoint and dismiss Presidents at their pleasure, or on the orders of those who are willing to finance such operations.

The wave of reaction was set in motion by the greater tide moving up from Argentina, but the real impulse originated in Madrid. In this connection it is interesting to take note of two social events in Spain. One was the reception given last week by the new Argentine ambassador, who since his arrival, in open defiance of the December resolution of the United Nations, has become the hero of the Falange. At this reception the distinguished delegate of Argentina to the United Nations, Dr. Arce, was present and according to the Madrid press acted as host together with the Ambassador. His presence in Madrid on the eve of the June meeting of the Security Council, where the Spanish problem is expected to come up again, has been interpreted in Spain as an act of collaboration with Franco in sabotaging the action of the Council. The other bit of social news is the visit to Madrid of Señora Eva Duarte de Perón, the first lady of Argentina. Though her visit is being given an almost religious character—Santiago de Compostela and Burgos, two famous Catholic cities, are going to present the former actress with all kinds of sacred relics and images—it has also distinct political nuances. From Spain she will go to see the Pope. The Vatican-Madrid-Buenos Aires axis undoubtedly hopes that the fascization of Latin America will proceed faster under the double sign of the eternal Eve and the eternal Cross.

I have been insisting for weeks that it is not only the British but the Americans too who are helping Franco with money at a moment when the dictator is shooting more Spanish Republicans than ever. Official Washington has denied it. But Sam Pope Brewer, in the New York Times of June 1, says that negotiations for large credits from American financial interests "are definitely confirmed," and adds that "the effect in Spain of such credits is political." No foreign credits today can be granted without government authorization.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Speak Up, Consumers!

ARE you, dear Madam, budgeting to replace that winter coat which is showing its age and those blankets which the moths have nibbled? Have you, my dear Sir, a suit that is baggy at the knees and worn at the elbows, and are you hoping to buy another one when prices come down a little? If so, may I suggest that you both give attention to what Congress is doing to interfere with your plans. Apparently hypnotized by the bleating of forty million sheep and their owners, it is legislating to keep wool prices at their present heights. If the measure known as the Robertson bill goes through, the laws of supply and demand will be suspended as far as wool is concerned, and you, the consumers, will pay what the wool men demand. Isn't it time to let Congress know your views?

Perhaps you don't realize what you are already paying in tribute to the wool growers and manufacturers. According to an article in the January issue of Fortune, the tariff on imported wool added $136,000,000 to America's clothing bill in 1946—$10,000,000 more than the value of all wool produced in the United States that year. And, Fortune points out, this was only a beginning. "As wool is marketed, processed, woven into cloth, cut and tailored, then retailed, the original duty cost of 34 cents a pound is compounded with each successive price mark-up. Moreover, for the benefit of United States mills the tariff on raw wool is reinforced by an even higher tariff on woollen fabrics, so that last year the total extra cost—because of wool tariffs—to the citizens of the United States may have topped a billion."

You may not realize, either, that you have also been contributing to the support of the wool growers in your capacity as taxpayers. Since April, 1943, the government has been buying a large part of the American wool clip at above the market price. The Commodity Credit Corporation, the government buying agency, now holds some 420,000,000 pounds which, under present circumstances, could only be sold at a loss of many millions of dollars.

The purpose of the bill sponsored by Senator Robertson of Wyoming—a large sheep rancher himself—is to bail out the CCC and at the same time freeze the price of wool for the next two years at its 1946 peak. Both Senate and House versions of the measure instruct the Secretary of Agriculture to support domestic wool prices at 42 cents a pound "in the grease" and authorize the sale of present stocks at whatever loss is necessary. An amendment added by the House, however, seeks to bring the price of foreign wool up to the same level by instructing the President to impose a special "import fee," additional to the tariff, if he finds imports are reducing the amount of domestic fiber processed. This fee could be whatever amount was required to prevent foreign wools from underselling the domestic product. When the bill goes to conference, the Senate is expected to agree to this amendment. A lot of its members come from states where there are far more sheep than voters.

The House voted this bill by 151 to 65 on May 23. You may not have noticed the press reports, for they were overshadowed by the story of the slashing cuts made by the Appropriations Committee in the Department of Agriculture's expenditures—cuts which threaten to cripple the soil-conservation, school-lunch, crop-insurance, and other programs. The report of this committee condemned "the paternalistic road along which there are subsidies and grants coupled with more and more direction from Washington." It went on to say: "As we give thought to soil conservation . . . we also have the responsibility of pursuing those policies that will prevent the erosion of that rugged individual character which has made the American farmer the greatest producer of agricultural commodities . . . in the world's history." Having issued these stirring thoughts, some members of the committee straightway voted to give the rugged sheep farmers what is, in effect, a new subsidy.

Your chief hope as consumers now lies in a Presidential veto of the Robertson bill. This may be forthcoming, although Mr. Truman is likely to get conflicting advice on the subject from his official family. The Department of Agriculture has supported the bill, including the import fee provision. The Department of State, on the other hand, is flabbergasted by a measure which makes the United States appear not merely inconsistent but hypocritical to other nations. For on the State Department falls the task of spearheading the American-inspired crusade to lower trade barriers and banish economic warfare from the earth.

Since early April an American delegation in Geneva has been engaged in negotiations with seventeen other nations in an effort to obtain worldwide, reciprocal reductions in tariffs. Among other objectives it is seeking a modification of the British Commonwealth's tariff-preference system, which has hindered the sale of American goods in some of their most promising markets. According to reports, the conference was making progress, with Australia in particular showing a more accommodating spirit than had been expected. Then came the stunning news from Washington of a Congressional move to slap a new tariff on a commodity of vital interest to Australia. No wonder the conference came to a jarring halt, forcing Assistant Secretary of State William L. Clayton to fly home for a last-minute effort to repair the damage.

There are, of course, plenty of unregenerate protectionists in Congress who will be only too happy if Geneva ends in failure. They never did believe in the reciprocal-trade-agreements program, and they want to raise tariffs, not lower them. But I doubt whether you, Madam, and you, Sir, will be so complacent. As consumers you know that high tariffs mean high prices; as producers, particularly if you are engaged in the increasing number of industries vitally affected by world trade, you know that prosperity cannot be won by a retreat to Hawley-Smootism; as citizens you know that a new era of international economic warfare will be fatal to all hopes of lasting peace. But if you want your views to prevail in Washington you must make yourself heard above the bleating of the special interests.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

IN HIS LATEST BOOK Sinclair Lewis has trained his guns and his gifts on the most deeply interesting as well as the most troublesome issue in the United States, commonly and coldly known as the Negro problem. "Kingsblood Royal" (Random House, $3) is a tract, an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of the industrial middle-class North at the end of World War II. Its hero is Neil Kingsblood, handsome ex-captain of infantry with red hair and "freckled paws," who has been wounded in action and has come home early, with a limp, to his beautiful wife Vestal and their golden-haired daughter Biddy. He is nicely established in the Second National Bank in Grand Republic, Minnesota, and it is generally agreed that he will some day be president of that institution. Then while humoring his father's whim to prove that they are the true heirs to the British throne (shades of Colonel Sellers), he discovers that his great-great-great grandfather on his mother's side was a full-blooded Negro from Martinique.

Mainly because of this discovery, but also because he is having a few disturbing post-war thoughts, Neil Kingsblood gets interested in the colored people who live in Grand Republic. He falls in love with them, and finally reveals his secret, first to his colored friends and then to his white associates—under the provocation of their smug and scurrilous remarks. Whereupon the best people, and the worst, in the white community go to work. The story ends with a mob on the Kingsblood lawn successfully imposing the unwritten law that colored people are not fit to live in white neighborhoods.

It is extremely unlikely that a young banker in Grand Republic would reveal his secret or go over to the colored world as Kingsblood did. But if he did, it is all too likely, though some reviewers have maintained otherwise, that his white friends and associates would behave as badly as Lewis makes out. The device is arbitrary; the sequence that flows out of it seemed to me painfully convincing. I grant that his portrait of the white world of Grand Republic could be richer in complexity and texture. But he takes into account not only the "lynchers of the Northern or inoperative variety" but also the weaklings of good-will, and their talk reads like something overheard, not invented. Again, his portrait shows the marks of one of the defects which have made Lewis an artist manqué and kept him from being the great or near-great novelist he might have become. For reasons which are probably to be looked for in the combination of a Sinclair Lewis and the country he was born in, he tends to submerge under a protective crust of scorn that becomes hard and dry what are actually ambivalent and profoundly creative feelings of love and hatred for the small-business and country-club world he knows so well. But here the ambivalence shows through often enough to provide the light and heat of reality.

His evocation of the Negro world of Grand Republic is much less successful. The love that Kingsblood develops for his new-found people is too pat, and since these passages are written out of a rational knowledge consciously acquired and imperfectly assimilated rather than out of experience unconsciously and completely absorbed, the glow of reality is missing.

But if Neil Kingsblood's affair with the colored race fails to convince, there can be no doubt of the authenticity and strength of Lewis's feeling about the "Negro problem," of which this affair is an unsuccessful projection, and this feeling sweeps through the reader's mind like a clean wind.

"Kingsblood Royal" is not a good novel, but it is the work, however imperfect, of a genuinely creative talent—and it leaves one with the exhilarated sense of having had an actual and purging experience. It also gives rise to the sad reflection that a writer with such gifts of wit, gusto, and skill should have been capable not only of a tract for the times but of a dozen books for the ages. There ought to be a more durable sanctuary than "Kingsblood Royal" for such flights as his apostrophe to the Little Woman of the Ages, "very pleasant and kind and helpful to the ambitions of her husband and the boys, and many of them were very bad ambitions," who when she speaks says, "I don't know anything about anthropology and ethnology and biology and all that silly junk . . . but I tell you there's a darky family lives right down the alley from us where they keep goats and I know and I'm telling you that the darkies are inferior to us. . . ." All of this she learned "from my father, who was a wonderful man, and if he were alive today, he simply would not stand for all this nonsense"; and she finally announces that she doesn't want to hear "any more such nonsense. . . and now let's have another nice cup of coffee and say nothing more about it."

Or his collation of the American credo about Negroes, which must be read in full. Or his remark that the Union Theological Seminary believes in a Trinity consisting of Father, Son, and Sociology. Or such phrases as the "non-country-club races." Or his scenes in the Colonial Residence of the Young Banker in the Sylvan Park "development" of Grand Republic.

FOR THE department of exploded myths and overturned verities: Some weeks ago Aylmer Vallance reported deep discontent over the price of cigarettes in England. Where there are no smokes, there may be a conflagration. . . . A farmer who was struck and killed by a train in Pennsylvania had a four-leaf clover in his pocket. Which for some reason reminded me of the pedestrian who was all but run over by the bus I was riding in—but survived to walk under a ladder that was standing on the sidewalk.

THOUGHT BY THE WAY: A writer for the New Masses, having his own secular religion with its Trinity and Scripture, isn't bothered by the old Bible precepts. Nevertheless, he must spend a lot of time wrestling with the angle.

HARPER & BROTHERS

More Blessed to Give

TOWARDS WORLD PROSPERITY.

Edited by Mordecai Ezekiel. Harper and Brothers. $5.50.

WHEN somebody advocates lending, or giving away, billions or dollars all over the world, solid citizens snort at the vagaries of soft-headed liberals. Why don't these foreign ne'er-do-wells learn to feed themselves? A little post-war relief may be all very well, but the longer we continue it, the longer people will be prevented from standing on their own feet. As for equipping them with modern machinery, either they won't be able to repay us or they will emerge as dangerous competitors, perhaps even as menacing war economics. America is already far in the lead in production and ought to stay that way.

These arguments may sound good enough as long as there are scarcities at home and inflation keeps driving prices up. Adding a big foreign demand for American goods by financing their export makes things still harder for the American consumer—as in the case of food in early 1947. But the picture is changing. Some home markets are already flooded. Signs of depression and unemployment are beginning to appear in the skies like southward migrating birds in autumn. There may come a time in the not distant future when American employers and workers will be only too glad to investigate foreign markets. When that time comes, books like this will be eagerly consulted.

Mordecai Ezekiel argues forcefully not only that loan-financed exports would help employment in this country but that they would be good long-run policy. The twenty contributors, each an expert on the region concerning which he writes, demonstrate that there is ample opportunity for really productive investments. Britain needs extensive re-equipment with modern machinery so that its limited labor force can produce the great expansion of exports needed to sustain its population. Devastated Russia could not restore its industries, railroads, mines, and agriculture for many years without importing new equipment. France needs goods desperately, as does Italy.

Less developed countries cannot sustain a decent standard of living so long as a large proportion of their populations are engaged in agriculture and extractive industries. A survey of this sort, broad and sketchy though it is, leaves one with an overwhelming sense of the need for capital that America must have a large share in providing, if it is to be forthcoming. The alternative is poverty and chaos, revolution and war.

The detailed estimates indicate that in the first post-war decade, $50 billion would be required for investment in more backward regions alone—Eastern Europe, China, South and Central America, and India. Of this amount between $30 billion and $35 billion of goods would have to come from the nations already industrialized. Many of these nations in turn would need heavy imports from the United States. "Contrasted to these needs, the seven or eight billions with which the new International Bank opens its doors is small indeed." Large though the required sums are, they contrast with the $325 billion spent by the United States on World War II.

Of course we could not go on forever maintaining our population by sending out our "surplus" product, and also sending out the money which foreigners could use to buy it. We should have to buy more from them as well. But the building of new industries and the reequipment of old ones has long been recognized as the foundation of rising standards of living. While it is going on, we might have a breathing space in which we could learn how to consume—without inflation—as much as we can produce.

A New Concept

WAR STRESS AND NEUROTIC ILLNESS. By Abram Kardiner, M. D., with the Collaboration of Herbert Spiegel, M. D., Paul B. Hoerber, Medical Book Department of Harper and Brothers. $4.50.

FOR the lay reader the principal value of "War Stress and Neurotic Illness" will be in its clear-cut account of the factors responsible for breakdown, its rich and apposite case material from two world wars, its analysis of symptom formation, and the social effects of the disorder. The present work is a revision of Kardiner's monograph on the traumatic neuroses. For the technical reader its most suggestive and challenging feature will be the author's rejection of the concept of instinct, traditional in psychoanalytic thought, and his replacement of it by an operational construct—the action system—as the key principle of his psychodynamics. The concept of instinct, the author finds, fails to provide a sound basis for understanding the traumatic neurosis, while the new concept has proved itself an aid to diagnosis, to treatment, and to its social implications. The book, which is by no means easy reading, is both provocative and brilliant and cannot fail to be of value to the interested lay or professional reader. The author insists that the greatest obstacle in achieving cures is still, and will continue to be, the lack of skilled workers. He looks with little favor upon piece-meal compensation which creates dependency and complicates and interferes with sound therapy. Treatment, not bed space and compensation, is what is required, and for that reason he urges greater attention to training competent psychiatric personnel.

South Africa's Problems

STRUGGLE ON THE VELD. By Roderick Peattie. The Vanguard Press. $3.50.

THE choice of Dr. Peattie, one of our most distinguished geographers, to head the South African outpost of the Office of War Information was an extremely happy one. For no country on earth offers more varied, interesting, and complicated problems of geography, human and physical, than the Union of South Africa. Dr. Peattie here reviews some of these problems, giving particular attention to relations between the huge, oppressed Bantu majority of the population and the ruling white minority. That is the question that looms menacingly over the future of South Africa, and the other main issues discussed in this book—the Indian immigrants, Anglo-Afrikaner tensions, poor whites, erosion, the lop-sidedness of an economy dominated by gold-mining—are intimately connected with it.

Dr. Peattie's observations on all these matters prompt the hope that some day he will return to South Africa under his own steam and produce a more extensive and careful study. His present work provides a useful introduction to those unfamiliar with the subject, but it is really little more than a notebook and one, moreover, which would have benefited by more thorough editing.

JOHN GIELGUD'S "Love for Love" (Royale Theater) is certainly the best of the four productions of that particular play I have ever had an opportunity to see. Unfortunately, however, that does not mean that it is as good as his "The Importance of Being Earnest" or that he has made its delights and its beauties accessible to as large a public. For the Wilde play he discovered a style which tells us exactly in what way we are to take it; for Congreve's even more famous comedy he has not been able to do the same thing with an equal degree of success. Quite possibly no one could succeed completely. Its theatrical conventions are too remote from ours, and, what is more important, its language and its peculiar synthesis of a complex of attitudes are equally remote. Wilde's play seemed even better than I had ever imagined it was. "Love for Love" still yields to the reader certain insights and felicities the full value of which do not come across in production.

This is not because of any obvious defects in the playing of the principal parts. Mr. Gielgud has taken for himself the straight and relatively colorless role of the hero Valentine, probably for the sake of the feigned madness scene in the second act, where he gives a really superb performance as a sort of parody Hamlet. Pamela Brown, who was incomparable as Wilde's Gwendolin, gives considerable substance to the rather sketchily written part of Valentine's beloved, Angelica; Adrienne Allen is almost too attractive for Mrs. Frail; and Jessie Evans is amusingly abandoned as Miss Prue. Robert Fleming's Sailor Ben is excellent, and if he is by no means as funny as Bobby Clark was in the Players' revival, at least his performance does not, as Bobby's did, first demolish and then ex-

THE STRANGE STORY OF THE

QUANTUM

By Banesh Hoffmann

Department of Mathematics,
Queens College, N. Y.

THIS BOOK promises to become the definitive account for the general reader of the growth of the ideas underlying present atomic knowledge. By a novel use of familiar analogies and by a dramatizing of the contributions of the key scientists linked with this development, the author explains how the quantum has revolutionized scientific thought. Achieving unprecedented clarity without sacrificing accuracy, he supplies genuine illumination as to the new quantum concepts of the atom and the electron, matter and energy, causality.

"In my opinion this is a great book in the same class with the popular science classics of Jeans, Eddington and E. T. Bell." —Professor Harris F. MacNeish, Chairman, Department of Mathematics, Brooklyn College.

tinguish everything else. But despite these and other good performances, despite also a generally very smooth production, we still do not quite know into what whole the cynicism, the bawdy, the elaborately intellectualized wit, and the few but important touches of sentiment are to combine.

It helps to know something of Restoration society, of Restoration dramatic conventions, and even, also, something about Congreve himself. But the general public can hardly be expected to be students of the manners and customs of that remote epoch, and though I happen to have devoted considerable time to it I must confess that I quite have never been certain that I quite grasped the way in which the play as a whole could be found entirely satisfying aesthetically. The author's great reputation is certainly not undeserved: there are scenes upon which a critic may profitably dilate at length, and Congreve's language, always perfectly under control, can alternate between a rich, almost poetic exuberance which sometimes suggests the Elizabethan and a cold, witty precision which ought to delight a semanticist. But "Love for Love"—though less conspicuously than "The Way of the World"—is, among other things, inescapably a love story also, and the hero, who is first introduced to us at the moment when he is irascibly blaming a whore for not aborting his bastard son, whom he refuses to have anything more to do with, is also romantically faithful to his Angelica in his fashion. What are we to make of that?

Perhaps it will help to remember that "The Importance of Being Earnest" and "Love for Love" were written almost exactly 200 years apart—the one in the sixteen nineties, the other in the eighteen nineties—and that both were, in something more than a merely chronological sense, fin de siècle. Wilde's play was written at the end of a sentimental epoch which it burlesques; Congreve's was written at the end of a brutally debauched and cynical epoch which was about to give way, in the theater at least, to a reaction which took the form of a more than Victorian abandonment to maudlin sentimentality. Indeed, there is a theory, supported by some evidence, that Congreve cut short his brief and dazzlingly successful career in disgust at the popularity of Colley Cibber, the inanity of whose plays is both unbelievable in itself and doubly incredible as writing done in Congreve's own time. Congreve's own plays show a certain tentative attempt to suggest that the possibility of one kind of romantic love has survived, and that Valentine recognizes in Angelica something which he has been educated not to believe in but to which he nevertheless responds.

There is significance in the fact that Congreve himself was reputed to have pursued—perhaps successfully, perhaps not—the feminine star, Ann Bracegirdle, whose personality led playwrights to create for her roles somewhat more romantic than those which had previously prevailed—just as the personality of Nell Gwyn, a generation earlier, had led other playwrights to create the hoydens who had once been so popular. Angelica is but a slight preliminary sketch for Millamant in "The Way of the World," but in the case of both the essential fact is that they are witty creatures trained in smart cynicism but eager for a kind of love in which neither they nor their suitors profess to believe. The problem for both of them, as well as for both of their lovers, is to confess their true feelings without losing that reputation for wit and sophistication which they cannot lose without forfeiting their own self-respect and also the respect of the men who are demanding both romantic love and a worldliness which is all but incompatible with it.

One of the characters in "Love for Love" closes a scene with the now well-known couplet:

Women are like tricks by slight of hand,
Which, to admire, we should not understand.

Or, as our idiom has it, "It's fun to be fooled." But Congreve, one gets the impression, was trying, perhaps against his better judgment, to understand them.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE first representative showing anywhere outside Spain of the work Joan Miró has done since 1939 (at Pierre Matisse's through June 7) is an event whose importance to the American art world cannot be overestimated. Miró is the only painter to have emerged since 1925—that is, after Matisse, Picasso, Klee, and Kandinsky—whose art has extended the limits of Western painting in a way at all comparable to theirs. He took up the cubist tradition where Picasso left it and added not only a positive personality but a wider demonstration of what is possible in the use of flat color and the closed silhouette. A Mediterranean like Picasso, Miró adheres similarly to a certain quasi-sculptural conception of the picture as involving the monolithic definition of shapes, flat surfaces, smooth, compact brushwork, pure, uniform color. He too favors the figure as a motif, hardly ever the landscape, rarely the still life. In his rejection of impressionist and expressionist immediacy as conveyed through open forms and loose brushwork, Miró brings himself closer at the same time to Mondrian; however spontaneous and instinctive his mode of operation, however open his art to instantaneous suggestion, he likewise conceives of the picture as primarily a finished, sealed product and only secondarily as a direct revelation of the artist's temperament.

If Miró were only the quintessential lyric painter he is commonly held to be, his influence would not be such a potentially great factor in the future of painting. That influence, paradoxically, has been felt mainly in this country, since both the younger French and the younger British painters, in their desire to hold on to traditional easel painting, seem reluctant to go beyond Picasso and cubism proper. That desire has been less strong in this country, and in any case the presence and the precepts of Hans Hofmann have been enough to insure that our most alert and ambitious young painters do not overlook the Catalonian artist. And it is indeed impermissible that any new painting which transcends the merely pleasing and advances the frontiers of art historically should fail to deal with Miró any more than with Matisse and Picasso. It is significant that Miró's influence is prominent, along with Picasso's, in the formation of Jackson Pollock's art; and Pollock is the most important new painter since Miró himself.

Miró's development is somewhat difficult to trace in a straight line after about 1930, at which time he precipitated the integral elements of his style; upon these he has played powerful variations but without adding anything essentially new—refining and elaborating rather than expanding and assimilating. Nor does the present exhibition, crowded as it is with successful pictures, large and small, in oil, gouache, and pastel, add anything essentially new to what we already know about Miró. As usual, he shows almost infallible tact in setting himself terms that he is able to fill exactly. Again we have his marvelous calligraphy, the inevitable justness with which he handles black, royal blue, deep red, and yellow, his control of and agreement with the flat surface, again the pastoral, everyday subject, the mocking descendant on the phallus and the pudenda. Here and there an even greater tendency toward linearism is perceptible, but where Miró, as in a picture like the vertical "Woman and Bird in Sun," tries to escape from the arabesque and soften the silhouette into a more "painterly" harmony with the supposed background (really, there are no backgrounds in Miró's pictures), he falls flat with a definiteness of failure such as he shows nowhere else.

Miró remains still in the private hedonism of the first decade after the First World War, his impulse still the personal optimism of the twenties, the optimism that said, "We can at least have fun." In retrospect it is he who seems the painter-laureate of the Left Bank in its heyday, and aptly enough, he was the inspirer of such other celebrators of that same place and period as Calder and Stuart Davis. And perhaps it is because Miró's mood fitted the American one at that time better than any other that Americans have shown greater receptiveness to his art.

Miró's hedonism is responsible for that elegant, tactful exuberance which has led some people to charge him with ebcité, frivolity, thinness. It is true that some of his most ambitious pictures seem to lose their substance under long scrutiny and that his invention—whose impulse owes so much to Klee—appears unsuitable at times to the large surfaces it tries to populate. Whimsy does not translate into murals—or does it? And is Miró wrong to be more ambitious than Klee, who was more original? The fact is that we are sometimes puzzled to see so much originality, in both painters, put to the service of what seem small ideas. But I think we may be wrong, and more so in Miró's case than in Klee's.

The same charge of frivolity and superficiality has been made against Matisse. And just as Matisse's cold hedonism and ruthless exclusion of everything but the concrete, immediate sensation will in the future, once we are away from the present Zeitgeist, be better understood as the most profound mood of the first half of the twentieth so, I feel sure, Miró's warmer and gentler hedonism will take on great seriousness, and we shall see that his like Tiepolo's, is larger than the mo from which it springs. Many of Miró paintings, perhaps even that large o in the Museum of Modern Art's permanent collection with which I myself have fallen so much out of love, will then regain their potency and their creator receive more convinced recognition as one of the masters of Western painting. Time will perhaps do as much for him as it has just done for Pissarro and Sisley.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THERE is nothing quite like the way the New Friends of Music rave and clamor for approval of their aims and achievements. They crave it equally for aims that are important—like giving good chamber music concerts at low prices, or giving a work without interruptions and disturbances between movements; and for aims that are trivial or questionable—like abolishing encores, flowers, and intermissions—the intermission is a necessary break in programs as long as the New Friends'; and their way of rushing the concerts through, under the pressure of other concerts and meal-times, creates a tense and hectic atmosphere that is undesirable. And they crave it for the achievement of important aims which, actually, they do not carry out.

But what is astonishing is the way the New Friends succeed in getting the approval they want—even from people whom one would expect to know better. It isn't surprising that a Mark Schubart—in a Times article on the occasion of the New Friends' tenth season—should accept all the pretensions and claims and, among other things, write that "many artists—including the now famous Budapest Quartet—were introduced to this country by the New Friends"—when in fact the Budapest Quartet had become famous here a few years before the New Friends started. But it is amazing to have Virgil Thomson, on the same occasion, write: "One cannot deny that the aims . . . are excellent and that the New Friends have pursued them assiduously," and then criticize only their concentration on Central European music—the fact that only in their ninth season had they given half the program-time to French music, and that in the tenth they were retreating to Bach, Schubert, and Brahms again.

Thomson's criticism was justified; but I should have expected him to point out that even when the New Friends had presented French music they had not done so in accordance with two of their important aims—which are to give "complete cycles of composers' works" and "as complete a representation of the literature of individual composers as feasible." I should have expected him to point out that instead of a complete representation of an individual composer like Debussy or Fauré they had offered "a comprehensive survey of the chamber and vocal works of the great French composers, from Rameau to Ravel," to "make evident their musical diversity and cultural unity"—which was as though they had dealt with Central European composers by offering in one season a smattering of a work or two by Bach, Händel, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Brahms as "a comprehensive survey . . . to demonstrate their musical diversity and cultural unity" (it has just occurred to me that in all these years the New Friends have not given the songs of Hugo Wolf). Thomson also might have criticized the New Friends' poor judgment in the selection of works for their French survey, pointing out that to choose the Piano Quartet Opus 45 as the single work to represent Fauré's instrumental chamber music was like choosing one of the Opus 59's as the single work to represent Beethoven's quartets, and that instead of still another performance of the frequently played Quartet of Debussy it would have been better to give the rarely heard "Proses lyriques" and "Chansons de Bilitis" or some of the sets of piano pieces.

Now although Thomson didn't make these criticisms I did make them; but there is this curious fact about the New Friends: one can point out, as I have done, how they have not lived up to one of their high-sounding pretensions, and they will again make the same pretension and again not live up to it; one can do that year after year, as I have done, and achieve the same result each time. And so my demonstration of the discrepancy between proclaimed aims and actual performance in the case of French music did not keep the New Friends from repeating, the next year, the claim of "complete representation of the literature of individual composers" and then presenting, during the past season, "the chamber music of the Slavonic masters" in the form of a work or two, often poorly chosen, by Borodin, Mussorgsky, Tchaikovsky, Glazunov (imagine performing Glazunov's Quartet Opus 1), Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Shostakovich, Smetana, and Janacek, in addition to a large number by Dvorak. With these there were presented all six quartets of Bartok, all six violin-and-clavier sonatas of Bach, the instrumental chamber music of Schumann, some of his songs, and a couple of his piano works; and the scrambling of all these elements produced some of the ghastliest programs the New Friends have ever contrived.

Thomson also criticized the New Friends for using so many Central European performing artists, even for the French works; but I should have expected him to point out the discrepancy between the New Friends' claims and their practice here too. Their formulated aim is "to build the programs first and choose the artists on the basis of the programs"—in other words, to engage artists only for their fitness for what they are to play or sing; and they have claimed, in publicity material, to offer the public music, not performers; in one interview a number of years ago there was the pretension, among others, that anyone calling up their office to ask who was playing next Sunday was told that Beethoven was being played. Actually, right at the start, the New Friends offered their first series to the public not with an announcement that Beethoven and Brahms would be played, but with the announcement that these composers would be played by the many performers whom they named—including big-name performers with powerful box-office appeal; and they have done the same thing ever since. It is true that some of these big-name artists—Schnabel, Szigeti, Lehmann, Elisabeth Schumann, the Budapest Quartet—have been suited to the music they were engaged for; but others have been as unsuited as some of the less celebrated—and on occasion insufficiently competent—performers whom the New Friends have indiscriminately and ruthlessly scrambled together with the music.

I should have expected Thomson to point out that the New Friends had Bach's "Goldberg" Variations, a few years ago, played not by Landowska but by Serkin, who had given no reason previously for expecting anything better than the shockingly uncomprehending performance he gave. And in the past season, too, when they had Schumann's piano works played by Arrau or his "Dichterliebe" sung by Singher, it was not because of any fitness that either had demonstrated in previous performances of such music.

Common Sense for Greece

Dear Sirs: The natural leaders of our people are divided and appear to be in a frenzy of fear and disillusionment because of the inexplicable course of Russia and the Communists. Many liberals are taking a course which can lead only to a new version of the anti-Comintern pact. The implications of their position grow ominous. They are now allied with those who are demanding that Wallace be prosecuted for stating views which reflect those of two-thirds of the American people—as shown by the latest Gallup polls.

The time calls for a simple, clear program which decent, peace-loving Americans can accept. It also calls for a program which President Truman and his advisers can push. If Franklin D. Roosevelt were alive, he would probably announce some such program as the following:

First, the United States cannot undertake to establish democracy in a nation where a king rules surrounded by monarchists and plutocrats. Help must be conditioned on withdrawal or collapse of these forces.

Second, order and peace must be restored within Greece. As matters now stand, our army officers will do nothing except arm the monarchists and assorted reactionaries. This will inevitably enrage and frustrate the Greek people, who have been revolting for twenty years against these forces, despite hunger, privation, and war. We must arm only Greek republicans and democrats. This requires that Americans or U. N. representatives know something about political philosophy.

Third, we must rebuild the Greek economy. We must do this in a way which the American people will understand, and which is within the framework of our own system. We must not make a lot of Greek plutocrats into despotic millionaires in the process.

Franklin D. Roosevelt would rebuild the Greek economy in the same way he rebuilt our own: (a) Provide for electric power, which is basic, by a Greek TVA owned by the Greek people. (b) Reestablish transportation by first paying off any private individual who claims ownership of the dilapidated Greek railways. Rebuild these railways in the name of the Greek people, to be owned as our own post-office system is owned. (c) Establish a Greek National ank similar to our own Federal Reserve System or the present Bank of England. (d) Provide for rehabilitation of private productive enterprises through an RFC. Provide for the farm economy through a Farm Credit Administration based on cooperative loan associations, together with a Farm Security Administration.

This program would make sense to the American people. It would make sense and give tremendous encouragement to democrats everywhere. It would be the support of all middle-of-the-road nations, such as Britain, the dominions, the Scandinavians, France, Central and South America.

Spanish Intellectuals Appeal

Dear Sirs: The Union of Spanish Intellectuals was founded shortly after the liberation of Paris. Its members include writers, scientists, technicians, professors, and artists, all Spanish refugees who have been in France since 1939. Its aim is to acquaint the public with Spanish culture. As one of our projects we are publishing a monthly bulletin containing original works by members of the association on literary, artistic, and scientific subjects.

However, despite our own enthusiasm and the interest of intellectual circles in France and other countries of Europe, the minimum base necessary to make possible this work is lacking and has forced us to publish only intermittently.

We hope that in view of our difficulties your readers may be able to do something to help us financially so that we may continue our work. Our address is 36 Rue d'Assas, Paris 6.

In the Ring, but Angry

Dear Sirs: On April 8 I announced through the Tax Journal my candidacy for Vice-President on either ticket. On April 10 I wired Gael Sullivan, challenging him, or his designee, to a series of debates similar to, or rather reminiscent of, the Lincoln-Douglas debates. On April 12 I telegraphed Senator Pepper, issuing a like challenge. . . . I have received no response to date, which I consider peculiar, to say the least. . . .

Digging Out the Truth

Dear Sirs: No great Victorian novelist has suffered more than George Eliot from the good intentions of biographers. Her husband, J. W. Cross, admits in his Preface to "George Eliot's Life as Related in her Letters and Journals" (1885) that "no single letter is printed entire from the beginning to the end. . . . Each letter has been pruned of everything that seemed to me irrelevant to my purpose—of everything that I thought my wife would have wished to be omitted." . . . His misguided piety has done more than anything to create a false image of George Eliot as melancholy, heavy-handed, humorless.

Fortunately, the manuscripts of her letters survive to provide a truer portrait. About 1,000 of them are in the Library of Yale University, where they are being prepared for publication by Dr. Gordon S. Haight.

In the case of so prolific a letter writer an edition can only approach completeness if the owners of small collections or of single letters are willing to have them included in the Yale Edition, where their cooperation will be duly acknowledged. The most trifling autograph sometimes supplies just the link needed to connect a whole series of letters of great importance to biographers. All correspondence should be addressed to Professor Gordon S. Haight, 464 Yale Station, New Haven, Connecticut. YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS

The Shape of Things

THE REPORT OF THE COMPTON COMMISSION on Universal Training has brought this country face to face with the realities of atomic war. According to the report, the first day's attack might well obliterate our twelve major cities, eliminate most of our productive facilities, and throw our transportation and communications systems into chaos. Possibilities of intercepting this initial attack were considered to be slight. The only hope of emerging "victorious" rested upon a national population trained to meet the emergency and rapidly to mount a counter-offensive. It may be useful to project the lines of present political conflict into the future and face the logic of cataclysmic war to which they point. Certainly, we can take little comfort from the labors of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission which this week arrived at a new stalemate. It is clearly suicidal to abandon such efforts toward international agreement on a control system. But time is running out, as David Lilienthal's speech to the commission last week indicated. Stressing once more the necessity of an Atomic Development Authority with super-sovereign powers, Lilienthal emphasized that the United States would continue research in the field of atomic energy and keep up the manufacture of bombs until agreement was reached. His remarks underline the fact that the alternative to a United Nations system of security are competing national-security systems based on the assumption that war will come.

BUT ARE WE DOING ALL THAT IS POSSIBLE to make such a war unlikely? Wars are not deliberately chosen by nations. They grow out of deteriorating political and economic situations and out of the fears, suspicions, and human misery these situations breed. The structure of the United Nations is evidence of this truth. Many of its functions are related to the rebuilding of the world economy. But the U. N.'s various agencies are powerless unless they have the full support of the one power of paramount economic strength and resources. The efforts of the United States so far, magnanimous in the emergency activities of UNRRA, have been faltering and equivocal in the job of reconstruction. The outside world is going bankrupt, its dollar stocks are being rapidly exhausted, its imports are threatened with blockade, political chaos is succeeding economic chaos.

Quite apart from the imminent threat to our own economy of a bankrupt world, Europe and Asia in prolonged economic misery will inevitably become the breeding ground for that war the Compton commission asks us to prepare for. If we are going to come to our senses we had better come quickly—and that goes for our President, our State Department, and, most of all, our Congress. Perhaps Secretary Marshall's Harvard address last week indicates a broader wisdom in high places than has previously been demonstrated. The Secretary said: "It is logical that the United States should do whatever it is able to do to assist in the return of normal economic health in the world, without which there can be no political stability and no assured peace." Whatever we do, it should be done soon and on a scale vastly larger than any suggested by our previous efforts.

"SPEAK LOUDLY AND STAND YOUR STICK IN the corner" might be Mr. Truman's rewording of the famous motto of the redoubtable T. R. In any case, his denunciation of the government upset in Hungary as a "terrific outrage" was followed by a temperately worded State Department note to the Russian commander in Budapest protesting against Soviet intervention and requesting a three-power investigation of the crisis. Various proposals that strong steps be taken to deal with the matter have mostly subsided; not because the Administration is reconciled to the ousting of Premier Nagy or the concentration of Communist control that has followed, but because it is quite clear that the United States is not in a position to apply effective penalties either to Russia or to Hungary. This being the case, it is too bad that Mr. Truman—and, more cautiously, Senator Vandenberg—should have made such loud and threatening noises.

THE STORY BEHIND THE HUNGARIAN UPSET is still obscure. The Communists and Socialists insist that an anti-government plot existed and that the ex-Premier was a party to it. Mr. Nagy denies the second charge, inquiring why he should conspire against his own government. On this point one must suspend judgment. Only full publication of the facts, which the Russians say they obtained from Bela Kovacs, arrested secretary of the Smallholders' Party, and then turned over to the Hungarian government, will clear the matter up. But independent observers are convinced that the reactionary wing of the Smallholders—a catch-all party in which many dispossessed and disgruntled aristocrats have found refuge—has been actively plotting to undo the revolutionary changes instituted by the government. Leftists also charge that this faction is in constant touch with agents of the Western powers. But aside from conspiracies, many sharp and open divisions of policy separate the left political groups from those on the right, even within the government. One of the factors in the recent coup was the bitter dispute between the Smallholders and the two working-class parties over the nationalization of Hungary's leading banks, which today dominate the financial life of the country. Premier Nagy, who opposed nationalization, was outmaneuvered during his absence in Switzerland when the Hungarian Economic Council appointed controllers for the thirteen major banks. According to Tibor Mende, financial editor of the European edition of the New York Herald Tribune, this move, which put the banks directly under supervision of the Ministry of Finance, must have been regarded by Mr. Nagy "as a first step . . . toward nationalization. His forced resignation and the appointment of Mr. Dinnyes came close on the heels of this economic coup

FOR THE UNENVIABLY DIFFICULT AND delicate job of administering the aid-to-Greece program President Truman has at least chosen a better candidate than we feared he might. If Dwight P. Griswold is no as well informed on the Balkans as Mark Ethridge or a incontestably liberal as Robert M. La Follette, both prominently mentioned for the post, neither is he an other general or a representative of big business, like William H. Harrison, Paul Hoffman, and Philip Reed who were likewise under consideration. The former governor of Nebraska, a Willkie Republican, was defeated for the Senatorial nomination last year by the violently isolationist Hugh Butler, whose opposition is in itself something of a recommendation. Although the enthusiasm on Capitol Hill is considerably less than hysterical, there is little reason to doubt that the appointment will be confirmed by the Senate. The coolness has more to do with domestic than international politics. Some Democrats resent the appointment of a Republican; some Republicans resent the choice of an avowed supporter of Stassen for President; and other Republicans, we suspect, are not too keen at the prospect of sharing party responsibility for what is at best a risky undertaking. Mr. Griswold's little acceptance speech was sensible and moderate. "Communism," he said, "seems to thrive on distress." The program would be directed toward eliminating that distress. "The major matter" is not the military aspect of the enterprise, but rather the necessity of putting Greece "back on her feet economically." That will require a stiff backbone, a keen mind, and a hide tough enough to take the arrows of jittery Congressmen as well as outraged Greek royalists.

THE UNITED NATIONS LAST WEEK CANCELED its agreement to rent 912 apartments for its employees in housing projects of the Metropolitan and New York Life Insurance companies. It is hard to see how a world organization dedicated to promote "the fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race" could have done otherwise, for the insurance companies wanted to pass on each applicant individually. The attitude of the companies in excluding Negroes from their projects has long been demonstrated. In Metropolitan's tax-exempt Stuyvesant Town there will be no Negroes, for "Negroes and whites don't mix," says its board chairman. "A hundred years from now, maybe they will." The United Nations refuses to wait a hundred years. It insisted upon leasing the dwelling units in bulk so as to forestall another Stuyvesant Town ghetto. The issue is more serious than appears on the surface. No housing project can be built today without the help of New York's big lending institutions. Without housing for its employees, U. N. cannot function. Every news item pointing up racial discrimination here is a big story abroad. Three steps should now be taken: (1) The insurance companies are supervised by Governor Dewey's insurance superintendent. A complete investigation should be made and the facts aired without delay. (2) The United States District Attorney should investigate and bring indictments if warranted. A government proceeding is now pending against lending institutions in the New York area for racial-discrimination practices in mortgage lending. (3) Mayor O'Dwyer should have the New York City Housing Authority provide the housing needed without delay. The machinery is available, and the Authority could build the housing in less than a year.

Arm Thine Enemy

AS A diplomat, Spruille Braden had strange ideas. Just because Argentine President Juan Domingo Perón had all but made a career of yanqui-baiting, Braden assumed that he was hostile to the United States. Because Perón had set up a systematic and thorough-going tyranny, replete with violence and the Führerprinzip, Braden regarded him as an enemy of democracy. Because Argentina, militarized and rich, had blatantly intimidated Chile, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Bolivia, Braden considered it aggressive. And on the basis of these hasty conclusions he thought it ill-advised to sign a defense pact with the Argentines and perhaps even dangerous to send them arms.

In contrast to this dreamy approach, Ambassador Messersmith, with strong backing in the War Department and in the Senate, stood for stern realism. Perón had said that he was getting rid of the Nazis who had helped boost him to power, though, of course, his secret police could not be expected to round up all of them. Why not take his word, just as Chamberlain took Hitler's word at Munich and at Godesberg? And if Perón had corrupted the courts of Argentina, hamstrung its democratic newspapers, and exiled its best teachers—all in violation of international pledges—surely that was not our affair. As Sumner Welles repeatedly pointed out, the days of Yankee intervention were over. Good neighborliness required us not merely to ignore these human foibles of the Peronistas but to invite them to share with us in the defense of the hemisphere.

Now Mr. Braden is on his way out, his resignation "reluctantly" accepted by the President. Friendship between the United States and Argentina has been restored, and the way is being smoothed for calling the long-delayed Rio conference. Messersmith, too, is on his way home, his mission accomplished. Once again realism has triumphed.

In view of this diplomatic success, the air is remarkably clouded with doubt. The New York Times trusts that "the course now chosen will restore that hemisphere unity which has been strained by the long impasse," but its trust is not so great as to overcome its fear that "the Perón regime . . . is still potentially a seed-bed of fascism on this continent." The Washington Post says we have merely "patched up" our quarrel with a country that "had become a haven for fascist activity in this hemisphere." And the New York Herald Tribune, conceding the development as "the only practicable solution for an impossible situation," admits that it means giving arms to "this unreliable and dangerously dynamic experiment in New World fascist totalitarianism."

In this murky atmosphere one must suppose that Secretary of State Marshall sees some compensating gain not quite visible to the rest of us. As far as we know, the immediate consequences of the great rapprochement will be these: the nations of the hemisphere will meet at Rio de Janeiro some time this summer and sign a joint defense agreement, whereupon the United States, Congress permitting, will sell surplus and new war materials to the signatories in a planned effort to standardize weapons. Undoubtedly such standardization has technical merits, and for us it would offer certain advantages beyond the technical. Not only would it freeze out European arms manufacturers—always an appealing argument—but it would make the United States preeminent in Latin American military circles. It would be we who would replace parts, train men in the use of weapons, and presumably spread our influence where that of Germany was once so dominant.

But these advantages seem to us more theoretical than real. In the first place, a large number of our weapons would go to wealthy Argentina, which can readily dispense with our training, and will gladly dispense with our influence. Second, an increasingly powerful and expansionist Argentina will stimulate an arms race throughout Latin America, most of which is even now too impoverished to afford its people a minimum standard of decency in food, shelter, and education. And, finally, the program will greatly strengthen the military—no small consideration on a continent where politicians jockey for garrisons the way ours do for convention delegates. All in all, a high price to pay for questionable protection against an unlikely invader taking the least probable route of invasion.

Divided India

NO ONE will pretend that the judgment of Solomon which the Viceroy, Lord Mountbatten, has rendered on behalf of the British government is a perfect solution of the Indian problem. The unity of India is much more than a nationalist slogan. For a long period the country has been ruled and its economy developed on a centralized basis even though its constitution allowed for a considerable measure of local autonomy. Now it is to be divided into two and perhaps more sovereignties. The eggs are to be unscrambled, and the process is likely to prove costly to the Indian people.

Nevertheless, as Lord Mountbatten said in his radio address on June 3, unification could not be secured if it involved the coercion of minorities, and the "only alternative to coercion is partition." The Cabinet Mission plan for a centralized government with authority limited to defense, foreign affairs, and communications, leaving the provinces to be grouped according to their communal make-up and given very broad powers, was grudgingly accepted by both the Congress Party and the Moslem League. It passed into political limbo when the Moslems later returned to their demand for "full Pakistan," and savage and continued rioting broke out almost everywhere that Moslems and Hindus were in close contact.

It was this murderous strife which brought the mainly Hindu Congress to the reluctant conclusion that without partition the country would be plunged into a devastating civil war. "The united India we labored for," said Nehru in his indorsement of the Mountbatten proposals on June 3, "was not one of compulsion and coercion but a free and willing association of free people."

The surprise element in the Mountbatten plan was its announcement of Dominion status for both Indias as soon as the necessary legislation can be passed by the British Parliament. This promises almost immediate de facto independence, for although many Americans do not realize it, Dominion status confers full sovereignty, including the right of secession from the British Commonwealth. The new Indias, when they write their constitutions, can declare themselves independent republics if they wish, severing every connection with the British crown. Moreover, as Lord Mountbatten was at pains to make clear, there are no strings attached. There are to be no British bases in India and apparently no claim for special economic privileges. Britain, in fact, is retiring from India on terms that contrast very favorably with our self-advertised "generosity" to the Philippines.

While a basis for the peaceful transfer of power in India has been achieved, let no one think all will be smooth sailing from now on. The problems that remain to be solved are formidable and likely to cause plenty of friction. Delineation of the boundaries between Pakistan and Hindustan, for instance, will surely prove an arduous task, requiring prolonged bargaining. Then there is the question of communications. India is knitted together by a great network of railroads designed partly to satisfy defense requirements and partly to promote economic unification. To break up this network into two national systems would be absurd.

How are commercial relations between the two Indias to be conducted? The introduction of tariff barriers in what has been a great free-trade area would be a most retrograde step, costly to both states. Pakistan is likely to be a surplus food area; Hindustan will have most of India's industrial and mineral resources. The basis for a continued free exchange of goods remains. Yet there is a distinct danger that the Moslem area will follow a policy of economic nationalism and seek to acquire industrial strength by protective measures.

Another complication is provided by the princely states, large and small, with their more than 90,000,000 inhabitants. The British government has made it clear that "paramountcy" relations between the British crown and these states will lapse and that their rulers must come to terms on their own with the new Indias. They may try to establish complete independence but they cannot hope to attach themselves directly to the British Commonwealth. Most of the smaller states will probably agree to adhere to whichever of the two Indias surrounds them. But there are possibilities of trouble with such large states as Kashmir and Hyderabad. The former, with a mainly Moslem population but a Hindu ruling class, is contiguous with the western Moslem area. The latter, with a Hindu population and a Moslem ruler, lies in the heart of southern Hindustan. Any attempt by these two states to establish themselves as independent nations would be bitterly resisted.

We have touched here on only a few of the problems that face divided India. They are not insoluble provided that the two Indias tackle them in a spirit of genuine cooperation. Without that cooperation the future will be a stormy one; with it there is hope that India, free at last to develop along its own lines, will come to play an outstanding role in Asia and the world.

Letter from Moscow

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, June 8

I HAVE not written to The Nation for some weeks because the situation here has continued rather fluid, with nothing much, as the phrase goes, to get one's teeth into. Now there are two things: Hungary and the aftermath of the Margate conference.

President Truman has just said that the present Hungarian situation is an "outrage" and that "the United States does not intend to stand idly by in the matter." Of course not. But why, it is asked here, before a full investigation of the facts, suggest that this is a red plot? If you question the British about it, they say, "Whatever one thinks of Russian methods of dealing with a situation of this kind, it is pretty certain there was a plot led by Bela Kovacs and involving several other leaders of the Smallholders' Party. The State Department jumped in last month with its fierce protest about Kovacs's arrest, and we as usual followed rather meekly; but we did not have a strong case. Since there was undoubtedly a plot, the Russians have a good prima facie case. Before jumping in with all fours we ought to see what the rights and wrongs are or we may look pretty silly when all the facts are known."

There is an uncomfortable feeling, however, among many diplomats here that "fact-finding" may not be the real problem any more. Isn't American "toughness" being exercised in places closer and closer to Russia's borders? Wherever there is opposition to the Russians or to pro-Russian governments, are not its leaders always confident of American support—whether their case is otherwise good or bad—and are they not always getting such support? Small wonder the Vienna commission set up by the Moscow conference is getting nowhere; the question of German assets is not really the key problem at all. One well-known Austrian here remarked the other day: "Nothing is simpler than the problem of German assets. Under the Russian formula the Russians are entitled to 180 plants, under the American formula to 100 plants. If they were willing to split the difference, the matter could be settled in five minutes. But that is no longer the real problem, and the coming clash over Hungary proves it conclusively."

The real danger now is the stimulation of a great political hullabaloo in Hungary which will inevitably cause a grave economic upset at the very time of year when bringing in the harvest is the country's first task. Hungary's harvest is particularly important, for Rumania, through an extraordinary run of bad luck, is having its third drought year in succession. Already half of its maize crop is reported ruined, and its livestock was slaughtered last winter on a disastrous scale.

I wrote last time about developments in the first few weeks after the Moscow conference. All the guns of the Soviet press, radio, theater, and screen were turned against America, while Britain was left in peace, and there were even numerous hints of Russia's desire for a rapprochement with it. At a public lecture in Moscow a well-known speaker talked on "The British Empire Today" and indicated that it was a factor of stability in the world and that not the Soviet Union but the United States was threatening its integrity. Who was the great enemy of imperial preference? America. Who was competing with British oil interests in the Middle East? America. Harold Wilson's trade mission was well received in Moscow. Eventual prospects seemed bright for large-scale British trade with a non-dollar area like the Soviet Union.

A few days before Margate, when Bevin made his Commons report on the Moscow conference, Izvestia came out with a four-column sledgehammer attack on the Foreign Secretary which was stronger than anything previously written against British foreign policy. On no point whatsoever did Izvestia agree with Bevin, and it came as near calling him a liar as diplomatic conventions permit. The attack on Bevin was fully as sharp as the attack on Marshall some time earlier. It had the effect on the Margate conference that could have been foreseen.

There was great disappointment here with the results of Margate. This could be seen in the prominence given to Harry Pollitt's article on the conference, which even criticized the Labor "rebels," insisting that they should try to influence "the masses"—the workshops and the trade unions—rather than "merely the readers of the New Statesman and Nation." All this is naturally linked with the topic which is dominating all Russian political reasoning today—America's diplomatic and "dollar" offensive. Perhaps it was decided that wooing England at this stage might only be interpreted as a sign of weakness.

Recent anti-British newspaper attacks have not been confined to Bevin. Several blasts were directed against the British press—even more than against the American press—because of articles by British correspondents who wrote their "inside Russia" stories after staying here seven weeks, mostly at the Moskva Hotel. Various kinds of articles appeared, but the Russians concentrated on the silliest and most malicious. As a result the Russian reader received a pretty hideous view of the British press. Undoubtedly many of the writers sneered unnecessarily at the shortage of food, housing, and consumer goods, which was attributed to the Russian system rather than to the war. Since then the New Times has come out with a statement that the censorship of foreign-press telegrams has only one purpose: to prevent misinformation, lies, and slander being printed about the Soviet Union abroad. One trusts this will be the censorship's immutable rule.

Meanwhile, the Russian people appear largely occupied with domestic affairs. They and the government are expecting to reap the reward of a particularly strenuous year in the form of a good harvest. In most parts of the country weather conditions have been reassuring. There has been a good deal of rain in the Volga country, the Don country, the North Caucasus, Central Russia, Siberia, and the greater part of the Ukraine—where the hot weather has now set in—and estimates of the harvest vary from "very fair" to "good." All this is important for Russia for various reasons—for example, the great difficulties which Rumania and Bulgaria may face owing to the drought in both countries. And there are other places, including England, where Soviet grain may be welcome.

Behind India's Crisis

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, June 6

MOUNTBATTEN has scored a great personal triumph which may mark him as an outstanding contributor to world peace. Six months was the period originally granted him by Attlee to study the Indian situation and report back to the British Cabinet. It was widely stated that he had been given full discretion to make any variations in the British plan for India which might seem appropriate.

Within six weeks Mountbatten was convinced of two things: (1) The original plan for the transfer of power by June of next year was too slow. It required the assumption of an interim responsibility for the maintenance of peaceful conditions which British authorities were finding it increasingly difficult to discharge. From his talks with Indian leaders Mountbatten realized that the transfer of power must be begun sooner if the rapid deterioration of conditions was to be arrested. (2) The original plan for a single federal authority for the whole of India—the "union center" with power over defense, foreign affairs, and communications—had no chance of acceptance by Jinnah and the Moslem League. They refused to compromise on their demand for the division of India and therefore would not enter the Constituent Assembly.

The Cabinet time-table for India—first a new constitution framed by a single constituent assembly and then the taking over of power next June—obviously could not be carried through. Mountbatten made repeated attempts to persuade Jinnah of the dangers inherent in a division of the country, which meant also a division of the armed forces. In these prolonged talks he made not the slightest impression. Indeed, at a late stage Jinnah introduced a new demand for a corridor a thousand miles long between Eastern and Western Pakistan.

Mountbatten saw only too clearly that without some measure of cooperation from the Moslem League the transfer of power next year would mean catastrophic civil war. The large-scale riots throughout northern India from Calcutta to Peshawar seemed only a rehearsal for yet greater bloodshed. The abandonment of the original British plan, however distasteful, struck him as a painful necessity. Patiently but with quick decision he worked out a new plan, "at every stage and every step inviting the cooperation of the Indian leaders," as he revealed at a press conference in New Delhi earlier this week.

The Congress leaders, while insisting that the work of the Constituent Assembly go on, were wedded to the principle of coercing no areas into accepting the authority of the federal center. But they insisted that the principle applied with equal force to those parts of Bengal and the Punjab which, being non-Moslem, would not consent to inclusion within Pakistan. Jinnah resolutely refused to agree to a truncated Pakistan as economically impracticable. Gandhi, a passionate believer in the unity of India, preached the gospel of non-violence in the face of unexampled mob fury. Then, suddenly and characteristically, he called on the British to quit India immediately instead of waiting until next June. To Jinnah he said: Convince us of the soundness and desirability of Pakistan after the British withdrawal; everything would be yielded to reason but nothing to force.

Meanwhile the situation was rapidly getting worse. Arson, murder, and stabbings became common happenings; bombs, hand grenades, tommy-guns, rifles, and revolvers seemed abundantly available. The movements of the rioters revealed skill and experience in organized warfare. The food situation caused anxiety. India's wheat crop had been poor, and the shortage of food grains this year is estimated at four and a half million tons—about 15 per cent of the normal production. Strikes have curailed cloth production by eight hundred million yards, or one-sixth the annual output of the textile industry. The cost of living shows little sign of coming down, the index of wholesale prices last week being 250.

Mountbatten took one of those "calculated risks" which he said he had learned to take in Southeast Asia during the war. Jinnah wanted a second constituent assembly and the partition of India.

Very well, he could have both, but the lines of division would be decided only after the wishes of the people concerned had been ascertained. Next week in all probability the Bengal and Punjab legislatures will meet and vote on the division of these provinces into Moslem and non-Moslem areas. It will be a rough-and-ready process based upon accepting the census figures of 1941 as correct. Later a boundary commission will be appointed to demarcate the areas with greater precision.

The Northwest Frontier Province, though overwhelmingly Moslem, has a Congress ministry wielding authority. Jinnah wanted its dissolution and the absorption of the province into Western Pakistan. Mountbatten, in rejecting this demand, made the concession that the issue would be decided by a referendum.

Similarly in Assam, bordering on Burma, a referendum will be held in Sylhet, which has a Moslem majority. The utmost that Jinnah can expect from this balloting is a truncated Pakistan consisting of Sind, with its great airport and harbor at Karachi, the western Punjab, the Northwest Frontier Province, eastern Bengal, and Sylhet. Presumably he has reconciled himself to such an outcome since he cannot obtain more without bloodshed. He had cautiously recommended the Mountbatten plan to his followers as the best possible under present circumstances.

The Congress leaders for their part can go forward with their task of framing a permanent constitution without the handicaps imposed by the Cabinet mission's plan. For instance, the powers of the union center need not be restricted to foreign affairs, defense, and communications as was originally contemplated. However, partition of the country, as Nehru confessed "with a heavy heart" in a broadcast two days ago, is not a pleasant prospect. He sought comfort in the hope that after a taste of it "India might still reach that conception of unity sooner than otherwise," and the unity might have more secure foundations.

Gandhi has finally reconciled himself to partition. Through the grant of dominion status, he has obtained in substance his demand for an immediate British withdrawal—by the middle of August British control over India's administration will be replaced by that of two dominion governments. Even this seems to him inadequate compensation for the division of the country, but Mountbatten did not go farther than to accept the Congress Party's resolution indorsing the principle.

The Sikhs, perhaps more than any other major party, have reason to feel dissatisfied with the latest proposals. They have been supporting partition of the Punjab, but the line of demarcation cuts their homeland into two equal halves and leaves an important center like Lahore in Western Pakistan. There is talk of resistance, though many Sikh leaders realize that no compromise solution of such a complex problem can satisfy all parties. The surprise is that Mountbatten has come so near an ideal solution that both here and in London it has received overwhelming support, even Churchill and the diehard Tories accepting it.

Recent experiences, however, are a warning against easy optimism. At least twice in the course of the last twelve months British proposals have met with a favorable reception, only to be rejected by Jinnah. Next week the Congress Party and the Moslem League will pronounce their final verdicts on the Mountbatten plan. It seems safe to prophesy that both organizations will support it despite its obvious defects.

What the princes will do is a question. Mountbatten has told them plainly enough that they must join one of the two constituent assemblies and rely no more on British protection. Several princes have prudently already taken steps to fall in line. Some, however, under the influence of reactionary British officials who have been so long in India that they fail to appreciate world trends, are perversely holding out and threaten to declare their independence of both Pakistan and Hindustan. But the princes are perhaps a comparatively minor factor in the Indian problem.

In normal times one would say that the promise of full dominion status by the middle of August was a step of revolutionary proportions. But times are abnormal. India's administration for months past has been running dangerously slow because of political uncertainty, economic discontent, and Hindu-Moslem strife.

As seen by Oscar Berger

Nehru

Nehru, in expressing his determination to suppress "shameful, degrading, and revolting violence," condemned the use of violence to achieve political ends. A similar condemnation was evoked from Jinnah, though it sounded inadequate and mild.

The boldness of Mountbatten's solution, his resourcefulness and amazing energy, has won him enormous regard throughout India. If these qualities enable him to prevent further civil strife, not only will India be spared untold horrors, but there will be hope, in Nehru's words, of "building anew our relations with England on a friendly and cooperative basis, forgetting the past which has lain so heavily upon us." Mountbatten may yet do for India what Lord Durham did for Canada.

The Battle of A. V. C.

BY DANIEL JAMES

ONE year ago a thousand vocal, idealistic young men and women gathered at Des Moines, Iowa, to launch formally the most impressive of the new World War II veterans' organizations—the American Veterans Committee. A program of progressive aims and principles was hammered out. Democracy prevailed in the elections. At the same time a sharp undercover struggle was fought between the Communists and the national leadership, and while the non-Communist forces succeeded in reelecting Gilbert A. Harrison as vice-chairman, their opponents were only temporarily downed.

A decisive battle between these elements will almost certainly take place when the A. V. C. convenes in Milwaukee next Thursday. Since Des Moines the Communist issue has become crucial. In certain parts of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois it has received more attention at chapter, city, and state meetings than housing, employment, or education. At times the smoldering dissension has burst into the open, as when Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., attacked A. V. C.'s Communists in a widely reported speech last January. In fact, A. V. C. now harbors two highly organized, opposing factions which are preparing feverishly for Milwaukee.

Like many Americans, A. V. C. members are concerned with the mounting anti-red hysteria, which threatens also to inundate progressivism. They rightly sense the danger of a real fascist movement inherent in it. And like many liberals, therefore, these "citizens first" have been worried lest opposition to communism provide grist for the fascist mill. But experience has shown the veterans in A. V. C. that there is a fancied menace manufactured by the enemies of progress and a real menace confronting them in their daily organizational life; that while they fight totalitarianism without, they are being weakened by totalitarians within; and that at some point being a liberal means repudiating the false premises of both extremes and planting one's feet firmly upon a third path.

The Battle of A. V. C. began early in 1946 when the Communist Party began seriously to "infiltrate" the organization. Regarding the ex-service man as a particularly vital force, the Communists are determined to exert as much influence over him as possible. In the event of a national crisis, not to speak of another war, America's fifteen million veterans may overnight become the nation's most important bloc. Whoever leads any sizable articulate and organized fraction of these millions can conceivably wield great power of decision.

Toward the end of the war the Communists decided to try to capture the American Legion, which they believed would eventually contain a preponderance of youthful World War II veterans who could be activated against the old Legion bureaucracy. But while they set their sights on the great wealth, powerful machinery, and community standing of the Legion, they had no intention of neglecting other groups. In the August, 1946, issue of the Communist Party organ, Political Affairs, John Gates, chairman of the party's Veterans' Committee, wrote, "Progressive-minded veterans, especially trade-union veterans, should follow the lead of the Communist veterans . . . [who] are increasingly active in all veterans' organizations, including, and not the least of all, the Legion and the V. F. W., and seek to unite all veterans in the struggle."

Inside the Legion the party made a special effort to capture the National Conference of Union Labor Legionnaires and to weld all pro-labor elements into a single power bloc. To corral another potent force, the Negro, it established what amounts to a segregated group of its own, the United Negro and Allied Veterans of America. And to entice members of other minorities, it organized Veterans Against Discrimination. Boring from within and pressuring from without, the Communists early resolved to have a finger in every veterans' pie.

When A. V. C. made its modest start, the Commu-

ists thought they could afford to ignore it. They became irritated, however, as soon as the new group promised to attract those most useful to the party's ends, the progressives. They accused A. V. C. of "dividing" the veterans and especially of diverting the liberal-minded from their main task, which was "to unite all veterans" in the Legion or the Veterans of Foreign Wars. When Charles Bolté's book, "The New Veteran" was published, various literary hatchet-men went to work on it. Walter Bernstein, a former Yank correspondent, wrote such a slanted and inaccurate review of it for The Nation that the editors found it necessary to invite his ex-colleague on Yank, Merle Miller, to present the other side of the case in the same issue. Bernstein's chief complaint was that A. V. C., while "noble in purpose," could "easily become isolated from the mass of veterans."

But A. V. C. did not become "isolated." Throughout the demobilization period it grew at the rate of 500, then 1,500, then 2,500 a week. And its physical growth was outstripped by its mounting influence. A. V. C.'s counsels were heeded by the nation's legislators. It was the only veterans' organization to testify at the Senate hearing on full employment. It was the first to launch a veterans' housing campaign. It was credited with responsibility for breaking down the navy's barriers against Nisei enlistments. Bolté was news almost daily. Diverse national figures like Harold Stassen, the late Evans Carlson, and Marshall Field, Jr., became members. A. V. C. had become a force and was here to stay.

The Communist position changed accordingly. Within a few months—to judge from the line taken by the Daily Worker at any rate—it swung from bitter enmity to excessive ardor. In November, 1945, the Communist daily mentioned A. V. C. only four times, once most disparagingly in a review of Bolté's book. By March, 1946, a month in which more than 10,000 ex-soldiers joined A. V. C., it was giving the young organization three or four pats on the back weekly. By May, when A. V. C.'s membership had shot up to over 50,000, the Daily Worker was positively coddling it with a plug a day. A pre-convention interview with Bolté in the issue of June 2, 1946, did as much to build up the national chairman as another article had done a few months earlier to knock him down.

By May, 1946, the party had sent the bulk of its available forces into A. V. C. At about the same time the New York City chapters planned to hold their first convention. Here was a chance for the party to make its initial bid for power. Hundreds of delegates who met to draw up a platform and write a constitution never knew what hit them. The Communists, with the advantage of surprise, a tightly disciplined machine, aggressive leadership, and long experience in boring from within, achieved a victory which shook both New York and the national organization to their foundations.

The next step, planned as the final one, was to be the seizure of the national machinery. Early in the spring of 1946 a document attacking Harrison, founder of A. V. C., was circulated among the national membership. Its arguments were repeated in prolific correspondence and in speeches made by leaders later found in the pro-Communist camp.

By June the Communist caucus, A. V. C.'s first, was fully organized, and Harrison had emerged as its special hate, a symbol of the supposed "conservatism" of A. V. C.'s national administration. (His real crime, it developed afterward, was that he had been one of the first to sound the alarm against the Communists.) Frederick Borden, a publicity man for the National Citizens' Political Action Committee, became the darling of the "progressives" because he claimed to represent a militant "leftist" approach. Thus the Communists and their allies deliberately destroyed the broad agreement on liberal objectives on which the organization's existence was predicated. Borden now entered on a struggle with Harrison for the vice-chairmanship.

Meanwhile, what of Chairman Charles G. Bolté? Though he was denounced by the Communists, Bolté's prestige in A. V. C. was unharmed. No figure of equal stature had arisen to challenge him. Knowing he would be elected at Des Moines, the Communists decided to make it unanimous. Their strategy was to contest the vice-chairmanship, elect as many of their men as possible to the National Planning Committee, and try later to make Bolté their "front" man and captive.

But the Communists had pushed A. V. C. too hard. The other delegates did not want the nation to go like New York. They organized at the eleventh hour. Bolté publicly announced his support of Harrison. Borden suddenly came out for "unity" and withdrew in favor of a "compromise" candidate. Harrison won comfortably, and the party's adherents were lucky to gain a third of the seats on the N. P. C.

The continuing undercover struggle was brought into the open in November by the passage of an anti-Communist resolution by the National Planning Committee, which is A. V. C.'s ruling body. The vote was fifteen for, four against, with five abstaining for tactical reasons. When the resolution was submitted to a national referendum, it was supported by nearly two-thirds of all A. V. C. members. The opposing third consisted of outright Communists (least in number), close sympathizers, fringe friends, and confused liberals.

Organized opposition to the Communists now increased, and early this year it became obvious that they were in retreat. But Communists admit neither retreat nor defeat. Having failed to take the fortress by storm, they are now stealing up on it by the devious paths of "unity." This is the current aspect of their campaign in A. V. C. Epithets like "left" and "right" are now used apologetically, only by way of explanation. True, the national leaders are still attacked as reactionaries, but other approaches receive greater emphasis. Lesser leaders are visited and built up, independents are taken out to lunch, all and sundry are begged to sit down and discuss calmly how to do away with factions—that is, all factions but the Communists.

Twelve months ago the siren call of "unity" might have brought thunderous applause from A. V. C.'s rank and file. Today it falls on deaf ears. A year of intern warfare has taught the average A. V. C. member more of what he ought to know about Communist technique. Some have fallen by the wayside, unable to stomach the in-fighting. But the majority are no longer a disorganized mob battling against a disciplined army; they are themselves a trained and disciplined force.

In a double sense these A. V. C. independents carry heavy responsibility. If they defeat the Communists in Milwaukee—and there is reason to believe they will—then A. V. C. will have a second chance to grow into the great veterans' movement it ought to be. At the same time the victory will lend new courage to those outside A. V. C. who are fighting the same battle.

Is Life Insurance Healthy?

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

HEALTH education is in great danger of falling into the hands of high-pressure advertising agencies and their copywriters. The National Health Council's Gunn-Platt report on "Voluntary Health Agencies" strongly criticized uncoordinated attacks on specific diseases, but new groups and campaigns are still springing up like mushrooms. The New York Medical Society expressed its concern over the situation in an article in its official publication called The Atomization of the Health Education Movement. We now have fund-raising foundations to combat tuberculosis, heart disease, venereal disease, mental illness, old age, infant mortality, infantile paralysis, rheumatic fever, hypertension, arthritis, cancer, diabetes, epilepsy, alcoholism, multiple sclerosis, Hodgkin's disease, birth palsy, and high blood pressure; and the list cannot claim to be complete. Too many of these agencies base their money-raising campaigns on the fears they arouse. Indeed, one of the biggest advertising firms, we are told, has hired a famous scholar as a specialist in the psychology of fear. Practicing physicians are greatly disturbed by the unfortunate effects on their patients of this stimulated anxiety about their health.

We have just witnessed, for instance, the overstatements of the anti-cancer campaign. The fact is that the death rate from cancer has been steadily declining in recent years—see the Statistical Bulletin of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company for April, 1947.

Another aspect of the situation is brought out by the following case-history, which could be duplicated many times. An intelligent and sensitive patient who has been subjected to anti-cancer propaganda notices a small tumor. He has just been implored by film stars and advertising writers to ask for immediate medical attention. The doctor, though the tumor looks completely harmless, recommends surgical removal and microscopic inspection of the tissue in order to cure the aroused cancer fear of his patient. The small operation is performed, and the laboratory findings completely confirm the benign character of the tumor. The patient then forgets about the incident—until, a few years later, he applies for life insurance, answers his questionnaire conscientiously, and is rejected as a bad risk.

To many people getting or not getting a life-insurance policy seems to mean life or death. Rejection as a bad risk starts in them a severe traumatic neurosis. The judgments of the medical supreme court set up by the private insurance business are a greater interference with a doctor's sacrosanct relationship to his patient than any system of compulsory insurance against sickness could ever be.

I am not the only doctor concerned about the psychological effect of rejections by insurance companies on sensitive patients. Dr. H. T. Hyman in his "Integrated Practice of Medicine" says: "The practitioner often finds himself in conflict with the life-insurance investigators and their medical staffs. . . . Confidence and faith in the physician are undermined through the stupidity of attempting an art [the art of prognosis] in terms of mathematics." The rejected patient, of course, believes that his doctor has withheld from him the gravity of his condition.

I think this situation deserves the serious consideration of both insurance companies and physicians. Intelligent patients responding to the exhortations of our public-health propaganda in a conscientious and rational manner, as did the patient with the tumor, ought at least to know that they are exposing themselves to punitive action by an insurance company. Automatic classification of such cases as bad risks is not only contrary to all reason but conducive to unnecessary emotional shock.

Before I sat down to write this article I asked the advice of the medical director of one of the biggest insurance companies in the country, and I am sorry that I cannot quote his whole pro-insurance reply. This official recognizes the need for greater cooperation between insurance physician and private physician, but he maintains that "a policy is a contract, and a person is not bound to apply to any particular company for his insurance; nor is the insurance company bound to issue the insurance as applied for . . . our rules are not as autocratic as you suggest."

I am not in a position to solve this problem. I feel that the activities of life-insurance companies belong in the domain of public interest. I feel that their statistical and clinical techniques for medical evaluation of life expectancy lag far behind the latest medical knowledge and are largely based on mechanical and scientifically unsatisfactory tests and figures. The relationship between life and death is a very sensitive one. The evaluation of a person's biological age and life expectancy, in contrast to his chronological age, is probably medicine's most urgent problem and the one in which the least progress has been made. The price of life insurance has only recently been partly adjusted to the tremendous extension of our life expectancy. Previously it was based on antiquated and incorrect—and from the standpoint of the customer unfair—census tables.

Ways and means must be found to prevent our valuable life-insurance system from becoming a danger to public and individual health. Perhaps some method of impartial arbitration might be set up, conducted by neutral physicians who could reach a compromise between the business interests of the company and the responsibilities of the physician for his patient. The whole system of acceptance or rejection should be reorganized; each case should receive at least as much individual consideration as draftees received from the Selective Service authorities. There should be opportunities for appeal, with a reasonable chance of success, in cases of alleged injustice. Exchanges of opinion should be possible between company and private physicians.

Everybody might derive more benefit from the institution of insurance if the companies would realize that death is something more than a financial risk.

Bright Spot in the West

BY CAREY MCWILLIAMS

Denver, June 2

IN THE prevailing gloom of November, 1946, Western liberals and progressives overlooked the one bright spot on the political scene. In Colorado, the Republican Congressman from the Denver district, Dean Gillespie, who might best be described as a caricature of the Republican politician at his inimitable worst, was replaced by John Carroll, a liberal Democrat, and the Republican Governor, John Vivian, was defeated by the Democratic candidate, W. Lee Knous. The victories of Carroll and Knous were generally ascribed at the time to the maladroitness of the Colorado Republicans, notably Governor Vivian, who had been repudiated by his own party. But today there is reason to believe that the reaction against the G. O. P. was not a mere convulsive spasm but the start of a new trend in Rocky Mountain politics.

Recently the citizens of Denver, turning out in record numbers, elected Quigg Newton mayor by an impressive margin. Supported by a coalition of forces, Newton received more than 80,000 votes, nearly double the number cast for the runner-up, United States District Attorney Tom Morrissey, a Truman-Tom Clark Democrat. Ben Stapleton, the incumbent, who with minor interruptions has bossed municipal politics in Denver for twenty years, received only 17,551 votes, though he was supported by the A. F. of L.; District Judge William A. Black, who was backed by the Republican stalwarts, only 5,203. William Dietrich, said to have been the candidate of the Communist Party, got a mere 400. Newton's striking victory was probably due less to the general dissatisfaction with the Stapleton machine than to the breadth of the coalition that supported his candidacy. He was endorsed by both the Denver Post and the Rocky Mountain News, and his campaign was actively aided by the Railroad Brotherhoods, the C. I. O., and the important Rocky Mountain Social Action Council (now affiliated with the Progressive Citizens of America).

Quigg Newton, thirty-five years old, is the youngest mayor in Denver's political history; he is also the first native son to be elected to the office. After graduating from the Yale Law School, he served for a time as legal assistant to William O. Douglas in the Securities Exchange Commission. At the end of the war, in which he served as a commander in the navy, he opened a law office in Denver, became active in civic affairs, and in 1946 was voted "Denver's outstanding young man" by the Junior Chamber of Commerce. His wife is the daughter of former United States Senator Shafroth, long active in Democratic politics. Newton is personally attractive and has considerable wealth. His father, a pioneer Colorado lumberman, was a prominent advocate of public housing in Denver; Newton himself has studied the subject in Europe and might be rated a "professional." Everyone in Denver with whom I discussed his election expressed complete confidence in his integrity and believed that he would make an excellent administrator. While not a liberal on all issues, Newton has revealed a real interest in minorities, housing, governmental reforms, and the establishment of a pattern of civilized industrial relations.

There is a strong current of rebellion in Denver against the "let-things-alone" position of the city's aging financial oligarchs. As State Senator Arthur Brooks, a young liberal Republican, phrased it, "The voters recognize that Denver is now a modern industrial city and no longer primarily a nice place for retired Western capitalists to spend their declining years in." In no Western city is there a more wide-awake attention to regional, national, and international issues than in Denver, which recently welcomed 1,700 delegates to the UNESCO conference. On May 24 more than a hundred delegates attended the conference of the Colorado Unity Council, such outlying cities and towns as Rocky Ford, La Junta, Pueblo, Colorado Springs, and Boulder being well represented. California is the only other state which has such a state-wide civic council. I attended the conference and was deeply impressed by the energy and enthusiasm of the delegates.

The new trend in Colorado politics dates from 1944 when Charles A. Graham conducted a brilliant but unsuccessful fight to unseat the incredible Gillespie. The campaign unquestionably paved the way for the victory of Carroll last year. Graham, a young lawyer, was formerly with the NLRB and for a time acted as regional director of the War Labor Board. He is a leading spirit in the Rocky Mountain Social Action Council, which issued from a conference on atomic power called in Denver in 1945. The council is largely made up of business and professional men. I visited its headquarters during the November, 1946, election and admired the energetic way in which Phil Reno, its executive, was helping to elect John Carroll. Professors from the University of Denver were stuffing envelopes, carrying on a telephone campaign, and reporting on the precincts for which they were responsible. I detected none of the aggravated in-fighting, as much personal as ideological, which makes the life of a liberal in Southern California a succession of embittered caucuses and midnight plottings. The political activities of the Rocky Mountain Social Action Council appear to be rooted in issues immediately affecting the West, whereas in Southern California liberals who will rally for Greece at the drop of a hat hardly know that the Central Valley project exists or that the city of Los Angeles faces an acute water and power shortage in the next decade.

Most of the ferment in Colorado finds expression through the Democratic Party, but some promising stirrings can be discovered in Republican circles. The Republican Party in the state has long been bossed by the "Seventeenth Street Gang," which includes spokesmen of the Great Western Sugar Beet Company and the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company. One man, Lawrence Phipps, from the time that he acquired a seat in the United States Senate until his retirement from active political life some years ago, made most of the important decisions for the party in Colorado. To such an extent was this true that minor party officials and leaders suffered from acute frustration. No new leaders were developed; Senator Phipps always hand-picked the candidates. Like a baseball team that has permitted its farm system to disintegrate, the Republican machine in Colorado is today in a state of genteel decomposition—witness the miserable showing of its candidate in the mayoralty election.

This state of affairs offers opportunities which may well be seized by some young and able liberal Republican. Arthur Brooks, whom I mentioned above, led the fight for a state F. E. P. C. in the legislature and is credited with having defeated a measure to outlaw the closed shop. Gifford Phillips, who made a success of his first publishing venture, Rocky Mountain Life, now owns and operates a radio station in Pueblo and has ambitious plans for a chain of radio stations and rural newspapers. Interestingly enough, these young liberals seem to be about midway between Stassen and Wallace in their general political point of view.

Although Truman is probably assured of the Democratic nomination, many things can happen between now and convention time in 1948. If a popular revolt against Truman should be organized, it would have a better chance of success in the West than in any other region. Nowhere else perhaps are party loyalties taken so lightly; or do local political interests cut so sharply across party lines. A Western states' conference of labor and liberal forces is being frequently discussed at the moment. It might be the means of organizing a Western revolt against Truman.

Del Vayo—"Report from Spain"

MY UNCHANGING theory that the American people are much wiser in their approach to foreign affairs than is their government is confirmed by an important and timely book just published—"Report from Spain" (Holt, $3). The author, Emmet John Hughes, now chief of the Time-Life bureau in Rome, can hardly be dismissed as a red. His first book, "The Church and the Liberal Society," was a Catholic Book-of-the-Month Club selection. He has told us how in Spain he attended "Mass every Sunday and Holy Day of the four years I passed there." Mr. Hughes left the diplomatic service to enlist in the army and was reassigned to Madrid as a member of Military Intelligence. From that vantage point he has written one of the most conclusive studies we have of that fascist regime which has survived the military defeat of fascism. His book combines good journalism with the inside knowledge he gained in the service.

Mr. Hughes begins with a quotation describing the Franco regime taken from the standard elementary textbook used today throughout Spain, "El Curso Completo de Primera Enseñanzas": "Spain is a totalitarian country and its Chief is His Excellency the Caudillo, Generalissimo of the land, sea, and air forces, and Chief of the Government." His portrait of the dictator is exact and sharp: "Short in stature, with that abdominal curvature that delights caricaturists, smiling rather lamely, a bit like an unwilling and inarticulate toastmaster at a big banquet." Franco is a devoted Catholic, in the opinion of Mr. Hughes, and yet "in the entire bleak history of Nazism not a single instance is known when the champion of Spanish Catholicism suggested, either publicly or through diplomatic channels, even a modest concern over the Nazi Party's persecution of the church."

A monarchist, too, but on the condition that he himself shall embody the monarchical principle. Mr. Hughes wrote his book before Franco had announced his cynical law of succession—just ratified by acclamation in the Spanish "Parliament"—which makes him at once king, regent, and dictator. But Mr. Hughes does report that some time ago two generals and an admiral called on Franco to persuade him to restore the monarchy. "Franco rose slowly from his seat, stalked around the desk to confront the men at close range, and with the most violent gesticulations delivered the shrill harangue: 'You, too! You do not understand that the monarchy is lo parcial and my regime is lo total. I am here to fulfil a divine mandate, and any contrary maneuver is an act against Spain itself.'" That was in 1943, before Franco dreamed about becoming the ally of the democracies in their primary post-war job of stopping Russia.

In the light of that incident and as a result of a thorough survey of Franco's entourage, the army, and the Falange, it is futile, as Mr. Hughes shows, to hope for a change in which Franco will bow and disappear from the stage and the Spanish democrats—not too democratic—will take his place peacefully and in complete array.

Mr. Hughes's analysis of Anglo-American policy toward Spain from "the period of long-range verbal artillery beginning with the San Francisco conference" until last December, when the Assembly of the United Nations passed its resolution recommending the recall of ambassadors from that country, is the best part of the book. The report of the inevitable reactions to that policy inside Spain, which he himself witnessed, confirms all that has been published in The Nation in the last few years. "No intention of interfering in Spanish affairs? That sounds strangely like democratic policy toward the civil war, out of which Franco battled his way to power. And if the democracies have no such intention, why are they issuing a note [the statement of the Western powers of March 4, 1946] urging the Spanish people to change their own government?" Two years of fear, of vacillation, of bold but empty words, have led to a situation in which Franco is stronger than ever. "The post-war policy of the Western democracies, the policy of our State Department," says Mr. Hughes, "has registered utter failure in its announced purpose of speeding political evolution in Spain."

The aim of that policy, expressed in frequent statements of British and American spokesmen, was twofold: to avoid the risk of civil war in Spain, and to deprive communism of any chance to win ascendancy there. A new civil war has almost been imposed upon the Spanish people by the strategy of keeping Franco in power, and nine years after the first civil war he is enforcing one of the most cruel repressions of his entire era. Stop communism? "Every month, every week, every day," writes Mr. Hughes, "the prestige and power of Spanish communism are growing. Soviet Russia is not achieving it. We—the Western democracies—are doing it." Anglo-American policy has left the forces of Spanish democracy without support, with little reason for hope, and with no sure knowledge even of its political purpose. A detailed and extremely intelligent analysis of every major Allied "decision" on Spain leads this serious and responsible commentator to one conclusion: "If Spain does matter to the United States [he gives dozens of reasons to prove that it does], if we wish to see the Falangist state destroyed, if our national interests would not be well served by a Communist Spain, if we hope to help the Spanish people escape another civil war, for their sake and that of the world, then it is time to do something a little more impressive than issue verbal manifestoes and to speak phrases that make more sense than to instruct 'patriotic Spaniards' to seek out and 'find means' to effect a 'peaceful withdrawal' of General Franco."

"Report from Spain" should be read by every American who wants a real knowledge of one of the most crucial issues in Europe today, and it should also be read by the members of the Security Council of the United Nations, from whom we await another report on the Spanish problem—the report on what each member state has done to fulfil the recommendations of the December resolution.

Oil: East and West

IT IS too bad that the newspapers are giving so little attention to the hearings on the Anglo-American Petroleum Agreement which, after many postponements, started this week before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Superficially they may seem of interest only to the oil industry, which is acutely divided about the merits of the agreement. But actually the problems of oil politics and economics under discussion are of vital interest to everybody.

At first sight the agreement, concluded in London in September, 1945, appears an innocuous and non-controversial document. In the first place, it affirms two general principles which hardly anyone would care to challenge: (a) adequate supplies of petroleum should be accessible in international trade to all countries "on a competitive and non-discriminatory basis"; (b) the interests of producing countries should be safeguarded "with a view to their economic advancement." Secondly, it provides for the establishment of an international petroleum commission with purely fact-finding and consultative functions. In the words of Harold L. Ickes, who headed the American negotiators of the agreement, this commission "will operate as the forum to which the problems of the international petroleum trade can be brought, threshed out openly and frankly, and the way pointed to their voluntary solution." The commission will have no powers to compel action either by the signatory powers or by any of their nationals.

In the light of this summary it may be hard to understand why the State Department should regard the treaty as a matter of prime importance, and, equally, why the "independent" oil interests of this country should consider it a deadly menace. The only possible explanation seems to be that there is more in the agreement than meets the eye and that its innocent phraseology masks an understanding for a friendly division of the world's oil resources between the big American and British trusts, an understanding reached with the tacit blessing of both governments. At any rate, it is noteworthy that in the twenty months since the document was signed, plans for the joint exploitation of the great Middle Eastern fields, whose reserves exceed those of the United States, have advanced rapidly.

Standard Oil of New Jersey and Socony have made a long-term contract with the Anglo-Italian Oil Company for bulk purchase of crude oil and have undertaken to help finance a pipe line from its fields to the Mediterranean. These same two companies, together with their British, Dutch, and French partners in the Iraq Petroleum Company, have decided to duplicate the existing line carrying oil from northern Iraq to Haifa and Tripoli. The British Shell company has made a bulk-purchase contract with Gulf Oil, which has a half-interest in the newly opened Kuwait field. Finally the "Red Line" agreement has been abrogated, which enables Standard of New Jersey and Socony to buy into the Arabian-American Company now exploiting the vast Saudi Arabian concessions. This last move caused trouble with the French, who felt they were being squeezed out by an Anglo-American deal, but they have been pacified by promises of a larger share of an increased Iraq output.

As a result of all these arrangements hundreds of millions of dollars are to be invested in drilling new wells in the various Middle Eastern fields, in building refineries and other facilities, and in laying pipe lines. Within five years, it is believed, present daily production of the area—750,000 barrels—may be doubled, making it possible to meet all Europe's petroleum requirements. Thus even if the Anglo-American agreement is never ratified, the bogey of the American independents—a large competing supply of oil—is well on the way to realization.

In their propaganda against the agreement the independents have stressed this fear less than their claim that it would lead to increased federal interference with the industry. To support this charge they point to Article II, the only section which applies to the domestic petroleum industry. It declares "that the exploration for and development of petroleum resources, the construction and operation of refineries and other facilities, and the distribution of petroleum shall not be hampered by restrictions inconsistent with the purposes of this agreement." This clause appears to be a declaration against discriminatory treatment by the signatory powers of each other's oil concerns, and it is difficult to see how it could become an entering wedge for federal control of the industry. However, it might be regarded as barring the restriction of oil imports—for instance, by a quota arrangement for which the independents are beginning to agitate. This possibility may well be the nub of the opposition to the agreement.

The split of opinion between the major oil companies, with their world-wide interests, and the smaller independents, which produce only for the domestic market, is not hard to explain. The majors, noting a shift in the center of gravity of world oil from the Gulf of Mexico-Caribbean area to the Persian Gulf area, are in a position to adjust their operations accordingly. Hitherto they have supplied their distribution networks in Europe largely from the fields they own in Venezuela and Colombia. In the future they propose to draw instead on the cheap production of the Middle East and so free Caribbean resources for consumption in this hemisphere, including the United States.

This prospect fills the independents with alarm. They see costs rising, as oil becomes harder to find in this country, but prices held down by the competition of cheap foreign oil. Hence they are looking for more protection than the present tariff of 10½ cents a barrel affords. As rugged individualists they scorn government interference with their business, but they are eager enough for government interference with the consumer's business—the purchase of oil as cheaply as possible. Attempting to justify this attitude, they constantly challenge the widely held belief that dwindling American oil resources make increased imports both desirable and inevitable. Next week I shall endeavor to show why I think the facts are against them.

BOOKS and the ARTS

WILLA CATHER

BY MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

TWENTY years ago, at fifty, Willa Cather stood at the height of her career, with fifteen years of her best work behind her and her most popular book, "Death Comes for the Archbishop," claiming an unstinted admiration. When she died at seventy, on April 24, she had already come to appear as the survivor of some distant generation, remote from the talents and problems of the past two anxious decades. This estrangement could have been no surprise to her. It was of her own choice and election. In 1936 she admitted that her writing could have "little interest for people under forty years of age. The world broke in two in 1922 or thereabouts," and it was to "the backward, and by one of their number," that she addressed her later books. She had, in fact, so addressed her work ever since she first found her real bearings in authorship, with "O Pioneers!" in 1913. Backwardness was with her not only a matter of material and temperament. It was the condition of her existence as an artist.

She was one of the last in the long line of commemorators and elegists of American innocence and romantic heroism that virtually dates from the beginnings of a conscious native artistry in American literature. Her books were elegies, and Irving, Cooper, Hawthorne, Twain, and Sarah Orne Jewett figure in their ancestry. When, on rare occasions, she praised her fellow-craftsmen, from Miss Jewett to Katherine Mansfield, Thornton Wilder, or even Thomas Mann (who "belongs immensely to the forward-goers. . . . But he also goes back a long way, and his backwardness is more gratifying to the backward"), it was usually because they also turned to the past and rooted their values there.

She was quite aware of the false and bogus uses to which the historical sentiment had been put in American fiction. Its products surrounded her in the early nineteen hundreds when she was feeling her way toward her career: "machine-made historical novels," "dreary dialect stories," "very dull and heavy as clay"—books by John Fox, Jr., James Lane Allen, Mary Johnstone, and their successful competitors, the memory of which today is like "taking a stroll through a World's Fair grounds some years after the show is over." She knew Miss Jewett shone like a star in that lusterless company, that Henry James "was surely the keenest mind any American ever devoted to the art of fiction," that Stephen Crane "had done something real." She also had to learn the secret of their distinction the hard way. She came out of the West attracted by the prairie girl's mirage of the East—its cities, salons, opera houses, studios, Beacon Hill sanctities, Atlantic liners, with the shrines of Europe beyond. Her early stories, many never collected in her books, are full of this worshipful glamour, and she was past thirty-five when she tried to make something of it in her first novel, which combined a problem out of Mrs. Wharton, a setting out of Henry James, and an outsider's clumsiness with inevitable results in self-conscious stiffness and crudity of tone. Only then did she remember the advice of Miss Jewett: "The thing that teases the mind over and over for years, and at last gets itself put down on paper—whether little or great, it belongs to Literature." "Otherwise," as Miss Jewett had also said, "what might be strength in a writer is only crudeness, and what might be insight is only observation; sentiment falls to sentimentality—you can write about life, but never life itself." Miss Cather put Beacon Hill and Bohemia behind her. She returned to Nebraska, to a prairie town trying hard not to be blown away in the blast of a winter wind. She found the local habitation of her talent, and her serious career in art began.

From that point she began her journey into lost time, going back beyond

Nebraska, Colorado, and Kansas to colonial New Mexico, to eighteenth-century Quebec, and finally to the pre-Civil War Virginia of her childhood, every step taking her deeper into the values and securities she set most store by. She had, to help her, her rediscovered devotion to the scenes of her early youth, the Western fields and skies she called "the grand passion of my life," her brilliant gift for rendering landscape and weather in the closest approximation to the poetic art of Turgenev and Gogol our fiction has seen, her retentive sympathy with the life of farms, small towns, prairie settlements, immigrant colonies, and Southwestern outposts and missions. In all the tales of regional America that have been produced in the past thirty years nothing has exceeded her skill in evoking the place-spirit of rural America in her finest books—"My Antonia," "A Lost Lady," "The Professor's House," and "Death Comes for the Archbishop."

The pathos of distance by which she induced her special poetry into these scenes was, of course, stimulated by her feeling that the inspiring landscape of the prairies, deserts, and mountains, no less than the gracious charms of colonial Virginia or old New York, had been obliterated by a vulgar and cheapening modernity. The garage that now stands on Charles Street in Boston on the site of the house where Mrs. James T. Fields once held court to "Learning and Talent" was symptomatic for Willa Cather of a general and humiliating degradation. So the old wagon roads of the West, "roads of Destiny" that "used to run like a wild thing across the open prairie," had been resurveyed and obliterated to make highways for tourist and motor traffic. The railways once "dreamed across the mountains" by a race of Titans, highways in the heroic conquest of the West, were streamlined for commuters between New York and Hollywood. Wooden houses and piazzza'd mansions, once landmarks of pioneer fortitude and hospitality, came down and suburban Tudor or sham Château went up in their place. The frontier universities that had once fostered a scholarship of vision and historical passion yielded to academic power plants thick with politics and careerism. She despised such a world, whose literature itself she saw as mere statistics and "sensory stimuli," and apparently preferred to be despised by it.

The interesting thing about Miss Cather's career is that it started in protest against and flight from the very world she ended by idealizing and mourning. It recapitulates a characteristic American pattern of rebellion and return, censure and surrender. The prairie and small town, the Western hinterland and the neighborly community, as she presented them in her best early stories—"A Wagner Matinee," "Paul's Case," "The Sculptor's Funeral," "A Death in the Desert"—were objects of a moral reproach and castigation as severe as anything she later directed against the vulgarizing influences of the modern world. She was, indeed, a pioneer in the twentieth-century "revolt from the village," and she spared no scorn in describing the provincial spirit. It had created the life of a "dunghill," of petty existences, of "little people" and a small humanity, of stingy hates and warping avarice that made generous spirits shrivel and ardent natures die. The savagery of her indictment is the strongest passion she ever summoned in any of her works. Her frontier in those days was not the West; it was the East and the world of art, with desire the goad of her heroes and heroines and the running theme of her stories, as much as it was of Dreiser's.

It was in young artists—the dreaming, headstrong, fractious, or unstable young, fated to defeat or bad ends by the materialism and ugliness of their surroundings—that she first envisaged the heroic ideal. Paul, Katharine Gaylord, Harvey Merrick, and Don Hedger are the defeated or dishonored "cases" that foreshadow the triumphant lives of Alexandra Bergson, Thea Kronborg, Antonia Shimerda, Archbishop Machebeuf, and Nancy Till, and that lend their note of frustrated desire to the middle terms of Miss Cather's argument —the inspired spirits who do not succeed but who, by some force of character or apartness of nature, lend significance to the faceless anonymity around them. These characters—the "lost lady" Marian Forrester, Myra Henshawe, Tom Outland, Professor St. Peter, even the slighter Lucy Gayheart in a later novel—are the most persuasive of Miss Cather's creations, her nearest claims to skill in a field where she was admittedly and obviously incompetent—complex and credible psychology. But somehow she could never bring her opposites into full play in a novel. They remained irreconcilably differentiated, dramatically hostile, morally and socially incapable of true complexity.

The full-bodied and heavily documented novel was never congenial to Miss Cather; she rightly understood her art to be one of elimination and selection, which eventually meant that it was an art of simplification and didactic idealization. "The Song of the Lark" and "One of Ours" drag with detail. "My Antonia" and "A Lost Lady" are her finest successes because there her selection defines, suggests, and evokes without falsely idealizing. When she seized a theme of genuine social and moral potentiality in "The Professor's House" or "My Mortal Enemy," she pared away its substance until she produced what must always be, to her admirers, disappointingly frugal and bodiless sketches of two of the most interesting subjects in the America of her time. And when she decided to model "Death Comes for the Archbishop" on the pallid two-dimensional murals of Puvis de Chavannes, she prepared the way for the disembodied idealization, making for dulness and passivity, that overtook her in "Shadows on the Rock," weakest of her books and portent of the thinness of her final volumes.

What overtook her characters and plots is the same thing that overtook her version of American life and history. She could not bring her early criticism into effective combination with her later nostalgic sentiment. She represents a case analogous to that of Van Wyck Brooks, who started by disproportionately castigating American literature and has ended in a sentimentalization

A Field Hospital

He stirs, beginning to awake.

A kind of ache

Of knowing troubles his blind warmth; he moans,

And the high hammering drone

Of the first crossing fighters shakes

His sleep to pieces, rakes

The darkness with its skidding bursts, is done.

All that he has known

Floods in upon him; but he dreads

The crooked thread

Of fire upon the darkness: "The great drake

Flutters to the icy lake—

The shotguns stammer in my head.

I lie in my own bed,"

He whispers, "dreaming"; and he thinks to wake.

The old mistake.

A cot creaks; and he hears the groan

He thinks his own—

And groans, and turns his stitched, blind, bandaged head

Up to the tent-flap, red

With dawn. A voice says, "Yes, this one";

His arm stings; then, alone,

He neither knows, remembers—but instead

equally unbalanced and simple-minded. So Miss Cather, never having mastered the problem of desire in its full social and moral conditioning, passed from her tales of ambitious artists and defeated dreamers, worsted by provincial mediocrity or competitive careerism, to versions of American idealism and its defeat that never come to satisfactory grips with the conditions of society and personal morality. As her lovers, her artists, her pioneers, and her visionary Titans became disembodied of their complex humanity, so her America itself became disembodied of its principles of growth, of conflict, and of historical maturity. There obviously worked in her nature that "poetic romanticism" to which Lionel Trilling has so ably referred her case: what Parrington called "the inferiority complex of the frontier mind before the old and established," the pioneer's fear of failure but greater fear of the success which comes "when an idea becomes an actuality," the individualism to which F. J. Turner credited the pioneer's failure to "understand the richness and complexity of life as a whole." So to Miss Cather's early veneration for the distant goals and shining trophies of desire, ambition, and art, there succeeded a veneration for lost or distant sanctities which gradually spelled her diminution as a dramatic and poetic craftsman. The village, the prairie, the West, the New Mexican missions thus became in time abstractions as unworkable, in any critical or moral sense, as her simplified understanding of Mann's Joseph cycle. Art itself, in her versions of Flaubert, Gogol, Mann, or Katherine Mansfield, took on a remote ideality and aesthetic pathos that do much to explain her distaste for Dostoevski or Chekhov. And the church, to which she finally appealed as a human and historical constant, became in her unimplicated and inexperienced view of it the most abstract of all her conceptions, a cultural symbol, not a human or historical actuality, and the least real of any of the standards she invoked in her judgments and criticisms of the modern world.

She defended her art in an essay, "The Novel Demeublé," in 1922, which belongs among the theorizings by artists which constituted for Henry James an "accident" which is "happiest, I think, when it is soonest over." At best, it shows Miss Cather's temerity in venturing into "the dim wilderness of theory"; at its worst it must be taken as one of those ventures which justify themselves only because they tell what a restricted view of art some writers must impose on themselves in order to get their own kind of work done. In 1922 it had some value as a warning against the excesses of realism and cataloguing in fiction, as a preference for insight and feeling over "observation" and "description"; but when it went on to assert that Balzac's material—not merely Paris and its houses but "the game of pleasure, the game of business, the game of finance"—is "unworthy of an artist," that the banking system and Stock Exchange are scarcely "worth being written about at all," and that "the higher processes of art are all processes of simplification," it set Miss Cather down as an aesthetic fundamentalist whose achievement was bound, by the nature of her beliefs, to be sharply curtailed and truncated. She stood by the essay; she reprinted it unmodified in her later editions. And there it shows, post facto, how little a principle of simplification serves its believer if he is also an artist. Miss Cather was setting up a standard directly opposed to Zola's creed of naturalism—and similarly deluding and disabling in its literalness and crudity. For both sensibility and naturalism arrive at the same impasse when they deny art its right to richness of thought and complexity. What such principles limit and curtail is not merely craftsmanship; it is subject matter itself. Miss Cather saw as little as Zola did that to inhibit craftsmanship or content is to inhibit or starve the sensibility and insight themselves, and to arrive at the sterility of high-mindedness and the infirmity of an ideal. It is artists who have denied their art and their theory no possible risk, challenge, or complexity who have arrived at a longer lease on creative life; it is to James, Conrad, Yeats, Eliot, and Valéry that we turn to find, in theory no less than in practice, the right clues to endurance and authority in modern literature.

Yet it was by such means of simplification, discipline, curtailment that Miss Cather made her achievement possible and wrote the books of her best years—books which, if mostly minor, are wholly her own, and if elegiac in their version of American history, revive a past that was once, in all its innocence, a reality, and that required, in its own delusions as much as in the versions of it she created, the correction and resistance of a later realism. It was her honesty and stubborn sincerity in rendering it that made possible her real contribution to contemporary literature: she defined, like Dreiser, Scott Fitzgerald, and a few other of her contemporaries between 1910 and 1930, a sense of proportion in American experience. She knew what it meant to be raised in the hinterland of privation and harsh necessities; knew what it meant to look for escape to Chicago and the world beyond; knew how much has to be fought in one's youth and origins, what privileges of the richer world mean when they are approached from the outposts of life, what has to be broken away from and what has to be returned to for later nourishment, and how little the world appears when its romantic distances and remote promise are curtailed to the dimensions of the individual destiny. Scott Fitzgerald gave superb expression to this experience in the last eight pages of "The Great Gatsby"; Katherine Anne Porter has given another and classic version in her work; perhaps Miss Cather had something to do with preserving for such artists that proportion and perspective in American experience.

The space of seventy years is too short in human history to enable anyone to claim that he saw the world break in two during it; the measure of man's fate is not to be calculated so conveniently; to do so is to impose a personal sentiment on something too large to accept it. And it was to such sentiment, with its attendant didacticism and inflexibility, that Miss Cather finally submitted. But it is also true that she lived through a cleavage and a crisis in something more than American life; that she saw "the end of an era, the sunset of the pioneer," that it "was already gone, that age; nothing could ever bring it back"; and she defined the pathos, if not the challenge and moral imperative, and writer concerned in it. She did something in a time of distraction and cultural inflation to make a new art possible, as much by the end she defined for one tradition as by the personal example of self-correction and tenacity she set. And Miss Cather also did something the aspirant to classic quality rarely achieves: she wrote a few books—"My Antonia" and "A Lost Lady" chief among them—that are American classics and that still can tell us, in a time of sanctified journalism and demoralized sophistication, how much of a lifetime it costs to make that rare and expensive article.

Report on America

INSIDE U. S. A. By John Gunther. Harper and Brothers. $5.

FOR sheer vitality and for courage bordering on temerity John Gunther wins my profound admiration. Three years ago the explorer of the world's insides set out to do for the United States what he had done, with far less risk, for Europe, Asia, and Latin America. Disavowing the philosophical approach, he assigned himself the task of discovering "the forces that make this incomparable Golconda of a country move." He visited all forty-eight states, thirty-eight of the forty-three American cities with more than 200,000 population, and scores of smaller communities. He talked with more than 900 people—from Harry Truman to hotel bootblacks—and was shown the door only by Senator McKellar, who naturally "turned a color between a prune and a plum" when Gunther had the bad taste to mention the TVA.

Nonplussed, like thousands of others, at the flamboyant contradictions of "the greatest, craziest, most dangerous, least stable, most spectacular, least grown-up, and most powerful and magnificent nation ever known," Gunther asked everyone he met what there was about his community that distinguished it in his own mind from other communities, and, above all, who ran it. In addition he read enormously and saw everything from Chinook salmon climbing the ladders of the Bonneville Dam to Miami's rooming houses for "Gentiles Only." He took more than a million words of notes—and in the end he discovered that few generalizations were possible; that "a whole lot of phenomena run this country," which for all its reputed standardization, is staggeringly heterogeneous. And he finds this a saving grace, "because democracy, if healthy, can feed on its own defects, and take succor and sustenance from its own variety."

If the failure to synthesize, to pin down convincing over-all conclusions, appears to be a disappointing weakness of the volume, it should be noted, first, that it is an almost-inevitable weakness given the design of the book, which follows a geographic pattern, progressing from state to state rather than from subject to subject; second, that Mr. Gunther proposes to write a second volume on the United States, based on Washington and national in perspective; and, third, that failure to catch the elusive quarry in this case is more than compensated for by the pleasures of the chase. In his search for the mainsprings of the U. S. A. Gunther has compiled the richest and liveliest collection of facts, impressions, observations, quotations, descriptions, statistics, portraits, and anecdotes about this country ever assembled between two covers.

The information that cascades out of this 920-page thesaurus takes a wide and colorful variety of forms, all intermingled with a journalist's scorn for sustained sobriety. There are, first, the encyclopedic little essays, like those on the raising and marketing of wheat, the structure of the Mormon church—with side excursions on the advantages and disadvantages of polygamy—the extracting of iron ore from "the biggest hole ever made by man," the "bull rings" of Iowa which furnish semen for the artificial injection of thousands of cows at $6 per cow, the life-history of the salmon, and the workings of TVA.

There are, second, the scores or more of vivid biographical sketches. In California alone Gunther pays his respects to Hiram Johnson, who once campaigned against his own shady father and whose ability was matched only by his outrageous vanity; Earl Warren; Roger Lapham; Bob Kenny ("one of the most engaging men in America"); Harry Bridges, whom he compares, oddly, to Jimmy Walker; and the fabulous immigrant banker, Giannini. Wheeler comes in for an extended, rough, but eminently fair dissection. So do Dewey ("one of the least seductive men in public life") and Bricker (a "Throttlebottom come to life"). Taft fares somewhat better and Vandenberg much better; but the real encomiums are reserved for such as LaGuardia, Philip Murray, Wayne Morse, Glen Taylor, Saltonstall ("practically the nicest person anybody ever met"), Wilson Wyatt, Harold Stassen, and Ellis Arnall.

Then there are the fascinating and little-known bits of early history of the various states, lively, illuminating, and usually introduced with good purpose. It is impossible, for example, to understand why Oregon should be traditionally Republican and conservative while its neighbor is sometimes referred to as the Soviet State of Washington, unless one knows of the staid New Englanders who settled the one and the frontier adventurers who stopped short of Alaska to settle the other. Some of the most cogent bits of analysis in the book are given to Negro-white relations, not only

In the "schizoid" South but in explosive Northern and Western cities like Detroit, Kansas City, and Los Angeles. In view of the striking material Gunther sets forth in this field, it is a little hard to share his characteristically buoyant conclusion that "in no other country—despite everything—have most Negroes quite so much potential opportunity as in the United States."

Strewn over every page of sober and shrewd observation are countless oddities and trivial notes that would not have occurred to a Tocqueville or a Bryce—such as the daily mileage of New York's elevators, and the fact that Charlotte, North Carolina, is statistically the murder capital of the country. In this category also are the scores of rash superlatives that sometimes give the book a superficial, even juvenile, tone that does injustice to its general quality.

The most striking revelation in Gunther's sea of information is the physical emptiness of America. I did not realize, for example, that the United States still has 455,183,251 acres of public domain, that "in the mountain states alone it owns almost one-half the total area," that some Western lands were only last year reopened to homesteading, and "almost anybody who wants to be a farmer can go out and get some." It might be a good thing to call these passages to the attention of the House Judiciary Committee, which is now considering the Stratton bill to admit to this country a wretched 100,000 displaced persons a year for four years. The same committee might also note the astonishing extent to which second-generation Americans fruitfully dominate many of the country's most vigorous and productive areas. Some of the corn counties of Nebraska, for example, are so solidly Czech that Bohemian is spoken almost as commonly as English. At the same time the state with the highest percentage (98.7) of native-born Americans with native-born parents is Arkansas, "the most untouched and unawakened of all American states"—even the South "is inclined to be ashamed of it and says that it belongs more properly to the West, which it doesn't."

What I miss most in the Gunther compilation is any proper attention to the cultural aspects of American life. Newspapers come in for a fair amount

HARPER Books Appraising Higher Education

THE LIGHT THAT FLICKERS

A View of College Education which Contrasts Promise and Performance and Suggests Improvements

By DEXTER MERRIAM KEEZER

Formerly President, Reed College, Portland, Oregon

This book is a sparkling distillation of one man's experiences as a college president—observations and an appraisal of college administration by a man vitally concerned that liberal education shall be improved to meet the challenge of the current scene. Far from an abstract discussion of educational theory, his book probes specific problems such as trustee, parent and community relations, curricular organization, extra-curricular activities, honorary degrees and adult education, and presents new, constructive methods of handling them. The result is an amusing but astute overview of college education, an incisive analysis of present weaknesses, and a delightful, humorous picture of the impossible task of being a college president.

"... his observations should be carefully considered and weighed by all who want to improve our colleges and universities. This book, in my judgment, should take its place among books on the higher learning with G. Stanley Hall's 'Life and Confessions of a Psychologist'."—Paul H. Douglas, Professor of Economics, University of Chicago. $2.50 of consideration, though rarely as to content, but there is nothing about the impact of the movies, nothing about books or book clubs, nothing about the country's magazines, columnists, or comics, nothing about radio, and nothing about advertising—all forces that tend to bind the Boston Irish to the Volga Germans of North Dakota, the Polish Americans of Milwaukee to the Mexican Americans of California.

Much on the cultural side of American civilization may be lying dormant in Gunther's notes for "Inside U. S. A., II." Essentially this first volume is a regional guide, with the emphasis heavily political. City and state "bosses" come in for a great deal of attention, from Memphis's benevolent and surprisingly polished tyrant, Ed Crump, to Maestri of New Orleans, who, entertaining President Roosevelt at lunch, is said to have inquired, "How you like dem oysters?"

It is impossible in a review to do more than suggest the enormous energy that has gone into this book or the wealth of information that comes tumbling out. To Mr. Gunther it all adds up to the conclusions that "the long-run mood of this country is progressive," that "the era of unmitigated monopolistic control of the means of production . . . is as dead as Tutankhamen," and that while free enterprise is far from dead, "the next New Deal will make the last New Deal look mild," because with 23 per cent of the American people living outside the American system, "the free-enterprise philosophy is not working well enough." They seem like sensible conclusions, but, to Gunther's credit, the evidence for them is not stacked. One may read this same huge body of facts and come to wholly different conclusions. As Mr. Gunther says, he is not trying to be a political philosopher but a reporter. That he is—and one of the best.

ROBERT BENDINER

A Good Reminder

IN DEFENSE OF REASON. By Yvor Winters. The Swallow Press and William Morrow and Company. $4.

MR. WINTERS has here put together the three volumes in which his critical work of the last twelve or fourteen years first appeared in small editions and from small presses. To these he has added an essay on Hart Crane's "The Bridge." Together they make a unit which Mr. Winters is right in calling a Defense of Reason. That is what his work comes to; and that, therefore, is what this review chiefly intends to estimate. For surely there can be no dodging the fact that Mr. Winters's criticism is powerful, informed, consistent, and for the most part just—with only those errors caused by too great a rigidity in the structure of his intellect. Nor, as surely, can there be any doubt as to the enlightening accuracy with which he examines the technical matters, especially the metrical matters, of verse; he belongs with Bridges and Patmore; his prosody is loving and exemplary. That is, it is clear that Mr. Winters's criticism is of great use in getting at American literature both for what it says or tries to say and for how it says or fails to say it. Why is it, then, that his criticism is not in general use? What is so formidable about this body of literary thought that it is more ignored than fought, more fought than understood? Is it that we duck blows that we cannot return?

The answer lies in the habits of our age. Mr. Winters's criticism is judicial; we have a horror of judgment because we do not know what it might destroy in our potential selves. Mr. Winters's judgments are in accordance with explicit standards; we have a necessary preference, in the world we live in, for all the implicit standards we do not measure up to. Mr. Winters's standards have a tendency to be applied through law; we tend to feel that law either satisfies brute force or results from statistical averages and feel no kin whatever to the ius gentium: to the predictive and judicial force of our common nature. Mr. Winters believes in the supremacy of reason, under God, in human affairs; he is therefore orthodox and a monster in the wilderness; for we are not, with regard to Mr. Winters's point of view, either reasoning or reasonable men. He is as alien to us as only the thing we ignore in our hearts can be: the thing we forget we still are.

In the effort to forget a persistent thing we tend to make it something else. We try to make Mr. Winters seem what we mean by an absolutist rather than what he means by it; we make a substance out of a method, and confuse his judgments with the means—his convictions of possibility—by which he makes them. Mr. Winters is an absolutist, but only in the sense that he conceives—like the noble and necessary lies of Plato—that absolute truths must exist, which the mind may approach in apprehension and to which its judgments must attempt to conform; but he does not believe that he is in possession of the absolute, or even that he is possessed by it. He is a moralist and a rationalist; he believes in the serious value and understandableness of the major human enterprises, among which he puts the arts in first rank, and his absolute truths are the ideal forms of his allegiance. He is therefore against hedonism, relativism, determinism, romanticism, and that peculiarly modern theory of the division of the mind's labor on experience known as aestheticism. He will isolate nothing, except for analysis, but insists on seizing as much of the whole of experience as may be in an act of rational imagination or imaginative reason. It is not only that he by instinct repels confusion and insists on discerning order in chaos, but that he has a mastering conviction that there is relation and there is order in chaos and that these are definite and particular and are accessible by moral and rational means. It is thus that for him poetry becomes a precise instrument for the high contemplation—for the deed of high understanding—of a moral, rational, and purposeful life. I am not certain that he would accept it, but I would like to add that under his view poetry might be held not only to make rational statements about life and to judge it morally but also to create, or elicit, motives in life otherwise lacking or felt only as hidden promptings.

What happens when this point of view is applied to American literature? It is shown as coming everywhere short of its own intentions, as everywhere lost, or agonized, in its possibilities; short, because it could not make rational statements of what it was about; lost, because it refused the illumination and propulsive force of deliberated form. For rational statement it substituted pseudo-statement, that is, statements not correlated to the experience represented; and for deliberated form it substituted what Mr. Winters calls "the fallacy of expressive form," that is, the conception that a thing must have its own form even to that extremity where chaos is expressed by chaos. Thus the triumphs of American literature come about by tours de force, by the identification of the artist with his experience, or by accident.

Of course I exaggerate. And Mr. Winters exaggerates, but not as much as people think; he exaggerates a real thing. Surely it is enlightening to keep his point of view in mind when one thinks how much of modern American literature is either case-history or deals with the artist or outsider as the hero against the world; or again when considering the prevalence of specialized art, specialized criticism, and their consequence in the cult of initiates acting the old part of audience. Mr. Winters only exaggerates to make his point; and if we cannot accept his point as theory we cannot escape it as fact. His work is a very good reminder of the rational and formal qualities present, and highly valued, in almost every living literature except our own. Reading him, the old habits prompt and stir us.

and that made it imperative for popularizers to rush into the field. The results were of varying quality. But with the publication of Professor Hecht's book we finally get a little masterpiece of popularization.

I have always felt that a successful application of the art of simplifying science for the layman requires not only that the writer be a good writer but that he be a good scientist. Usually we get either one or the other—and sometimes neither. But Hecht belongs to the Huxleyan variety: he is both a first-class scientist and a writer who expresses himself with ease and polish. The result is a book which I would like to recommend strongly to all intelligent citizens. True enough, the lay reader with no elementary equipment of physics and chemistry will hardly take in the contents as rapidly as he would a newspaper column; however, with a little effort, he should be able to digest most of the ideas presented.

Professor Hecht, who by the way is a distinguished biophysicist, uses the historical method in developing his topic. Step by step the drama unfolds, beginning in Act I with the atom of the Greeks and ending in Act II with the peculiar "splitting" of uranium (1939). From then on, "neutrons," "fission," "chain reactions" were used and applied more and more—until the mighty atomic bomb swallowed a section of the earth's crust and shattered the few atoms of complacency still imbedded in us (finale of Act III).

Toward the end of his book Dr. Hecht writes: "If man can put into the practice of world relations the same honesty, the same courage, the same intellect, and the same drive that have gone into science and the accumulation of knowledge, then the future will be a happy one." This brings us to the big "if" and to the inevitable "how." For consider that man: what an incongruous mixture of glory and folly is this fellow; how utterly incomprehensible, for example, that this creature of nature who dives into the atom and brings to the surface divine specks of beauty and truth should be the same creature who dives into hell and brings about world wars. Ye men of wisdom, what is the answer?

BENJAMIN HARROW

Science as Myth

TRACKS IN THE SNOW: Studies in English Science and Art. By Ruthven Todd. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

WE HAVE long thought T. S. Eliot correct in saying that after the seventeenth century came a fissure between feeling and the scientific intellect, a dissociation of sensibility. These four essays raise, by implication, a certain doubt of Eliot's opinion, for they suggest that between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries painters and writers like Blake, Fuseli, and John Martin appropriated the "experimental and judicious knowledge" of science and heightened it to vision.

The fifty-six illustrations themselves are lavishly demonstrative. Mr. Todd, keeping the easy, competent tone of the British amateur, fittingly chooses his title from the elegant Edward Gibbon, whose taste for the sciences, he believed, enabled the anatomist and chemist to track him "in their own snow."

Eighteenth-century science was, of course, imperfectly experimental and often injudicious in its curiosity about "phlogiston," its evidence on the Druids and the Flood, and its harebrained regard of orangutans, wild girls, and all those outlandish creatures the Scottish Lord Monboddoo pursued for a lifetime—Dr. Johnson: "I am afraid (chuckling and laughing) Monboddoo does not know he is talking nonsense." This uncertain, occultist science, in the "rational" eighteenth century, inspired in the arts visions we can only call nocturnal. Maybe Mr. Todd's largest service is forcing us again to recognize what we have too often forgotten—the nocturnal, Gothic eighteenth century rediscovered by the surrealists.

The five illustrations of "scientific" museum exhibits are, for example, really nocturnal, surreal: the skeleton within a dense and hideously trimmed forest of severed arteries, fiddling upon a necrotic femur or offering us mayflies and coils of viscera. Here the vision is as double as Tchelitchev's; the pleasures are as ghastly as Dalí's. Studies of fowl and embryos, with other anatomical nudities, by George Stubbs are surrealist animations as well as documents of science.

Blake, intending to free Albion from the science of Bacon and Newton, proclaimed that imagination is divinity in every man. Mr. Todd, in reply, asks whether Blake's ability to see the world in a grain of sand was possible only after microscopic investigations by Leeuwenhoek; his Albion symbolism itself was adopted from Druidical "archaeologists" who reconstructed the Serpent Temple at Avebury; his myth transfigured the speculative myth of the Deluge.

More obsessive are the symbols of Fuseli, that entomologist and nightmare visionary who seemed to Benjamin Robert Haydon simply "a little white-headed, lion-faced man in an old flannel dressing-gown tied round his waist with a piece of rope and upon his head the bottom of Mrs. Fuseli's work basket." Mr. Todd mentions the relation between this contriver of "neatly coiffured obscenities" and the pre-Raphaelites. He might have insisted harder upon his relation with that other arranger of cruel, impassive masks—Aubrey Beardsley, as lapidary as Fuseli but more ceremonial and decorative.

The inventor-painter John Martin hardly belongs in the earlier strange world of Fuseli and Blake. The fissure is deep between Martin's ingenious plans for elastic iron ships and his titanic Biblical spectacles like "Belshazzar's Feast." His visions monstrously enlarge space; he once explained, "I mean that tower to be seven miles high." The tiny studies by Blake, however, prove that mere enlargement of space is not psychological landscape, and Martin's care to be "astronomically correct" indicates that he cannot master the fantastic perspective, the evocative distortion, of the nocturnal eighteenth century. His adaptations from science are literal. He is no voyant, but only an illustrator. For him madness is a refuge; in Fuseli and Blake what looks like madness is often an appropriation of science as myth, a special unification of sensibility.

STALIN MUST HAVE PEACE. By Edgar Snow. Random House. $2.50.

AM quite ready to believe Edgar Snow when he tells us that Stalin must have peace: so must we all if civilization is to survive. The question whether the Soviet government is following policies likely to secure peace like our own, blundering along the road to war. On this point I find Snow's convincing. However, I welcome his book—an expansion of his Saturday Evening Post articles—as a worth-while attempt to explain to the American public the rationale of Soviet actions which appear quite unreasonable to us, and as a useful reminder that we frequently have stones at the Kremlin from a morally exposed glass house. Snow and the Saturday Evening Post are to be congratulated on this series. I can only hope that sometime we shall be able to applaud Snow, and, say, Pravda, on a companion series explaining America to the Russians. That would be a sign that peace was not only necessary but possible.

WELCOME: AN INTRODUCTION TO ECONOMICS. By A. C. Pigou. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

SEEKING to broaden the outlook of his students, the professor of engineering at Cambridge University asked the doyen of British economists to give them a short course of lectures. This little book, which discusses the forces affecting both the production and distribution of income, is the end-result. Written with rare lucidity and enlivened by a dry wit, it admirably achieves its author's aim of providing "an outline sketch of an important part of economics that shall be intelligible and, if possible, interesting to non-economists."

BERLIN UNDERGROUND, 1938-1945. By Ruth Andreas-Friedrich. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

THIS BOOK supplements in an interesting way A. W. Dulles's report in "Germany Underground" reviewed in The Nation of May 17. While Mr.

Dulles told the story of fateful conspiracies which might have changed the course of history, Miss Andreas-Friedrich, in a diary covering the period from the days of Munich to Berlin's occupation by Russian soldiers, describes the deeds, efforts, and feelings of Germans who played no important part in politics but were merely decent people trying to remain decent during the Nazi years.

Miss Andreas-Friedrich is resentful because the little things that Germans like herself and her friends were able to do in the fight against Hitlerism were hardly ever appreciated outside of Germany. As a matter of fact, those little things brought many thousands of Germans into concentration camps or to the gallows. The author and her friends, through the years of Hitler rule, helped the persecuted, hid and fed Jews, while they hoped and waited for the day when the Third Reich would be destroyed by one of the two forces powerful enough for this work—the German army or the Allied armies. With the true conspirators the author had only casual con-

The History of Japan

By KENNETH SCOTT LATOURETTE

This brief but comprehensive history of Japan covers the subject from mythological beginnings to the present American occupation. "For those who want to learn as much about Japan's past as can be learned from one volume, in order to understand her present and make a sensible guess as to her possible future, this is the book," says The Christian Century.

The History of Japan is based upon Professor Latourette's The Development of Japan, which was originally published in 1918 and went through many editions. For the new book, the author has completely rewritten the material, taking into account the results of recent research and bringing the story up to date. Particularly enlightening is his treatment of the transformation of Japan in the nineteenth century, her rise to the status of world power, and her attempts to dominate Eastern Asia and the Western Pacific.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

Fiction in Review

VLADIMIR NABOKOV'S new novel, "Bend Sinister" (Holt, $2.75), is about a professor of philosophy in an unnamed country who is destroyed by the tyrannical government that has come to power. By my count the book has four successful moments. Three are moments of amusement.

On page 50 Professor Krug, pressed by his university colleagues to present a petition to the Dictator, with whom he had had a boyhood acquaintance, explains why the attempt would be ill-advised. When Krug and the Toad (the name by which the tyrant is privately called) were at school together, Krug had sat on the Toad's face—and not merely once or twice but regularly, as a habit. "I sat upon his face," said Krug stolidly, "every blessed day for about five school years—which makes, I suppose, about a thousand sittings."

On page 124 two organ-grinders arrive simultaneously in a backyard. The pair of musicians look very uncomfortable. Krug, watching them from a window, comments, "'It is a very singular picture. An organ grinder is the very emblem of oneness. But here we have an absurd duality.'"

On page 142 Krug, on his way to an interview with the Toad, passes through a room equipped with a large radio-like machine attended by three doctors and two members of the secret police, from which there comes a steady beat like an African drum. It turns out that the machine amplifies the Dictator's heartbeats so that the strains on his health can be constantly controlled.

There is also in Mr. Nabokov's novel an instance of effective literary imagination. At the start of the story Krug's wife has died, leaving him with a small son to care for. There is a scarcity of servants, and Krug is forced to hire a very young girl as nursemaid for the boy. This teen-aged domestic, at first only slatternly and incompetent, develops into a horror of lewdness, and Mr. Nabokov very tellingly suggests the root-connection between the nursemaid's degeneracy and the social-political degradation that surrounds her.

Such few moments of wit or enlightenment in a book of 242 pages would not ordinarily be worth this isolation and extended report. The reason I note them here is to indicate how little relief from tedium I was able to find in a novel whose way was prepared by the acclaim which its predecessor, Mr. Nabokov's "The Real Life of Sebastian Knight," received in certain critical quarters and which is itself presented by its publishers as an item of great literary prestige.

I suppose it is Mr. Nabokov's elaborate prose method that persuades his publishers that "Bend Sinister" is so distinguished a work of fiction; and I daresay there will be a considerable public to agree with them. This will be the public that has become so tired of the arid prose and method of contemporary naturalism that it welcomes any change as a change for the better. But in point of fact, what looks like a highly charged sensibility in Mr. Nabokov's style is really only fanciness, forced imagery, and deafness to the music of the English language, just as what looks like an innovation in method is already its own kind of sterile convention.

Here is a sample, a single sentence, of Mr. Nabokov's prose; the scene is on a staircase where Krug has to pass a young couple just come from a fancy-dress party, the boy dressed as a football player, the girl dressed as Carmen:

They separated and he caught a glimpse of her pale, dark-eyed, not very pretty face with its glistening lips as she slipped under his door-holding arm and after one backward glance from the first landing ran upstairs trailing her wrap with all its constellations—Cepheus and Cassiopeia in their eternal bliss, and the dazzling tear of Capella, and Polaris the snowflake on the grizzly fur of the Cub, and the swooning galaxies—those mirrors of infinite space qui m'effrayent, Blaise, as they did you, and where Olga is not, but where mythology stretches strong circus nets, lest thought, in its ill-fitting tights, should break its old neck instead of rebounding with a hep and a hop—hopping down again into this urine-soaked dust to take that short run with the half pirouette in the middle and display the extreme simplicity of heaven in the acrobat's amphiphorical gesture, the candidly open hands that start a brief shower of applause while he walks backwards and then, reverting to virile manners, catches the little blue handkerchief, which his muscular flying mate, after her own exertions, takes from her heaving hot bosom—heaving more than her smile suggests—and tosses to him, so that he may wipe the palms of his aching weakening hands.

Surely writing like this is elaborate chicanery. It is not daring; it is merely wilful. It is not original; it is anarchy in an established pattern. It bears the same relation to the prose of the contemporary masters of innovation as the prose of, say, "Gentleman's Agreement" bears to nineteenth-century prose.

On the other hand, to dismiss it simply as bad taste is to pass over a possible larger significance. Mr. Nabokov's novel is written in a claustrophobic style in which the reader's mind is allowed to do no work of its own, in which we are led by meaningless associations into blind alleys and trapped in boredom. But after all, Mr. Nabokov's story of the dehumanization of man under tyranny is a claustrophobic story. Whether or not it was the author's intention to model his prose system on the social system he is attacking, this is exactly what he has accomplished. If, then, Mr. Nabokov's book is praised as a new kind of literary strength asserting itself against the weakness of the old naturalism, must we not be reminded of the way in which a people who have lost faith in liberal democracy welcome tyranny because it initially presents itself to them as a new organizing strength?

The point is obviously not to be pressed too far, and of course I am not suggesting that Mr. Nabokov is a literary precursor of dictatorship. But I do suggest that the passivity of mind and spirit demanded by "Bend Sinister" is not as far removed as may appear from the passivity of mind and spirit demanded by dictatorial governments, and that when we submit ourselves to it we are perhaps betraying a disenchantment with more than old literary methods.

JAMES

"Monsieur Verdoux"—II

CHAPLIN'S performance as Verdoux is the best piece of playing I have ever seen: here, I cannot even specify the dozen or so close-ups each so great and so finely related and timed that withdrawn and linked in series they are like the notes of a slow, magnificent, and terrifying song, which the rest of the film serves as an accompaniment. I could write many pages, too, about the richness and quality of the film as a work of art, in fact, of genius; and as many more trying, hopelessly, to determine how Chaplin's intellect, instinct, intuition, creative intelligence, and pure experience as a master artist and as a showman, serve and at times deserve one another: for intellectually and in every other kind of self-exhaustion this seems incomparably his most ambitious film. And since the film is provocative of so much that cannot be examined as fun, I wish I might also use the many thousands of words I would require to do it adequate honor, purely as fun. And all the more because I love and revere the film as deeply as any I have seen, and believe that it is high among the great works of this century. I wish I might discuss at proper length its weaknesses as a work of art and of moral understanding. I have reluctantly chosen, instead, to suggest a single aspect of its meaning, which seems to me particularly important. And this itself, I fear, I may have reduced beyond usefulness.

Chaplin's theme, the greatest and the most appropriate to its time that he has yet undertaken, is the bare problem of surviving at all in such a world as this. With his usual infallibility of instinct he has set his story in Europe; Europeans are aware of survival as a problem, as we are not. As rightly, he has set aside the tramp, whose charming lessons in survival are too wishful for his purposes, for his first image of the Responsible Man, and of modern civilization. (For Verdoux embodies much of the best that can be said of modern civilization, whether democratic-capitalist, fascist, or communist: whatever he may lack in the way of conscience, he does have brains; and whatever crimes he commits, they are committed, or so he believes, out of compassionate love and in uncompromising discharge of responsibility.) The tramp is the free soul intact in its gallantry, innocence, eagerness for love, ridiculousness, and sorrow; we recognize in him much that is dear to us in ourselves. Verdoux is so much nearer and darker that we can hardly bear to recognize ourselves in him. He is the committed, dedicated soul, and this soul is not intact: we watch its death agonies. And this tragic process is only the more dreadful because it is depicted not gravely but briskly, with a cold savage gaiety; the self-destroying soul is rarely aware of its own predicament.

The problem of survival: the Responsible Man. Chaplin develops his terrible theme chiefly as a metaphor for business. But the film is also powerful as a metaphor for war: the Verdoux home as an embattled nation, the wife and child as the home front, Verdoux as expeditionary force, hero in the holiest of causes, and war criminal. But it is even more remarkable and fascinating as a study of the relationship between ends and means, a metaphor for the modern personality—that is, a typical "responsible" personality reacting to contemporary pressures according to the logic of contemporary ethics.

In the terms of this metaphor the basic cast is small. Verdoux, his wife, and their son are differing aspects of a single personality. Verdoux is the master, the intelligence and the deep unconscious; he has estranged his soul and his future. He has made the assumption that most people make, today—one of the chief assumptions on which modern civilization rests. That is, that in order to preserve intact in such a world as this those aspects of the personality which are best and dearest to one, it is necessary to exercise all that is worst in one; and that it is impossible to do this effectively if one communicates honestly with one's best. Accordingly the personality which, until the world struck that living down, lived in poverty and docility, but happily, is broken and segregated.

The wife and child are shut away in a home which is at once a shrine and a jail; and there, immobilized, and cut off from the truth, they virtually cease to exist as living objects of love; they become an ever more rigid dream. For when the worst and the best in the personality are thus segregated, and the worst is thus utilized in the nominal service of the best, it is inevitably the good, which is exploited; the evil, which thinks of itself as faithful slave, is treacherous master; and evil, being active and knowledgeable, grows; and good, rendered motionless and denied knowledge, withers. Like most men obsessed with the world's ruthlessness, Verdoux carries his veneration of innocence to the extreme; he is determined that it shall never be touched, shall never change (the song of how many million homesick soldiers: "We want to find everything at home just as we left it"). But change is inevitable, and uncontrollable. Ruthlessness and the murderous adoration of static innocence enlarge each other; and the ruthless man becomes the more ruthless because he has broken all communication with innocence. And innocence itself is altered. At the moment Verdoux tells his wife that they own their home at last; she dares to remember sadly that they were happier when they were poor. Her face shows the terrible drugged passiveness of the oversustained, the still more terrible intuitive guilt that comes of all that is uneasily apprehended, untold, and unasked. Small wonder that she has become a cripple; the wonder is that she continues to breathe. Passiveness was forced on her, truth was destroyed, love was undermined, her own love became pity, as surely as her husband's, and in pity and in fear she failed to question what was being done. As is so often true, it was not she who wanted to be so well provided for; that was her husband's desire, the one desire he might hope to satisfy; so she let him satisfy it.

As for Verdoux, he is irreparably committed. All the heart he has left prevents his confessing to his wife, and prevents his changing trades. He could only have chosen his course through defect of love—vengefulness and self-pity masked as pity, pity masked as love; the love-destroying, monstrous arrogance it requires to make the innocent answerable for your guilt—and the constant necessity of deceiving love has damaged love still more profoundly. Like many business men who feel unloved, or incapable of full enough love, he can only propitiate, and express, his love by providing for his family as handsomely as possible. (He can desire this of course, rather than the bare subsistence his wife prefers, only because he respects the standards of the world he thinks he despises. During his docile years, remember, he served at the high altar of modern civilization, breathing year in and year out The Bank's soul-dissolving odor of sanctity, all day every day, touching the sacred wealth he must never dare touch with his conscious desire. When he was thrown out of his job, this ruthlessness released the tremendously impounded ruthlessness in him.) But that is never well enough to satisfy him—and only his satisfaction really counts, in this household—for his wife and child scarcely exist for him except as a self-vindicating dream.

hich he must ceaselessly labor to sustain, improve, perfect, be worthy of. A vicious cycle is established. Only through the best good-providing possible can Verdoux at once express his love, quiet his dying intuition that his love is defective and that he is wrong even in the little that he believes to be right, sustain the dream that is all that remains of love, require of himself ever more obsessive industriousness in crime, and silence his wife.

As good, by his will, is ever more tonally immobilized, evil becomes ever more protean in disguise and self-disguise, ever more mercurial in its journeyings. (The personality is also a constant metaphor for modern civilization—in which, for one instance, creative power is paralyzed except in the interests of gain and destruction; in those interests it is vigorous as never before.) Verdoux cannot bear to sit still, to stop work, long enough to realize his predicament. He cannot feel "at home," at home. He has to act his roles as perfect husband and father, dearly as he wants merely to be both, just as he acts all his other roles. All that he loves is saturated in deceit; and he in self-deceit as well. He gets home seldom, apparently never longer than overnight; the divided spirit can only assert its unity, even its illusion of unity or its desire, in twilight contemplation or in dreams; and the pressure of business is always on him. The pressure of business indeed! Verdoux's family is almost lifeless; such piteously cherished life as it retains, he is hopelessly estranged from. All that requires his intelligence, skill, and vitality, all that gives him life, is in his business. He is the loneliest character I know of: he can never be so desperately lonely as during these hours among those dearest to him, when he must deceive not mere victims, or the world at large, but those he loves. The only moments during which this appalling loneliness is broken, during which he ever honestly communicates, however briefly, with other human beings, are those few moments during which he can know that his victims realize they are being murdered. No doubt he loves his wife and child—there are two of the most heart-stopping, beautiful close-ups ever made, to prove that—but in the fearful depths into which he cannot risk a glance he loves only their helplessness; and deeper, only the idea of love; and that only because it consecrates his true marriage, which is to murder.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

VICTOR has issued Bartok's Violin Concerto (Set 1120); $5.85; Columbia his Piano Concerto No. 3 (Set 674; $4). The violin concerto is an expansive piece of writing with all the outward appearances of connected musical discourse—but in an idiom that makes no sense to me. It seems well performed by Menuhin with the Dallas Symphony under Dorati, and is well recorded. The piano concerto, on the other hand, is a work whose musical thought I can understand; and the first movement, with its arresting opening proclamation by the piano, its fierce, harsh concentration throughout, is the only music of Bartok I have been interested and impressed by; but the rest of what I understand—like the sour chorale and the bird-twitterings in the second movement, the sour fugue in the finale—I find uninteresting. The performance by Gyorgy Sandor and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy seems good; and it is recorded with clarity and good balance of piano and orchestra; but the sound of the piano is cold and that of the high violins in loud passages stridently sharp.

As for other Columbia releases, they include a new recording of Schubert's great Symphony No. 9 made by Bruno Walter with the New York Philharmonic (Set 679; $7). The first movement, as Walter conducts it, is spacious and grand; the second is poignant and lovely, its dramatic climax effectively achieved; but the remaining two come out less well. The continuity in pace of Toscanini's performances is a manifestation of their unfailing continuity of impetus, which one would feel even if he played the scherzo movement of Schubert's symphony in the same relaxed manner as Walter, and with the same occasional slowing down of pace. But in Walter's relaxations of style and tempo one feels the slackness that is his chief weakness as a musician. The performance is recorded with insufficient bass; and its sound is dry and drab, with the violins lusterless and sharp.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 2, not a work of much consequence, is well-performed by Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony (Set 673; $6); and the performance is reproduced with great distinctness, but again with dryness and lack of luster in the violins (there is also some wavering pitch in my copy). Tchaikovsky's Serenade Opus 48 for string orchestra, a moderately engaging minor work, gets a burly performance by Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra, which is reproduced by a wide-range machine with coarseness that disappears on one of limited range (Set 677; $4).

Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 is the best of the group in substance and structure, but even so it is something to hear only when it is played as he played it—which I haven't yet heard anyone do, and which Cyril Smith doesn't do in his performance with the City of Birmingham (England) Orchestra under George Weldon (Set 671; $6). The performance is reproduced with richness of sonority, but with insufficient clarity of detail and poor balance of piano and orchestra.

E. M. Forster's address at the recent Harvard Symposium of Music Criticism—of which I have seen the text—was full of sharp insights, formulated with subtlety and wit, which seem to have been as completely out of the aesthetic and intellectual worlds of some of the other participants as one might have expected them to be. I judge from what I was told of the reactions ("They were annoyed because they thought his arguments were wrong but he wowed the audience with an English charm act") and what I read in a Sunday article of Mr. Downes. Considering what the Downeses and Langs at the symposium are usually concerned with in their discussion of a work of art, I can't imagine them even knowing what Forster was talking about—to say nothing of appreciating its deadly force—when, describing the two aims of criticism, he said: "The first and the more important is aesthetic. It considers the object in itself, as an entity, and tells us what it can about its life. The second aim is subsidiary; the relation of the object to the rest of the world." This means consideration of "the conditions under which the work of art was composed, the influences which formed it (criticism adores influences), the influence it has exercised on subsequent works, prenatal possibilities"—much of which he conceded to be valuable, "but what meanwhile has become of Monteverdi's Vespers, or the Great Mosque at Delhi, or 'The Frogs' of Aristophanes, or any other work which you happen to have in mind?" If we wheel up to the work of art even the best aesthetic theory "and apply it with its measuring rods and pliers and forceps . . . it doesn't work, the two universes have not even collided"; on the other hand, "if criticism strays from her central aesthetic quest to influences and psychological and historical considerations . . . contact is established. But no longer with a work of art."

Again, those who believe it the critic's function to nurture and guide the artist can hardly have been receptive to Forster's view that criticism was irrelevant to the creative process. It could point out to Forster the large number of sudden deaths in one of his novels, and get him, the next time, to space them out and provide plausible causes, but could not inspire him with anything vital to put in their place. "A piece of contemporary music, to my ear, has a good many sudden deaths in it; the phrases expire as rapidly as the characters in my novel, the chords cut each others' throats"; but these defects "are doubtless vital to the general conception" and "are not to be remedied by substituting sweetness." Criticism could make Forster aware of his immoderate use of the word "but" (the result of a university education); it could caution a legally-minded writer on his "ifs." This was "the sort of trifling help which criticism can give the artist. She cannot help him in great matters."

The Shape of Things

MR. GROMYKO'S NEW PROPOSAL ON ATOMIC-energy control brings the subject into what the New York Herald Tribune describes as the "middle zone" of discussion. For the first time we have a Soviet plan of international inspection blocked out in some detail. Beginning with his usual insistence on the prime importance of a convention outlawing atomic weapons, the Soviet delegate conceded that an international inspection system could be established simultaneously with such a convention. His plan calls for an International Control Commission responsible to the Security Council. The commission would have wide powers of inspection, with access to uranium mines and atomic installations in all parts of the world. It would not have authority to operate such atomic-energy facilities, a basic feature of the American scheme. Nor would it have the power to impose punishment for violations. This would rest with the Security Council and would presumably be subject to veto. Moreover, the Russian proposal gives wide latitude to national research and development in the field of atomic energy. Some critics already see it as merely a device to prolong the period of indecision and prevent the formation of an international atomic control set-up in a Western bloc of nations. These critics view Mr. Gromyko's whole performance as simply an intermittent filibuster to keep matters open until Russia has its own atomic plants in operation. We prefer to consider the new proposals more seriously. From the standpoint of international security, they appear far from adequate and are open to certain objections that have already been raised in the Atomic Energy Commission. But they have provided a meeting ground for argument that has been singularly lacking in the year since the commission first got to work. They should not, and we are sure they will not, be lightly dismissed.

SOMEBODY IS WOOLGATHERING THESE DAYS, but in this particular case he is not in the State Department. Secretary Marshall, strongly backed by former Secretary Hull, has made it quite clear to Congress that the little game they have been playing with wool will wreck any chances of success that Will Clayton's multilateral trade policies might have in Geneva. The sorry spectacle in Washington illustrates all too tragically the cross-purposes in economic policy that paralyze any attempts we may be initiating to assist in world recovery. An interest-ridden Congress seems incapable of understanding the elementary principles of world trade. And now it turns out that the Department of Agriculture, with a concern for the nation's sheepmen and with an eye to the nation's gigantic wool pile, also played a dubious role in the drafting of the import-fee proposal. The proposed amendments, which would establish import quotas exempt from the new impost, will scarcely win many friends in Australia, 90 per cent of whose imports to this country consists of wool. Nor will it check the growing disillusionment with American multilateral trade talk that has seized the majority of delegates at the Geneva meeting. It looks as if the bill would pass. The President should veto it and give Congress a chance to show some uncommon sense in reenacting the wool subsidy without any new import fee or quota tagged on. This would give the grower what he needs. It would be less expensive in the long run, particularly to the American consumer, who with a new tariff would be compelled to pay a whole series of mark-ups far in excess of the initial fee. Most of all, it would be one way for Congress to prove that an American President is not talking platitudinous nonsense when he says that "we intend to expend our energies and devote our substance in promoting world recovery."

IS CONGRESS SEEKING TO ESTABLISH ITS supremacy over the judicial branch of the government in defiance of the Constitution? Recently the Portal-to-Portal Act outlawed hundreds of suits already filed and forbade the courts to take jurisdiction in certain types of cases. The Taft-Hartley labor bill provides for a "general counsel" to the National Labor Relations Board who is to decide, without any possibility of appeal, what cases should or should not be heard by the board. And now the Senate has before it the Reed-Bulwinkle bill, the avowed purpose of which is to exempt the railroads from the anti-trust laws and sidetrack the Department of Justice suit against the Western railroads. Proponents of the bill claim that the railroads cannot indulge in monopolistic practices since all their actions are regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. But as Senator Glen Taylor of Idaho noted in a strong attack on this legislation, "the language of the bill is such that the ICC, at least in the field of rates, needs only to approve a basic agreement between carriers setting up the rules and procedures for establishing rates. Thereupon any action taken pursuant to that master agreement by the carriers need not be submitted to the ICC and is likewise exempt from anti-trust legislation." Since the ICC in recent years has been notoriously lax in protecting shippers and policing the collusive activities of the railroads, it is reasonable to expect that passage of this bill will solidify monopoly in transport. More than that as Senator Charles W. Tobey has pointed out, "this legislation sets a pattern for supplanting the American system of competitive enterprise." The insurance industry is already seeking exemption from the anti-trust laws and other industry lobbies are not likely to be bashful in pushing their claims.

THE CHOICE OF NORMAN ARMOUR TO FILL the post left vacant by Spruille Braden is another sign that the much-needed reorganization of the State Department means primarily the creation of a staff closely geared to the Truman-Marshall foreign policy. The fact that Mr. Armour is a civilian and a retired career diplomat gave some newspapers the idea that his appointment would offset the growing weight of Wall Street and the army. This is a most superficial bit of optimism. Armour is an efficient, conventional foreign-service man. He is neither an innovator nor a liberal. As Assistant Secretary in charge of American republics' affairs, his assignment is much broader than Mr. Braden's was, including political affairs in all four of the department's geographical divisions—European, Middle Eastern, and Far Eastern, as well as Latin American. In this critical post, Mr. Armour will exhibit none of the sharp corners that made his pro-democratic predecessor a problem child in the department. What he will bring to his job is long experience, knowledge and a readiness to help apply the new concepts of American security to Latin America and the rest of the world. We do not quarrel with Secretary Marshall's effort to convert the State Department into a coordinated working organism; what we object to is an interpretation of the Armour appointment as a liberal deviation from recent practice.

LORD TEMPLEWOOD'S WARNING IN THE House of Lords that the crisis in Spain "will lead sooner or later to a situation which is going to create a great international upheaval" comes at a timely moment. The publicity given to the Dictator's tour through the country, when he was acclaimed by enthusiastic crowds shouting "Franco si, Rusia no," coupled with the announcement of a national plebiscite on the Succession Law on July 6, had filled the appeasers in London and Washington with Even some who sympathize with the Republican case (but still more with the Truman Doctrine) have begun to accept Spain as a link in the "cordon sanitaire" and to justify this attitude by saying, "Well, if Franco is so strong and the people want him, what can we do about it?" The former British Ambassador, whose book on Spain showed him to be a far keener observer than his American colleagues, is less complacent. He fears an outburst in Spain that will gravely complicate the already difficult and sensitive European situation. Lord Templewood has enough imagination to realize the consequences of an open revolt, and he foresees Europe and the world again divided on Spain, with the left in all countries ready to fight on the side of Franco's enemies and every world capital seething with agitation as in the days of the civil war. To avoid such a development he advocates that Britain and the United States apply "an economic embargo to bring an end to the government of Generalissimo Franco." Lord Templewood's attitude has been fully endorsed by the World Federation of Trade Unions, meeting at Prague, which voted to raise a fund to help the resistance movement in Spain. The C. I. O. joined European and Latin American labor in reaching this decision.

THE SPECIAL ELECTION IN WASHINGTON'S Third Congressional District, in which Charles R. Savage, a Wallace man, was beaten by a bare 1,500 out of 5,000 votes, had ramifications and implications, not all of which were accounted for in the press. The press generally acknowledged that the Republicans were somewhat shaken by the apparent loss of 5,500 votes in the district—which had gone Republican by a margin of 7,000 in 1946—but it added with some satisfaction (in the words of the New York Herald Tribune), "the fact remains that Mr. Wallace's man was beaten." Many newspapers saw in Mr. Savage's defeat an affirmation, by Washingtonians, of the Truman Doctrine. But even if the explanation of the result were as simple as that, the "affirmation" must be considered pretty slim. The truth is that Savage was on the receiving end of a bitter, if undercover, Republican attack which successfully tagged him as a "red." Reports from the West Coast inform us that "the Republicans succeeded in hanging the De Lacy label on Savage" and that this maneuver, "emphasizing the Communist issue, evidently sank him." Mr. De Lacy, readers will recall, was the left-wing Democratic Congressman who was overwhelmingly defeated last fall. Savage had preserved a cautious silence on foreign policy in the pre-election week, but perhaps he was too silent: it was the week of news from Hungary and Eastern Europe. The Republicans, apparently, were clever enough to tie it all together and persuade the timid that Savage was "dangerous." But they were not clever enough to save the votes of 5,500 people who, after seven short months, were fed up with Throttle-bottomism and "senseless economies" which would cut the heart out of Western reclamation and power projects.

ORGANIZATIONS REPRESENTING 60,000,000 Americans of diverse creeds and social groups are making a concerted effort next Wednesday to persuade Congress that "The people want housing!" It seems particularly tactless of the House Appropriations Committee, then, to take this moment to announce its proposed $5,000,000 cut in the Federal Housing Subsidy Fund which would virtually wipe out public housing in America. We shall carefully examine the committee's proposal in an early issue, and meanwhile we urge all who feel housing is our nation's most serious deficiency to make their voices heard on "Fight for Housing Day."

The Marshall Plan

AT HIS press conference on June 12, Secretary of State Marshall added a vital footnote to his speech at Harvard a week earlier. When talking about a program of European aid, he told the correspondents, he included in Europe not only Britain but the Soviet Union. The implication surely is that the Administration is not yet ready to listen to those who advise it to make a separate peace with Germany and concentrate on the salvage of Western Europe. It is going to make at least one more effort to prevent the development of two irreconcilable worlds. Switching the emphasis of the Truman Doctrine from anti-communism to recovery, it is inviting Russia and the countries that it dominates to cooperate in drafting an economic program which will provide practical justification for further American assistance.

This is a wise move. Difficult as it may prove to bring Russia into such a program, it would be still more difficult to leave Russia out. This may be why Ernest Bevin, who has now hailed the Marshall plan with great enthusiasm, was decidedly cautious in his first reactions to the Harvard speech. Even so stout an anti-Communist as the British Foreign Secretary is not prepared to endorse proposals that involve splitting Europe in two. He knows that any attempt to organize Western Europe as an American buttress against the Soviet Union would cause the bitterest dissensions in France and Italy, and in Britain itself.

Moreover, the political rending of Europe would multiply its economic problems. Mr. Marshall in his Harvard speech spoke of the breakdown of exchange between town and country in many lands. The farmer, unable to buy manufactured goods, is unwilling to sell his produce; he prefers to feed his family well and add to his capital by raising stock instead of cultivating crops. There is a somewhat similar breakdown of exchange between the industrial countries of Western Europe and the agricultural states in the East. Division of the Con-continent would perpetuate this situation, compelling the nations of the West to make up their food deficiencies entirely from overseas and to find new markets for their manufactures in order to provide the means of payment. Consequently, financing the recovery of Western Europe alone might well prove a heavier financial burden to the United States than a program based on the reintegration of the whole Continent.

The Marshall plan recognizes that doling out loans and grants to one country at a time provides, at best, palliatives for Europe's ills. A cure will not be effected until the production of the Continent as a whole is sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of consumption. Without outside aid, the process of restoring this balance will involve a degree of austerity which only governments with dictatorial powers can readily enforce. This point is well illustrated by the present struggle of the French Cabinet to ward off inflation. The fact is, as Mr. Marshall pointed out, "that Europe's requirements for the next three or four years of foreign food and other essential products—principally from America—are so much greater than her present ability to pay that she must have substantial additional help or face economic, social, and political deterioration of a very grave character. The remedy lies in breaking the vicious circle and restoring the confidence of the European peoples in the economic future of their own countries and of Europe as a whole."

Many of the economic problems common to the European nations—coal, food, and transport, for example—cannot be dealt with satisfactorily except on a Continental scale. But a solution for such problems ought not to be imposed unilaterally by the United States, and Mr. Marshall, therefore, has invited the nations of Europe to attempt to agree on an economic program which America can underwrite with some confidence that it will serve to set Europe firmly on its feet. Fortunately, there is already in existence a body which might undertake the drafting of such a program—the Economic Commission for Europe of the U. N., which is meeting in Geneva early next month. Russia is a member of this body.

While Mr. Marshall's plan offers a new hope, we need hardly warn readers that the obstacles to its achievement are formidable. One difficulty is the time element, for a major crisis in Europe is likely by early winter at the latest unless action is forthcoming. As the London Economist puts it: "If Mr. Marshall's initiative is to be accepted by the American people, it will have to be embodied in an ambitious and inspiring program within a matter of months. But if the European nations are to do anything more than simply add up their national deficits and present the total of one figure instead of half a dozen, they will need much more than three months for the purpose."

Time is required not merely to perfect plans, but to lessen the suspicions that haunt the Kremlin and Capitol Hill alike. We fear the Russians and they fear us. Can we persuade them that our program is not a new form of dollar imperialism? Can they convince us that if we aid their recovery they will not use their renewed strength to spread the world revolution?

Aggressive Soviet tactics and bad manners are not to be taken as proof that Stalin is bent on a career of conquest. They are probably signs of weakness rather than strength, for there is every reason to suppose that Russia is in no position to contemplate war. It will be years before the enormous losses inflicted by the Nazis are recouped and its people can hope for an expansion of consumption. That is one reason why the Soviet government has been so insistent on securing reparations from Germany and other ex-enemy states. We condemn such actions as delaying recovery in Europe, but we have done little to speed Russia's own recovery problem.

If we now want to obtain Russian cooperation in a Continental economic program, we shall have to persuade Stalin that he has more to gain by coming in than by staying out. That involves settlement of some outstanding political differences between Russia and the West. Above all, an understanding on Germany is essential, for as long as Germany remains split in two, Europe will remain divided. Nor can we hope to construct an effective recovery program for Europe that does not include plans for restoring German productivity.

An understandable reason for skepticism in Europe about the Marshall plan is the expectation of bitter Congressional opposition. Capitol Hill has been oversold on "the red peril," and a big scheme of financial assistance that included Russia would certainly provoke many Congressmen to blind but not silent rage. Even a program for Western Europe alone would have tough sledding. The Alsops in their June 15 column quote a Senator as saying, "There's going to be one hell of a fight before the Senate will approve another cent for spending abroad."

Fortunately there are men in Congress who are better informed about the international facts of life and fully aware that total collapse in Europe would have shattering repercussions on the political and economic welfare of this country. Senator Vandenberg has announced his general approval of Mr. Marshall's proposals and as a contribution to their realization has called for "a total balance sheet" of American resources. He thinks we should have a clear idea of what would be the effect on our economy of the shipment to Europe of the food, steel, machinery, and other goods that it needs.

Such an investigation is very much in order, provided that it includes a study of the domestic results of a denial of assistance. What would be the effect of the slump in our present tremendous volume of exports which is inevitable in the next twelve months unless foreign supplies of dollars are augmented? Could the impact of such a slump turn mild recession into deep depression, leaving idle the workers and machines that might have been supplying Europe's needs? If so, how would this affect both sides of the national budget? An honest answer to such questions will, we believe, show that we can no more escape the consequences of world economic interdependence than we can those of world political interdependence. If we do not aid Europe to become our partner in prosperity we shall surely find ourselves her partner in misery.

Behind the Hungarian "Coup"

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

IT IS natural that politicians and headline writers and similar artisans should interpret public happenings to suit their needs and the views of their bosses. One cannot expect them to analyze—or even to mention—the complexities of such events as the Hungarian government upset; to call it a "Soviet coup" or a "Communist putsch" and let it go at that is easier and fits better into the broad anti-Russian policy proclaimed thrice daily in Washington. Since the identical technique is employed by corresponding operators in other countries, with Russia leading the field in both virtuosity and self-deception, the result, however unavoidable, is a worldwide sowing of politically explosive misinformation.

The Hungarian crisis was a made-to-order opportunity for the application of this technique. But others are coming along: in Bulgaria, in Austria, in Rumania. Poland, too, at no great distance. Each will be attributed by one side—the Russian—exclusively to the machinations of the Western powers to restore the old reactionaries to power; and by our side to a Russian coup intended to tighten the Kremlin's strangle-hold on a helpless people. Both stories will be fractionally true, but neither will take account of the other or of the convulsive dislocations and readjustments that make such crises inevitable in Eastern Europe even without the eager intervention of foreign interests.

That Moscow used the crisis in Budapest as a means of shifting the weight inside the government to groups and individuals favorable to its interests may be taken for granted. That it also fabricated the conspiracy for which members of the Smallholders Party have already been convicted is wholly unlikely. Whether the confession of Mr. Kovacs implicating ex-Premier Nagy, who has just arrived to tell his story to the American people and the State Department, was extorted or ghost-written I do not know. Although the Russian chairman of the Allied Control Commission refused to hand it and other evidence over to the Americans, several Hungarian papers in this country have printed what purports to be a full text; if it is authentic, the authorities in Washington can examine it without Soviet permission, and form their own conclusions. But nothing they now discover can alter the fact, established through court trials normally conducted, that a conspiracy against the government was hatched in the ranks of the Smallholders and as a result a government and party crisis developed which finally involved the ousting of Mr. Nagy and his replacement by Mr. Dinnyes.

Since the Soviet Union controls the Hungarian government in all essentials and will continue to do so as long as the Red Army remains in the country, the change can benefit Russia chiefly by eliminating possible trouble-makers and creating conditions which may keep friendly elements on top after the occupation ends. At the same time, the Western powers have been politically checkmated, and without undue cynicism one must assume that this fact accounts for the shocked solicitude expressed in Washington—and, more circumspectly, in London—about the fate of certain democratic virtues whose absence in Greece has at most been officially noted only in passing.

The United States believes Russia is trying to extend its control throughout Europe and the Middle East, if not beyond. Russia believes the United States, with Britain as a half-hearted ally, intends to challenge Soviet influence even in the countries immediately bordering it. The Truman Doctrine undoubtedly stimulated Russia to counter-moves, as was certain from the start. Russian moves have produced the latest American crop of accusations and demands. These in turn will surely lead to new demonstrations by Moscow that its interests are not to be jeopardized by Western pressure. And beneath the surface of this mounting political warfare is the all-but-disregarded struggle of a group of backward countries to throw off the remnants of an oppressive oligarchy and an economic system both corrupt and antiquated.

In Hungary full-fledged fascism came to power three years before Mussolini took over in Rome. The white terror wiped out the liberals and radicals and thousands of Jews—together with the reforms initiated by the weak but democratic government of Count Karolyi and the short-lived dictatorship of Bela Kun. Horthy and his Awakening Magyars enthroned Hungarian chauvinism in all its primitive unreason. The "squirearchy" regained power; the peasant suffered and had less to eat than before the war. But when Hitler drew Hungary into the Axis camp, the chauvinists easily accepted their country's satellite role in the ingenuous belief that eventually it would lead to the restoration of Hungary's lost frontiers, and their own lands. The Horthy-Bethlen régime was among Hitler's most contented slaves. And it was not until the Red Army fought its way into Hungary and set up a provisional government at Debrecen that the chance came to overthrow the ruling clique and make another try at establishing a decent order.

It is not true that this has been accomplished ruthlessly. It has not even been accomplished effectively. When the Russians went in, many of the best Hungarian democrats were in exile. The country was badly smashed by the war. People were hungry, and still are. The Red Army looted huge amounts of movable property and fed itself off the country, as it still does. The financial system was in ruins; money became worthless. And Russia, far from forcing revolution on Hungary, seemed to care little what sort of system was established as long as the government proved amenable.

From the beginning, the necessary revolution in Hungary has been compromised and weakened by divided counsels, corruption, political intrigue, Russian indifference coupled with Russian exactions, and the lively sabotage of collaborationists and dispossessed landowners and officials. The marvel is that the land reform was actually put through: the great estates were divided, the squirearchy stripped of its power.

But in a country like Hungary, with no middle class and no tradition of democratic procedure, even a halting revolution could hardly be expected to take place without coercion on one side and conspiracy on the other. An entrenched and arrogant ruling class does not give up without a struggle, and since fascist parties had been outlawed, the Smallholders Party became an asylum in which rightist leaders found refuge. Though the party won a large popular vote, it is essentially weak as the result of profound conflicts among its disparate elements. In a revolution, no politician can merely remain neutral; if this was Mr. Nagy's attempted role, it was doomed at the start. But if he took sides, he must have done so knowing he was also choosing between Russia and the West.

Meanwhile the United States, ignoring every factor except the one that relates to the spread of Russian power, has taken the counter-offensive. The politicians shout Soviet coup, the press repeats it in letters three inches high. And in the midst of the clamor, few people remember that twenty-eight years ago the Allied nations betrayed their promise of help to a Social Democratic regime in Budapest and deliberately permitted the dictator Horthy to seize power. Russia was relatively weak then, but still the West didn't want to take any chances with left-wing democracy. Instead it chose fascism.

Ernest Bevin: a Dramatic Criticism

BY BENN W. LEVY

London, June 6

It was in Margate last July, I walked upon the Pier
And met a little vulgar boy and said: "What make you here?"

THIS week the couplet has been running in my head. The rest of Barham's poem I have forgotten, though once as a small boy I earned a pair of boxing gloves from my father by committing it to memory. (I have them still and look at them sometimes, a little wistful that they are now too small.) But I think the legend goes on to narrate how the Little Vulgar Boy, parading his righteousness and his unequal struggle against cruelty and injustice, exploited the narrator's innocence and duly "did him down." From which a gently cynical Victorian moral is drawn by way of epilogue.

It would be facile to identify the visiting politician with the astute urchin of the Ingoldsby Legend, but in so far as it is true that politicians are an especial kind of animal, their peculiar characteristics offered themselves for an examination of particularly concentrated clarity in the bright Kentish sunlight of the conference week.

The simpler folk of theaterland have in one respect a greater acumen, which would have made them a less susceptible audience at Margate than the politicians provided for each other. The actor who seeks his effects with clichés and calculation or whose mechanics are easily penetrable, they describe as "ham": and they smell him from a distance without error or effort. Poor Ernie Bevin would have had them giggling politely in their handkerchiefs. The "star" entrance, solo, delayed until the third day; the preliminary build-up while he is still "off"; the on-flood of arc lights withheld during the foregoing sessions (this particular effect has discreetly obsolesced since Benson's day); the grave unsmiling majesty of countenance; and then the role itself!

It is a fine variegated role. Sometimes, perhaps most often, he is the wounded bull, wounded but bravely fighting on, struck down by villainous foreign hands when success was just within grasp (foreigners are people who have never been trade-union officials). Sometimes he is the quiet confidential chum. "Well, really you know . . ." is the familiar opening of these passages. Sometimes he is the patient Atlas, reluctantly but dutifully carrying the world of foreign affairs upon his back. When, if the truth were known, he would have much preferred, after the General Election, to have retired into the tranquillity of private life as Chancellor of the Exchequer.

BENN W. LEVY is a well-known dramatist and a Labor member of Parliament. "Art and Mrs. Bottle," "Topaze," and "Springtime for Henry" are among his most successful plays.

But whatever the role, it is always rich with "character." An important point this, as any experienced actor will confirm. The "straight" part starts at a heavy disadvantage. Squire Hawkins can never compete with long John Silver. No actor who knows his world would accept a two-legged in preference to a one-legged part. Irving's defective palate was an asset. So have been Churchill's lisp and comical hats. Baldwin strove to illustrate himself with pigs and pipes and Mary Webb. Bottomley rose in an aura of patriotism, champagne, and militant affection for clergymen, widows, and race horses. Joe Chamberlain marked himself with orchids and monocle. Dizzy and Palmerston paraded a whole battery of extravagant "properties." Jim Thomas is alleged to have been sedulous in the dropping of his niches. Since him, few trade-union politicians have realized that a proletarian diction may sometimes be accepted as the assurance of, if not, even, a substitute for, socialism; Bevin is one of those few. This and a silhouette as globular as Bottomley's are not the least of his tremendous capital equipment.

Let there, however, be no mistake: these valuable things are adjuncts, not essence. Bevin is a "star" in his own right. Merely to know the tricks of the trade is not enough. Talent is not enough. The quality of a star still awaits definition, but it is the quality that makes an audience attentive while Mistinguette walks down the long inevitable stairway of the Paris music-hall stage and inattentive while her prettier understudy does the same thing. Bevin could deputize for Mistinguette any night of the week, and no one would demand his money back.

Like other writers of fiction I have sometimes sought to depict a politician. We nearly always fail. With mothers-in-law and civil servants, he is a traditional music-hall, club, and public-house target, but the shafts fly with a simple jeer and without the need for elaboration imposed upon the writer. The music hall notes briefly the vanity, the histrionics, the platitudes, the evasions, the compromises, the self-righteousness, the exhibitionism, the faux-bonhomie, the bogus indignation. (For satire deals with the debit side only.) But the novelist or dramatist must not merely assert but illustrate these qualities—and a few others as well.

Sitting and listening at Margate to Ernest Bevin, a most capable politician in his most characteristic form, I wondered why that kind of thing was so hard to capture and distil into fiction. It is partly perhaps because the context is indispensable and rather too large and too complex to convey. Take for instance his scène à faire, the climactic "stab-in-the-back" passage. A casual observer would have seen merely a rotund little orator, shaking every ounce of his flesh in an abandoned passion of righteous indignation expressed in the clichés of routine melodrama. The true and magnificent virtuosity of this performance would have been missed. Anyone can be as angry as that upon due provocation, but how many of us could preserve the full flower of spontaneous fury in the ice-box for nine long months and trot it out at the right moment, with not a petal blemished, faded, or impaired? How many of us would have known so unerringly the right moment from the wrong? There were many earlier opportunities, but a sure political instinct passed them by. The skilled politician must know when to be angry, when to be confident, when to be hurt. He must know, moreover, which questions to answer and which questions to pretend to answer. The latter is a delicate operation. If he is able not merely to accomplish it but actually to score points with it, he is at the top of his tree. If I had been asked why our troops in Palestine and Germany could not be reduced and I had replied in effect, as Bevin did, that we had successfully moved thousands of troops in Egypt from one barracks to another without the loss of a single British soldier, I should have met with precisely the derision I should have expected. He, on the other hand, evoked precisely the outbreak of applause that he expected. Not more than a dozen of his audience smiled. Even his critics relaxed in warm admiration of such virtuosity. Here was a master of his trade.

Now it is over-simple to be morally censorious of all this. When you have noted that the thunder of his rage is only the tin thunder of a stage effect, that the bull moves with the wary premeditated watchfulness of a cat and the quickness of an eel, that the air of bluntness is a brilliant bluff, it is as well to remember that not only absolutism corrupts; so do the exigencies of democratic politics. If you are protected by a prophylactic simplicity like Rhys Davies or old George Lansbury or by a religious probity like Stafford Cripps, your course will be subject to the same limitations as theirs. You can be savaged and demolished as Lansbury was savaged by Bevin ten years ago. You can lose your popular acclaim, as Cripps has, through a Jeremiaical truthfulness. It is therefore fairer to ask whether the disingenuousness of the accomplished politician is redeemed by an ultimate fidelity to basic principle. The answer, one way or another, to this question will provide the final judgment on Ernest Bevin.

Revolution in Eastern Europe

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

I. The People and the Communists

Vienna, June 1

IN A few months it will be three years since the Red Army, driving the Wehrmacht before it, started its triumphant march into Eastern Europe and the heart of the Continent. Three years is not a very long time in the history of the region, but the tempo of change has been greatly accelerated, and out of the events and developments of this period a new Eastern Europe is evolving, and making a desperate effort to catch up with the world.

It is possible to generalize about Eastern Europe only if honesty and fairness are sacrificed. Austria and Czechoslovakia are exceptions to any generalization about the political scene. The non-Slav states, Hungary and Rumania, with their peculiar economic backgrounds, are exceptions to the prevailing economic situation. Poland and Yugoslavia may appear to be under very similar regimes, but basic differences exist.

Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia are all within the Soviet Union's sphere of influence. All have had revolutions. In both respects Austria will eventually have to be classed with them.

The revolution is not, of course, over, and it varies in form and fabric from country to country. Only Poland and Yugoslavia had a revolution in the classic sense, and this explains much of what has happened in those countries since the end of the war—just as post-war developments in the other countries are explained by the fact that their revolutions were brought about by the entrance of the Red Army.

Russia cannot be held wholly responsible for the revolution in Eastern Europe, which has nowhere gone exactly as Moscow would have liked. Whether it came from "above" or "below," the revolution was inevitable: the rotten political, economic, and social conditions could not survive the ferment of war and resistance. But one must give credit to the Soviet Union for guaranteeing the first phase of the revolution and saving it from being smothered in its cradle by Western-supported counter-revolutionary forces, as happened after the last war.

Obviously, neither the direction nor the method of the revolution has pleased the West. The still-born revolt of 1917-25 might have taken a "democratic" form which the West could have approved. But not this revolution. The difference between Western and Eastern democracy, on which we insist, is reflected in the difference between a Western and an Eastern revolution.

The present revolution was born of the collapse of German imperialism, native feudalism, and fascist oppression, amid physical devastation, economic ruin, and human misery. The fatuous, selfish, do-nothing nationalist regimes of the past have been replaced by governments whose leaders not only understand the social problems of their countries but have the ability and will to do something about them.

This revolution will not stop or recede. The youth of Eastern Europe is behind it. By their prodigious efforts in the past two years the workers have proved their devotion to it. The former landless peasants have a stake in it.

Admittedly not all the people are in favor of the new regimes. The old ruling classes, the old army castes, the professional politicians of the past don't count. But there are many others for whom the turn-about was too sudden. The gap between feudalism and socialism is a very wide one. Many people still do not understand the causes of their present difficulties. Nazi oppression in Austria, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania was so carefully executed that large sections of the population never learned what it meant. Class distinctions were so savagely beaten into the submerged masses for so many centuries that some of them are still afraid to walk with their heads up.

In time these attitudes will change. Peasants here and there, in Yugoslavia, Poland, and Hungary, assail the regime but at the same time admit that its policies may improve agriculture. Old men object to new ways but with childlike enthusiasm crowd into the little schoolhouses and churches to benefit from the anti-illiteracy campaigns. Peasants in remote parts of Hungary who never dreamed of going to school watch with pleasure as the school comes to their children. Balkan women voting for the first time show they are acutely conscious of beginning a new life. People who never before in their lives could benefit from clinics and nurseries or enjoy sports clubs and canteens are increasingly willing to stand by the new governments.

Contrary to the widespread belief in the West, the people of Eastern Europe are not as concerned about political freedom as they are about economic security. That civil liberties are meaningless without economic security is a simple truism whose force is appreciated by the most backward worker or peasant. It would have been nice if, after the war, political and economic democracy could have been established simultaneously in Eastern Europe. But given the historical and sociological background of these countries, how could that have been done?

Parliamentary democracy is based on compromises between social classes and political parties. But the peoples of Eastern Europe at the end of the war were in no mood for compromise, and they had no long tradition of political cooperation to fall back on. The governments today are following patterns of political behavior which go back many decades.

The present tremendous economic and political upheaval in Eastern Europe is either ignored in the West or vilified as a Russo-Communist creation—which, strangely enough, the Russians and the Communists claim it to be. But it cannot be judged by Western standards or interpreted according to Dun and Bradstreet or Time, Inc.

Men who are working with the Russians and the Communists today because to do otherwise would be to lay out the carpet for the old order—the Socialists, radical peasants, independent leftists, and intellectuals who helped make the revolution—feel that the Communists have proved themselves able leaders, fully aware of the needs of the people. They give the Communists most of the credit for the phenomenal revival of industry and agriculture, despite three successive years of drought, in all these countries except Austria. On the other hand, it is they and not the men sitting outside, complaining, plotting, and running to the American and British embassies, who best know the mistakes and the weaknesses of the Communists. They have no illusions about the Communists or the Russians. They recognize and accept the Communists for what they are.

Except in Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia the Communists have been in a tough spot. They have had to be the official apologists of the Soviet Union and all its policies. The exigencies of power politics have forced them into strange contortions—which they never seem to find painful: they have been obliged to embrace collaborators, to appease, to vacillate, to find scapegoats when things go badly. Like devout, dogmatic, cunning Jesuits, they believe in the righteousness of their cause and that all means to attain their goal are blessed and justified. In some countries they have been reluctant to assume power alone; yet by their very training and mentality they are "ill-fitted" to work in coalition governments. They become frightened and hysterical when unbelievers present programs or solutions which are better than theirs. This partly accounts for their dishonest efforts to make "fascism" and "reaction" synonymous, and for their unsuccessful attempts to monopolize the progressive socialist spirit of the workers. Try as they may, they cannot control the revolution. While many conditions are similar, Eastern Europe today is not Russia in 1917.

Not the least of the reasons why the revolution in Eastern Europe cannot follow a "Russian" pattern is the Soviet Union itself. It was to the interest of the Soviet Union that the power of the old ruling classes and the social order on which that power was based should be destroyed. But after the revolution passed through that first phase, the Soviet Union did little to help it—indeed, it has hampered it. Russia's relations with the countries of Eastern Europe since that time have been guided by the same cynical selfishness which is apparent in its relations with the big powers and which reveals its continuous sense of insecurity.

Not only has the revolution been hindered, but two years of wasteful requisitioning by the Red Army, undisciplined behavior by Russian soldiers, and ruthless economic exploitation have aroused a popular revulsion which has enabled the professional Russophobes and the old ruling classes to steady themselves. By protecting and preserving the first phase of the revolution, the Soviet Union automatically assured the execution of far-reaching reforms. But then its economic pressure and its removal of food, livestock, poultry, finished goods, and machinery prevented the new governments from extending their economic reforms and delayed the realization of their social aims.

The new regimes—including the Communist members, although the latter seldom speak about it—know that Russia's ruthless tactics have set them back many years. And thus another vicious circle is formed. The more the governments, which feel they have not been given a real chance to show what they can do, sense a wave of feeling against them the more reluctant are they to allow political freedom to the opposition. The Russians, aware of the same revulsion, hesitate to loosen their grip for fear that violently hostile governments will again be lined up on their borders.

The existing governments are really Russia's best friends. But Russian policies consistently serve to weaken them. It is the old story of the defenses, by their very nature, destroying what they were designed to preserve.

To protect and extend the revolution, the governments of Eastern Europe are looking more and more to one another, and in this lies the hope for the future.

The Dionne Centuplets

BY JANE ARMSTRONG

Toronto, June 10

THE adventures of Mr. Ludger Dionne with his hundred Slav girls have given Canadians one of the liveliest issues into which the press and Parliament have sunk their teeth for some time. Although the country has diddled along for two years without adopting a positive post-war immigration policy, the news that Mr. Dionne was roaming the D. P. camps of Germany recruiting girls for his rayon spinning mill at St. Georges de Beauce, Quebec, brought prompt reaction. Canadians might not be decided on what to do about Europe's refugees, but their minds were clear on what not to do. In newspaper reports with screaming headlines and in a fierce debate in the House of Commons severe censure was expressed for Mr. Dionne's method of rescuing Europe's homeless—and for the Liberal government that had secretly aided his scheme.

JANE ARMSTRONG is a Canadian journalist.

The details squeezed from reluctant Liberals by Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and Progressive Conservative members of the opposition combined into a curious story. Ludger Dionne, who is also a Liberal member of Parliament for Beauce, determined last fall to relieve the chronic labor shortage in his spinning mill, where he employed some 400 French Canadians in a non-union shop and the turnover last year added up to 550. He suggested first to the Department of Labor and then to the Department of Welfare that he be given special permission to import indentured women from displaced persons' camps. Both departments turned down his request. But the mill was running at only one-third capacity, and Mr. Dionne tried again. This time he interviewed the Honorable James A. Glen, who as Minister of Mines and Resources also handled immigration matters, and the government, on Mr. Glen's recommendation, passed an order-in-council on April 1 permitting importation of 100 girls from Europe. Mr. Dionne at once took a plane for Germany, Parliament was then in session, and immigration was in the order paper. By some curious coincidence this particular order-in-council was not tabled, and when in April a press leak started C. C. F. members sniffing suspiciously, Mr. Glen replied evasively that any new policy "on immigration would be announced in due course."

By the first week in May enough details had trickled out to send the public's blood pressure soaring. When trade unions heard of the contract terms Mr. Dionne was planning to impose on his new hands, they promptly denounced him as an exploiter of slave labor. The C. C. F. and Progressive Conservative members—unaccustomed bedfellows—joined forces to lambast the government. Mr. Dionne's plan, as outlined in a letter to Mr. Glen, was simple. The girls were to sign a contract to work in St. Georges for two years. They were to be billeted in the nearby convent under the chaperonage of forty nuns of the Good Shepherd. Twenty-five per cent of their weekly wages was to be deducted to repay their transportation to Canada. (In his haste Mr. Dionne spared no expense, chartering three transatlantic planes specially for them.) They were to start work at 26 cents an hour for a forty-six-hour week, with a boost to 30 cents after the first month. Later they were to go on piece work along with the other girls in the mill. Six dollars would be deducted from their pay envelopes for board at the convent. Since Quebec's wage standards are notoriously low, it was the clauses covering indentured labor and deductions for transportation that drew the most fire—Canada has an Alien Immigration Act supposed to outlaw both these abuses.

As public feeling mounted, Mr. Dionne's jaunt to Germany was discussed from one end of the country to the other. Interest was fanned by bulletins from his headquarters in Frankfurt. The girls—Polish, Ukrainian, and Yugoslav—were selected by Polish priests supervised by representatives of the United States Roman Catholic welfare agency and the Vatican Mission. These agencies, said Mr. Dionne, were anxious to have the girls emigrate rather than "be forced back under Joseph Stalin's philosophies." They were all Roman Catholics, and though this would appear sensible considering their destination, the religious issue is a dangerous one in Canada, where French Canadians block immigration of Anglo-Saxon Protestants, English Canadians try to keep out European Catholics, and both are opposed to Jews.

Last week Mr. Dionne's fleet of airplanes brought the final group of girls to their new homeland. Canadians studying their photographs in the newspapers could not help noticing that the shrewd little mill owner, who claimed to be snatching humanity from the misery of a concentration camp, had assembled a surprisingly healthy-looking team. They were young—from sixteen to twenty-seven years old—and their powerful physiques would obviously stand up under work in a spinning mill.

The matter was not to rest there. Coinciding with the labor influx at St. Georges came an announcement by Humphrey Mitchell, Minister of Labor, that officials of three big pulp-and-paper companies were already in Europe recruiting 1,400 men between the ages of twenty and forty for work in the northern Ontario lumber camps. The companies guaranteed ten months' employment at prevailing wages. Although the arrangement was similar to the Dionne case, the government, perhaps forewarned, altered conditions slightly by assuming the role of overseer and having Canadian immigration officials help in the selection. On the heels of this came still another announcement that an agreement had been completed among the government, the needle-trades unions, and the garment manufacturers to bring in at least 1,000 skilled needle workers.

It appeared then that a broad, government-sponsored immigration plan was breaking up into piecemeal negotiations. M. J. Coldwell, leader of the C. C. F., rose from his seat in the House of Commons one afternoon last week and asked for an explanation. He demanded a full discussion of government policy in allowing Canadian industrialists to bring specially selected displaced persons to work in Canada under contract.

There had been fair warning of Mr. Coldwell's intentions, but the Liberals put up a weak defense. In no time the debate skidded on the issue of whether Mr. Dionne was a humanitarian or a heel. Mr. Mitchell, the Labor Minister, thought the member for Beauce—too busy mothering his new brood to be present—should be "given his day in court" to explain things; Mr. Mitchell himself, he confessed, did not know the exact terms of the contract. The Labor Minister was followed by Clarence Decatur Howe, who was acting as Immigration Minister for Mr. Glen, also absent from the House that afternoon. Mr. Howe had not seen the contract either, but he maintained that there was nothing extraordinary in the much-talked-of clause which required the mill girls to repay their transatlantic fares out of their wages.

C. C. F. and Progressive Conservative members then unloosed a barrage, for it had been established that the only information the Liberals had about the terms of Mr. Dionne's private immigration scheme was contained in the letter from the mill owner to Mr. Glen. In that letter Mr. Dionne definitely set down his intention of getting a full return on his investment. The opposition pressed this advantage, and only the recess for dinner saved the Liberals from being shoved to the wall. In the evening the fracas was continued, but help arrived in the nick of time. Before an amazed House Mr. Howe waved a piece of white paper and announced he had Mr. Dionne's contract right in his hand. Where it came from no one knew, but it contained a clause stipulating that no deductions for transatlantic fares should be made from the wages of the workers.

The bizarre situation, however, was not ended. The so-called contract turned out to be an agreement made in London, England, between Mr. Dionne and the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees. Whether it took precedence over the terms accepted by the government in Ottawa was questioned sharply by John G. Diefenbaker, a Progressive Conservative. Scathingly he said that the overseas contract was a very weak straw for the government to lean on, since it reversed the terms of the scheme as originally approved.

The next day Canadians savored the reverberations of the debate but wondered what it had accomplished. Mr. Dionne's Slav battalion is certainly here to stay. Some thought the government might be prodded into launching a broad immigration policy; others were afraid the C. C. F. attack might be used by the Liberals as an excuse for doing nothing about Europe's stateless persons.

A week later the country had a partial answer. Mr. Howe unexpectedly tabled a new order-in-council authorizing the entry of a first batch of 5,000 immigrants on the quota system. The government has assumed responsibility for their selection and transportation, although the cost is being paid by the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees. Employers still may go to Europe to help pick their workers, but the Immigration Department has the final say. Any D. P. suitable for employment in an industry where labor is short can be admitted. All contracts between employers and workers must be approved by the Labor Department.

It is not a daring or sweeping immigration plan, but it gives reassurance on one point. No more secret or special permits will be handed out to private employers; the movement of immigrants to Canada will be in the open. That was the purpose of last week's debate in the Commons, and Canadians can congratulate themselves that the point was established.

Naval Misrule in the Pacific

BY JOHN COLLIER

SHALL the peoples of Guam, American Samoa, and a hundred islands of Micronesia be granted civil rights? Or shall the United States navy continue to rule them by lawless absolutism, as it has ruled Samoa and Guam for forty-eight years, since 1899? The question and the necessary facts for a decision are squarely before Congress now, in spite of the somewhat oblique resistance of the White House, the Cabinet, and the admirals. Hearings by the House subcommittee on territories and islands of the Public Lands Committee have lifted the lid.

A witness before the committee remarked, "If my testimony sounds extreme, it will be because the facts are extreme." Indeed, the facts are so extreme that the American mind has refused to take them in; this circumstance, together with the extreme persistence of the navy's lobby, has for nearly fifty years defeated the Islanders in their struggle for elementary rights. It may yet defeat them through the next fifty years.

The 13,000 inhabitants of American Samoa and the 23,000 inhabitants of Guam are ruled by a naval officer who is changed on the average every eighteen months. He makes the laws, executes them, and sits as the court of last resort in all cases, civil or criminal. The result is not merely a theoretical denial of all civil rights; it is a complete practical denial of them. It is also inefficiency of fantastic dimensions with accompanying financial extravagance, as is only now fully known.

For brevity, I limit my examples of naval misrule to Guam. And I draw mainly upon a report by a civilian committee sent by the navy itself to Guam and the other islands—a committee whose chairman was Dr. Ernest M. Hopkins, president emeritus of Dartmouth College. Most of my facts were supplied by that committee; the others have been given repeated public statement, are fully documented, and have never been disproved or even denied.

The Chamorros of Guam, now called Guamanians, are a rather extraordinary people. In the seventeenth century they resisted Spain in a thirty-year religious war, which cut down their number from perhaps 50,000 to 3,000. The surviving remnant embraced Catholicism and became full citizens of Spain. Across long periods Filipinos who resisted land feudalism and debt peonage were exiled to Guam; their blood and their modes of thought entered the Guamanian stream. Today the bilingual or tri-lingual Guamanians—Chamorro and Spanish, Chamorro and English—are known to many Americans, especially ex-service men, as people of high sophistication, versatility, beauty, and charm.

Autocratic rule over the Guamanians, said the navy in the decades before Pearl Harbor, was necessary for security reasons. The security was fantasy, and the navy knew it: Guam fell to Japan in twenty-four hours.

The Guamanians resisted the conquerors. Some hundreds—the exact number is not yet known—were shot, beheaded, or tortured to death for loyalty to the United States. Congress authorized compensation to the Guamanians for war damage but was persuaded to make the navy the court of claims. The Hopkins committee's report shows that at the present rate of settlement by the navy the claims will not be disposed of in less than twenty years; and it describes the awards which the leisurely navy does make as "in many cases mere piti-ances." To give an example, Claim No. 21, as adjudicated by the navy, is quoted verbatim: "Maria Rosa Crisostimore, Sinajana Village, Guam. On September 12, 1944, during the United States reoccupation, the claimant's husband died as a result of a beating inflicted by the Japanese. Amount claimed $5,000; amount allowed, $665.10."

When the United States attacked Guam, the capital city, Agana, home of half the island's people, was blasted to rubble, and other towns were similarly wrecked. The reoccupation forces took for their own use two-thirds of the island's land area, including most of the farmland. Congress appropriated $6,000,000 for rehabilitation. The Hopkins committee found that after two and a half years none of the destroyed towns were ready for occupancy and that there was no clear indication of when they would be. Meanwhile the navy forbids the Guamanians to reenter their towns or to use any of the seized land, even for gardening purposes; it has paid them neither rental for the properties taken over nor their capital value.

The navy operates the only bank on Guam, and this bank refuses to accept any claim or fraction of a claim as loan collateral. But under the existing conditions most Guamanians have nothing to offer as collateral except their claims.

Large construction work is proceeding on Guam, through contract with mainland and Hawaiian contractors. These contractors pay good wages. But by published and enforced order of the naval governor they may not hire local labor for the work. Thus the Guamanians, shut out from their farmlands and towns, with their savings destroyed, their claims unpaid, and credit denied them, can work only for the navy and in the domestic and other servicing of the naval and other white personnel. Moreover, the navy fixes their wages—at less than one-fourth the amount paid to whites for identical skills on identical jobs. At the same time the Guamanians pay a flat 10 per cent sales tax, levied by the governor, and living costs exceed mainland costs. It is impossible, the Hopkins committee states, for Guamanians to subsist on the navy-decreed wage. They are doing forced labor at a starvation wage. In effect, the navy is maintaining the repartimiento system of forced labor at depressed wages which was the disgrace of Spain in the New World and which depopulated Mexico and the Andean highlands. On Guam Spain never introduced the repartimiento.

In the Hopkins committee's report a curious schizophrenia may be noticed—not a conscious irony, for the committee displays no sense of humor. The facts of the report and its over-all recommendations are in head-on collision. Take, for example, the matter of war-damage claims. The committee found, and describes with much detail, extreme inefficiency and stupidity and outright institutional dishonesty, but it recommends that the navy shall continue to rule the Guamanians for an indefinite period and cites the handling of war-damage claims—and of rehabilitation, which, though six million dollars is in hand for the purpose, simply does not move at all—as a controlling reason for the recommendation. Unable to deny or explain the facts, the navy, at the current House hearings, has nevertheless used the same argument.

One more example: the Hopkins committee recommends continued naval rule because, it says, any other rule would cost much more money. Then it gives the cost of Guam naval government, exclusive of rehabilitation costs, compensation for properties taken, and payment of war-damage claims. A breakdown of the figures shows the cost of government to be $88 per capita per year. The committee sets up no comparisons, but they are available. For Alaska the per capita cost is $55; for Puerto Rico, including its land program and its large research program, $25; for Western Samoa, whose health record shines beside that of Guam, $14; for New York State, $54.95; for the all-embracing United States Indian Service, including its costly boarding schools and its large reclamation, forestry, and soil-conservation operations, $75.

Until the present the navy has resisted the demand for citizenship and for statutory underwriting of civil liberties, and its views have always prevailed in one or the other house of Congress. Now it has capitulated on these two issues, at least so far as the public record goes. The remaining issue, and for Guam the decisive one, is that of administrative jurisdiction.

Naval administration, as a matter of policy, is totalitarian. Its control of the economic life of the Islanders is a boundless control. Anti-democratic administration and economic totalitarianism are not an environment in which self-rule can grow. Nor will citizenship and organic acts guaranteeing civil liberties for the Islanders change the navy from what it institutionally is—rank-dominated, authoritarian, and thing-minded, not man-minded. Jurisdiction over the Islanders should go to the Interior Department at once; later, perhaps, to some new independent civilian agency charged with the affairs of all territories and dependencies.

The present House hearings center in the Poulson bill (H. R. 2753) and the Grant bill (H. R. 3044). Both are good bills, the Poulson bill being the simpler of the two and limited to Guam; if it passes, equivalent enactments for American Samoa and Micronesia will follow more or less automatically. But the writing of organic acts for the Polynesians of American Samoa and the many native groups of Micronesia calls for much knowledge and caution; these peoples should in fact draft their own organic acts, with advice and help as needed, as was contemplated in the Biemiller bill (H. R. 6585), which died in the last Congress and was not reintroduced in the present one.

Now is a time of hope for the Islanders; in tortured Guam it is a time of desperate hope. Action on the bills should be pressed, for one or two years hence, when public attention has been dulled, inertia and the navy's lobby might blot out the Islanders' chance.

Dixie in Black and White

VI. King Cotton Strikes Again

Memphis, Tennessee

THIS is the historic capital of the Delta country, the center for the cotton planters of the Deep South. Here cotton is king. Cotton has been ruler of the South's destiny for a long time. It has become the legend and the symbol of the South. But its sway has been ruthless, and it is about to strike again.

Every year thousands of persons make a pilgrimage to Natchez, Mississippi, south of Memphis, to see the beautiful homes once occupied by the owners of the great cotton plantations. People who have never lived in the South like to step back into that old setting. Standing in the gardens where camelias, azaleas, magnolias, and roses bloom, and looking through the waving fingers of Spanish moss at the gracious verandas of the colonial mansions, they are reminded of a serene and gay world, full of ease and elegance, where colonels sipped mint juleps on the porch while Negroes sang in the fields.

The big houses that stand in Natchez were built on the riches created long ago by cotton. Cluttered around them, therefore, are little one-room, unpainted, windowless shacks where the slaves lived who made the big houses possible. These shacks are still lived in by the people who have worked so hard and been paid so little ever since that day in 1793 when the cotton gin was invented.

Before the invention of the gin the preparation of cotton for spinning was such a long and arduous process that cotton was not a profitable crop. The coming of the gin brought fabulous wealth to the owners of plantations and slaves. Every square inch of land where cotton would grow was given over to the white blossoms. The luxury of the plantation owners became legendary, while the rest of the South's people sank deeper into poverty. The books call this exclusive growing of cotton "the one-crop system"—a colorless name for a custom which has kept a whole section of the country in a state of semi-starvation for a century and a half.

Cotton is a crop which exhausts the soil very quickly. A hundred and fifty years of cotton growing have ruined 61 per cent of the land in the South. Cotton culture also demands a great number of workers, and the need for this cheap labor fixed slavery on the South. After the Civil War a substitute for slave labor was found in the South's unique class of serfs—the share-croppers and tenant farmers.

The big cotton grower no longer owns slaves but he still owns the land. He divides it into small tracts and places on each a family which will devote its whole time to cotton. The tenant is often not even allowed to grow vegetables. Big families are wanted, for the more hands the better when it comes to chopping or picking cotton. Tools, food, and clothing are advanced by the plantation owner at interest rates which range from 10 to 29 per cent, according to a report on nine Southern counties by Professor Forester of North Carolina State College. The share-cropper or tenant may pay half the proceeds of the crop for the use of the land. From the remainder he repays the sums advanced for necessities and the exorbitant interest charges. He is never out of debt; he ruins his health and the land trying to make ends meet; and he sees his family grow up handicapped by undernourishment and ignorance.

A few figures will show what the rule of cotton has meant. During the years 1940-44 Mississippi was fortunate; its income went up 157 per cent—to $519 a person. But this must be compared with New York's

A. G. MEZERIK is the author of "The Revolt of the South and West." The next article in his series on the Southern states will discuss the current progressive trend in Kentucky.

average income of $1,600, or with the $1,200 necessary for a good living standard. In the boom year of 1942 the average resident of Mississippi spent $2.10 for furniture; the figure for the whole South was only $4.30. Bathrooms, the barometer of comfort in America, are found in only fifteen of every hundred homes. As far as the share-cropper is concerned, the state's present mild prosperity is largely statistical, for the wages of factory workers account for the major part of the per capita income increase—a fact not unrelated to the present C. I. O. organizing campaign. In Natchez the C. I. O. has recruited 2,000 workers, a sizable proportion of the 16,000 residents, but it has not been very successful with the share-croppers, tenants, and field workers of the cotton plantations. These form a huge group. More than 50 per cent of all the land in the South is farmed by tenants and share-croppers. In the Delta country below Memphis the percentage rises to a startling 80. Nearly 2,000,000 Southern families are caught in the web of tenant-farming and share-cropping, and more than two-thirds of them are white. Cotton is behind the dirt and degeneracy of "Tobacco Road" just as it was behind the gracious living portrayed in "Gone with the Wind."

The South's shiftlessness is not due to the hot Southern sun but to pellagra and malaria—2,000,000 Southerners suffer from malaria each year. If more than half of the farm homes are unpainted, it is because paint costs money. If the people are unwashed, it is because only one house in twenty has running water. And if the spoken language sometimes sounds like a comic strip, it may be because the South has only sixteen cents of every dollar spent in the United States for schools, while it has one-third of all the children. New York spends ten times as much as Mississippi does on each classroom.

It is only too true that the cotton states have not had the desire to do much for their citizens, but it must be recognized that they cannot afford to do what is required. Mississippi, at the bottom of the national ladder in education and so much else, spends 3.41 per cent of its income on education. New York spends only 2.6 per cent—but what a difference in income, and what an argument for federal aid on a basis of need! One of every four Southerners has never gone beyond the fifth grade, and in Mississippi forty-five of every hundred children are not enrolled in any school.

The crippled cotton lands inevitably breed ignorance and racial antagonism, chain gangs, lunatic politicians, and lynchings. The need for action is urgent, for King Cotton is about to strike again, and this time not against the South alone but against the whole country. The new mechanical cotton picker, the experts say, will push from five to eight million people off the land. This year one company, the International Harvester, will put out 1,500 cotton pickers. Anderson, Clayton and Company, the world's most important cotton firm, reports that the cost of picking a bale of cotton by machine is only $5.26, as against $39.41 by hand. A one-row machine picker can do the work of fifty people, and a double-row picker can do the work of a hundred. As these machines come into general use in the next few years millions of Southerners will become "displaced persons."

See what will happen as they take to the highways and crowd into Northern and Western towns seeking homes and jobs. Illiterate or semi-literate, warped by poverty and ignorance, they will drag down the level of citizenship wherever they go. The Bilbos and the Rankins of the whole country will find new opportunities among them. The K. K. K. and the Columbians will be brought into the North and West.

Mechanization will ultimately benefit the plantations of the South. The cost of production will be lowered, and the comparative few who work the land may get more income. Certainly the big planters, the 10 per cent who now own 90 per cent of all cotton production, will vastly increase their profits. But a great number of field workers will lose their livelihood, and as human beings they are the first consideration.

For them the most realistic solution would be industrialization, but not many monopolists will build factories in the South to remedy social conditions. A few of the South's rich men, are seeking this way out, notably a group in Alabama who have taken over a war plant and will manufacture paper pulp. Resettlement offers another solution for the problem of the American D. P.'s, and there has been some national thinking along this line. The Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture has a program for converting much of the South's eroded and exhausted cotton land into dairy farms, truck gardens, and pasture for livestock. This would be a carefully planned shift, financed by the federal government. But Congress shows no more interest in the bureau's program than in various other proposals, one of which calls for the creation of ten-family cooperatives to farm five-hundred-acre units with modern machinery.

Southern landlords evidence even less anxiety about the plight of their fellow-citizens than does Congress and are proceeding with their mechanization plans regardless of the human consequences. Ed Crump, undisputed political boss of the cotton-growing Delta, is more concerned with maintaining his alliances with the region's Northern and Southern economic chiefs than with bettering the lot of his lowly subjects.

It is obvious that the old order will not act in time. New forces, North, South, East, and West, must take up the task. Educators, the awakened people of the neighboring Tennessee Valley, younger business men, the revitalized church—all these groups, and with them the growing C. I. O., have this tremendous job to do. But they cannot do it alone; the whole nation must help.

Letter from Rome

BY MARIO ROSSI

Rome, May 25

THE political situation in Italy is becoming tremendously important. What is now happening here is bound to have great influence on the whole balance of power in the Mediterranean. According to persistent rumors, the Allies are building up their military strength in Italy and not giving a thought to leaving the country. Wanting to see for myself how much truth there was in these rumors, I made a week-long trip through central Italy. In Florence I discovered that the whole Caschione section is being requisitioned to accommodate 150,000 American soldiers. In Leghorn the Americans seem to be unloading war material day and night. On the Adriatic coast, near Rimini, British troops supported by Polish units and German prisoners of war are ruling the countryside. I was astonished to see how splendidly British, rightist Poles, and Germans were getting along together. The Germans go about town quite freely, driving their own cars, and are as arrogant as if they had won the war.

The continued presence of Allied troops two years after V-E Day is causing strong resentment. At first it was directed only against the British and Poles, but feeling is growing against the Americans. If Truman intends to apply in Italy the same policy as in Greece and Turkey, he is taking the wrong approach. The majority of the people feel that they have been betrayed by everyone, and care nothing about either Truman or Russia. They want only to get rid of the occupation troops and try to rebuild their country.

I visited Abruzzi, Tuscany, Marche, Latium, and Emilia and found the countryside green and tilled as of old. Villages that were razed to the ground by the German scorched-earth policy or Allied bombings have risen again. Hundreds of workers are keeping the roads in repair; many dynamited bridges have been replaced by temporary ones.

I spoke with farmers and artisans and inquired about their plans for the future. Most of them replied that they gave little thought to the future because a war would come in a few weeks or months, and so why bother?

Italians don't feel free. They know that powerful foreign forces are trying to shape their future. The Pope cannot reconcile himself to the thought of having his seat in a leftist country. And it is quite evident that the Americans are trying to help him in his plans to avert a leftist victory. It is significant that the government crisis began so shortly after Tarchiani's visit to Rome; there are speculations that he brought word that American help is conditional on the formation of a more rightist Cabinet.

De Gasperi was only too glad to resign in order to facilitate this task. Every time he is confronted with a major problem demanding immediate solution—as at the present moment the financial situation—he diverts the attention of the people from it by provoking a government crisis. Christian Democrats more directly under the influence of Catholic Action have for a long time clamored for a break with the Communists. The same insistent request has come from the right, which has pointed to Ramadier's example in France. But the most interesting figure in Italian politics today is still Togliatti. He is a magnificent speaker and astute political strategist, as the Sicilian elections have demonstrated. He overrules principles, but he knows what his party wants and how to get it.

Everything indicates that Italy will inevitably in the near future become the battleground of the controversial ideas of East and West if not of actual armed forces.

In the Wind

HEREWITH THE WIND'S early summer breeze on the state of the arts and education in America. Most of this information is from California, where recently Katy Hepburn went to bat against "abridgments of freedom" at a Wallace mass-meeting. In a free-swinging and crowd-pleasing speech she hit out at the Un-American Activities Committee, the people who ousted commentators Shirer and Kingdon, book-banners, bigots, and assorted witch-hunters.

MEANWHILE, AN OUTFIT known as the Native Sons of the Golden West has asked California and federal officials to outlaw the use of labor schools by G. I. students.

AND THE CALIFORNIA ART CLUB has criticized a recent Los Angeles art show in the following words: "Too many of the paintings emphasize the poverty and misery of people in America, and there is too much exploitation of ugliness. . . . We are used to having things of known beauty held up to the people. . . . [We cannot condone] expenditure of tax funds for the display of subversive propaganda inimical to our form of government."

"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" has been taken off the list of required reading for high-school students in Haverhill, Massachusetts, at the request of a rabbi who says that "the character of Shylock is an exaggerated distortion of Jewish attitudes and conduct," and that the play causes Jewish students "much discomfort and self-consciousness."

JAMES T. KIRKLAND, a teacher at the Dwight Morrow High School in Englewood, New Jersey, is also proprietor of the Moss Lake Camp, "an exclusive camp for girls." In the school paper, the Oracle, Kirkland advertises that his camp is for "Christians only." The course he teaches at Dwight Morrow, by the way, is "Problems of Democracy."

Del Vayo—France Is Not Finished

THE French railway strike is over, but the ominous problem that underlay this last demonstration of labor's restlessness continues to block the painful road to recovery. First of all, the strike further embittered those persons who are always more concerned with their personal routine than with anything else. To stand for hours and hours on a hot summer day in front of padlocked gates of railroad stations waiting to get home from one's daily work or to flee to the country over the week-end is not calculated to make the average Frenchman more friendly to organized labor. The railroad strike followed a millers' strike that had already left fourteen departments almost without bread and reduced the ration from 250 to 200 grams a day. It came after the threat of a gas and electric strike that precipitated a bitter controversy over the right of employees of a nationalized industry to force a shutdown in defiance of the state. It came when dozens of other minor strikes had either just been announced or miraculously averted. It came, in short, at a moment when to impatient Frenchmen the mere word grève (strike) seemed a personal affront.

But beyond all these subjective reactions the railroad strike had extremely damaging consequences for the nation as a whole. During the last two years France has made an impressive and moving effort of reconstruction. I went to France last year in February; when I left in August the situation had visibly improved. I witnessed the same progress this year, from January to April.

It is pathetic that after the great "battle of coal" and the strenuous production drive carried through by the workers of France those same workers should risk destroying the results of their own labors. But that is what a prolonged rail strike would have meant. It would have kept away from the pitheads in the departments of the North and the Pas-de-Calais thousands of miners from neighboring areas. The electrical strike would have paralyzed many branches of industrial production. Therefore it is understandable that from a national as well as a personal point of view many Frenchmen are becoming strongly anti-labor. It is, in fact, on this growing impatience that many extreme De Gaullists pin their hopes, believing that by early winter the mounting crisis will throw the people into the arms of the R. P. F. (Rassemblement du Peuple Français) and its leader. But to get angry is not to settle the crisis or to explain the cause of France's difficulties.

The simplest explanation would be of course to blame everything on the Communists. Thus Premier Ramadier has repeatedly insisted that behind the nation-wide wave of strikes are his former left-wing colleagues in the Cabinet. It is also true that up to the beginning of the year, as long as the Communists were in the government, the party line was opposed to walk-outs and in favor of a steady increase in production. But on the other hand we have the testimony of Jules Moch, also a Socialist and the Minister who heads the department directly involved in the action of the railway workers. Moch spoke of the "mysterious" manner in which the strike broke out without authorization of the union, and other comments in the Paris press underlined the almost casual start of the walk-out. Apart from possible political motives and maneuvers, there was undoubtedly truth in the comment of the union, after the strike began, that "the movement was due to the misery in the railway-men's homes."

One must remember that even during the period when the Communists were "against work stoppages and for an increase in production" they added, "but with price controls exercised in the interest of the workers." They could not say anything else. I participated as fraternal delegate of the Spanish General Workers' Union in the big convention of the C. G. T. in Paris last year, and I heard people argue from the floor: "All right, but we are not going to remain with our arms folded while prices go to the sky." There were men there from the old syndicalist wing of the C. G. T. who told me: "These Communists go too far in asking us to starve for the glory of the state." Since then the cost of living in France has continued to rise.

It is tragic for a good Socialist like Ramadier to have to fight the workers to save the franc. He said very bluntly that should he grant all the railway workers were asking it would mean an increase of twenty to thirty billion francs and the danger of a runaway inflation. Perhaps the root of the evil lies in the halfway planning that characterizes the present economic policy of France.

For weeks past the French press has been engaged in a most serious and interesting discussion of the problem of dirigisme (planning). The right points out that the demonstrations in the big cities where the crowds shouted "Down with economic control!" "Enough of government interference!" prove that the country is fed up with planned economy. The left says people forget that dirigisme is in itself only a method and that it cannot work if it is not propelled by daring and constructive revolutionary initiative. Between them, Ramadier and Blum maintain faith in the possibility of harmonizing planning with freedom. It is a fascinating debate which I hope to discuss further on this page.

But the crisis of dirigisme or of pseudo-dirigisme and the tragic struggle of France to keep up production, halt inflation, and permit its people to live do not justify gloomy predictions about the future of France. In 1940 France was already pronounced dead—and it revived: in great part thanks to the wonderful French proletariat, which in that decisive hour was the heart of the Resistance, and which even now, in the midst of such distress and passion, has shown a great sense of responsibility. The railway workers kept their promise to maintain the distribution of food and in the end accepted Ramadier's proposal of a wage scale below their claims and still farther below their needs.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Have We Enough Oil?

LAST week, writing about the opposition of the "independent" oil interests to the Anglo-American petroleum agreement, I mentioned their fear of foreign competition and their constant and vehement denials of any danger of an oil shortage in this country. Some of the Texas independent operators, for instance, have accused the government of a "malicious attitude" toward the domestic industry and have alleged that its "propaganda" about diminishing oil resources is designed to encourage foreign developments.

In considering this problem it is necessary to discuss separately its short-term and long-term aspects. In regard to the first, there is undeniably an immediate shortage of certain kinds of petroleum products, a shortage which is being met in part by a net import of oil into this country for the first time in history. In the last few days it has become known that both the army and the navy are concerned about their inability to procure oil for their needs. So seriously does the government regard the situation that Secretary of Interior Krug has summoned a special conference of Cabinet members and agency chiefs for June 17 to formulate plans to alleviate petroleum scarcities.

The current trouble has not arisen because of any falling off in crude production; that is being maintained at a peak figure of over five million barrels daily. The difficulty is that demand ever since V-J Day has been outstripping all estimates. When the end of the fighting cut back the services' tremendous need for oil, industry experts anticipated a sharp fall in total demand followed by a gradual climb back to the war-time peak, which they thought would be reached again in 1951. Well, we have passed that peak already and are still climbing. A spokesman for Standard Oil of New Jersey said recently that he expected demand to increase by 4.5 per cent over the next twelve months if there was a recession; if industrial activity held at its present level, the increase would be over 7 per cent.

There are a number of reasons for this tremendous demand. The public, released from gas rationing, has returned zestfully to the road, and old cars run fewer miles per gallon than new. There are more trucks in service than ever. The railroads are turning to oil-burning diesel-electric locomotives, and the use of this type of prime mover in other industries is expanding rapidly. In the ten years from 1935 to 1945 installed diesel horse-power jumped from 5,500,000 to 45,000,000.

Probably the most spectacular growth in demand has been in that for fuel oils. John L. Lewis encouraged both householders and industrialists to install oil-burning furnaces, and he is now probably getting some grim satisfaction from the fact that it is going to be difficult to keep part of this equipment functioning next winter. The shortage seems to be especially acute in the case of the heavy residual oil used by industry. More efficient refining methods have increased recovery of gasoline and other light products and reduced the proportion of residuals. The shortage is to some extent being made up by imports, but since the scarcity of fuel oils is world wide, it is doubtful whether the current volume of shipments can be sustained.

However, the Independent Petroleum Association of America in a report issued June 10 claims that "there is no indication of an over-all shortage of oil." It admits "spot dislocations of supply and demand," which, it says, "are interpreted incorrectly as evidence of a real oil shortage. The need for new facilities—new wells, new pipe lines, and new refineries—continues to be the critical issue in the petroleum supply-and-demand outlook." The implication is that there is plenty of oil in the ground but that the means of processing it are inadequate. In part this is true, and the oil industry has a huge construction program which should eventually enable it to catch up with its refining, transport, and storage needs.

How far the sinking of new wells will lead to an increase in total production it is not easy to say at this time. Although drilling costs are high, present crude prices encourage active development. The industry's program for 1947 comprises 30,000 wells with a combined depth of 100,000,000 feet—nearly 19,000 miles. But will a sufficient proportion of these wells prove productive enough to maintain reserves unimpaired? Of course it is always possible that some vast new pool will be discovered, but with the continental United States pretty thoroughly surveyed, the chances get less each year. According to the Wall Street Journal, of the ninety-seven "wildcat" (exploratory) wells drilled in California in the first five months of this year, only four yielded oil. In the corresponding months of 1946 eleven out of eighty-one "wild cats" proved productive.

Last year, the American Petroleum Institute reports, proved reserves of crude oil increased by 2,658,062,000 barrels. Subtracting production during the year of 1,726,348,000 barrels, this made a net addition to reserves of 931,714,000 barrels. That would seem fairly satisfactory; yet the annual report of the Texas Corporation appraised the results of oil prospecting in 1946 as "very disappointing." Most of the increase in reported reserves, it pointed out, was due to revisions of previous estimates and extensions to known fields. Less than one-tenth of the total—the smallest amount in ten years—was added by the discovery of new pools. Moreover, reserves at the end of 1946 represented thirteen years' production as compared with fourteen years at the end of 1936.

These figures do not indicate that the United States is within measurable distance of exhausting its oil resources. But it may mean that it will not be possible to expand production much beyond its present limits. Yet it is clear that the trend of consumption is strongly upward and, barring a major depression, will remain so. A Standard Oil of New Jersey official recently estimated that domestic demand would rise by 1,100,000 barrels daily by 1951 while crude production increased less than 500,000 barrels. Unless his forecast is wildly inaccurate, a steady increase in imports will be essential to fill the gap.

Josephus Daniels: A Good Neighbor

SHIRT-SLEEVE DIPLOMAT. By Josephus Daniels. The University of North Carolina Press. $5.

MR. DANIELS'S book has unusual interest both for the United States and for Latin America. Written with good faith from the first to the last page, it will be read with pleasure by every American of good-will and with equal satisfaction by liberals of whatever nationality or language.

The case of Mr. Daniels is truly exemplary: to represent a militarily powerful country to a weak neighbor and in the performance to enhance the moral and intellectual prestige of the United States, and at the same time make every effort to understand Mexican life and Mexican attitudes, was not an easy task. Mr. Daniels not only accomplished this; he has now crowned his accomplishment by writing a clear and frank book about his experience, a book which expresses both his love for his own country and his keen interest in the people of Mexico. Mr. Daniels considers himself—as he repeatedly says—a shirt-sleeve diplomat. That is the sort of diplomat that the United States, and the world, urgently needs.

Mr. Daniels's assignment to Mexico had a special significance by reason of a historical incident in which he had been one of the principal actors. As we all know, it was Mr. Daniels who as Secretary of the Navy in the Wilson Administration ordered the American fleet to take over the Customs House at Vera Cruz on April 21, 1914, an engagement in which 126 Americans and 19 Mexicans died, and 195 Mexicans and 71 Americans were wounded. This measure was designed, so Mr. Daniels tells us, "to help 'liberty-loving Mexicans to free themselves from the Huerta reign of absolutism.'" But to Mexicans, both Huertistas and anti-Huertistas, it was an intolerable intervention. Those of us who were youngsters at the time and saw American marines in the ports of Campeche, well remember the pain we suffered in knowing that they were also in Vera Cruz, not as visitors but as masters. Mr. Daniels's appointment as ambassador was received in Mexico at first with surprise, indignation, and threats; his arrival gave rise to hostile acts which, as he tells us, the Mexican government did not make public and was finally able to stamp out.

One of the charms of Mr. Daniels's book lies in the simplicity with which he states that he had forgotten the Vera Cruz incident. His wife had not. "But you can't go to Mexico," she said. "You and Franklin may be sure the Mexicans have not forgotten. . . ." Nevertheless, certain of his good faith and eager to demonstrate it, Daniels accepted the difficult assignment with enthusiasm. When he left Mexico nine years later he carried with him the affection and good-will of many Mexicans. And Mrs. Daniels had had a large share in winning it. Daniels convinced Mexicans that times had changed and that there were many Americans like himself who were determined that the new course of Mexican-American relations should continue. His keen desire that this should be so fills the pages in which he describes his visit to President Madero's widow as well as those in which he condemns the policy of Henry Lane Wilson—and the passages in which he refers to his friendship with the family of Martínez Zorrilla, one of whose sons died defending the Customs House at Vera Cruz.

The book covers nine important years in the history of Mexico—from 1933 to 1942. Mr. Daniels has written his memoirs with facility and skill and charm. He supports his impressions with official documents—which give the book historical importance—and reprints the vivid letters he sent to his friends in North Carolina. The three Presidents of the republic with whom he had official dealings also appear in the book—Abelardo Rodríguez, Lázaro Cárdenas, and Manuel Avila Camacho—as well as many other important figures, such as Plutarco Elías Calles, the former President, and Miguel Alemán, the one-time governor of Vera Cruz and Minister of the Interior who became President in 1946. Mr. Daniels's judgment is always generous and careful. He mentions, and passes judgment on, many high Mexican functionaries, on his own predecessors at the United States embassy, on Americans who visited Mexico during his mission—bankers, intellectuals, newspapermen, artists. Always he expresses a firm and clear opinion, yet never falls into negative or damaging criticism. For example, in referring to Mr. Morrow he says that the former ambassador had "tact and charm," and he uses the phrase, "all the world loves a lover"; yet he concludes by saying that "a Morgan partner could not resist the temptation to direct financial policies." Likewise, in discussing the past and present of Mexico and in describing the places he visited he indulges neither in false praise nor in interpretations which might be offensive to Mexicans.

His book is interesting in other ways—for example, his discussion of the American Confederates who went to Mexico and their relations with the Maximilian empire, a historical episode of the first importance which has never been accorded sufficient study.

Especially important of course are the chapters which deal with the great problems of Mexico—the religious issue and the question of oil. He answers the unjust accusation that he supported religious persecution by presenting documents which completely exonerate him. He writes, "I took every occasion to express my conviction that democracy, freedom of religion, and public education were a trinity that alone would bring light and leading to a free people." At the same time he presents the reasoning of the Calles government: "Catholic church leaders today deny they are in politics, and even when admitting that this is true, the government officials say that they are ready to return to their old activities if they were not restrained by the government measures." With the same impartiality and sense of responsibility, both human and patriotic, he follows the course of the expropriation of the petroleum industry, of which he does not approve and which he regrets, but which he tries to handle in accordance with President Roosevelt's Good Neighbor policy—that was always his goal.

In other valuable pages he follows Mexico's progress up to the time when the good neighbors become comrades-in-arms. Mr. Daniels's modesty veils the importance of his effort to achieve this end. The contents of this book, however, explain how and why Mexico took such a stand so readily and decidedly. A true enemy of Nazi-fascism, Daniels gained the confidence of the anti-fascists of Mexico, and with it the best alliance. As an ardent anti-fascist he also refers to the case of Spain: "One of the most distressing things in the world is these Spanish patriots who sought to have a democratic government and were overthrown, not in a civil conflict as many think, but by Hitler and Mussolini."

In short, this book may be taken as evidence of what an American of the old liberal tradition can achieve to benefit his people and the peoples of other countries.

ANDRES IDUARTE

I. G. Farben

TREASON'S PEACE. By Howard Watson Ambruster. Beechhurst Press. $3.75.

I. G. FARBEN. By Richard Sasuly. Boni and Gaer. $3.

TWICE within a generation the United States has found itself at war with German militarism. Both times the American people learned that they were also at war with an entity known as I. G. Farben, officially the Interessen Gemeinschaft Farbenindustrie, Aktien-gesellschaft, more notoriously known as I.G., a chemical combine which at its peak was one of the largest industrial organizations in the world.

The recovery of I. G. Farben after World War I was a prelude to the rearmament of Germany and the rise of Hitler. In the Second World War as in the first I.G. was a mainspring of German aggression. Both of these books weigh the risks involved if once again the passage of a few years should witness the resurgence of I.G., whether or not Germany as a nation ever regains its military might.

During the war-time investigations of international cartels the initials I.G. were encountered as subscripts to one cartel agreement after another. As instance after instance accumulated, it became clear that the role and activities of I.G. were not simply those of an ordinary industrial enterprise but represented rather the behavior of a state within a state. It is enlightening to recall, in view of subsequent events, the ironically disingenuous statement made in 1928 by Dr. Carl Bosch, then chairman of the board of I.G., that "Farben's policy abroad is sadly misunderstood. We are pictured as a formidable trust out to conquer the world."

So striking and so effective were the cartel operations of I.G. before and during World War II that the late President Roosevelt in a letter to Secretary of State Hull compared them to a detective story and warned that the defeat of the Nazi armies would have to be followed by the reduction of this weapon of economic warfare if victory were to be genuine. In the same vein President Wilson stated in a message to Congress at the end of World War I that the German chemical industry, which in effect meant I.G., "was and may well be again a thoroughly knit monopoly capable of exercising competition of a peculiarly insidious and dangerous kind."

It is the purpose of these two books to assess the role of I. G. Farben in World War II and to evaluate the measures which have been taken to subdue permanently the chemical colossus which a German writer some years ago called the invisible government of the Reich. Because of the differences in their focus the two books supplement each other. "Treasure's Peace" is subtitled "German Dyes and American Dupes." It is largely concerned with the history and scope of I.G.'s influence in American industry and with the infiltration tactics which I.G. has practiced. The study of I.G. by Richard Sasuly is an excellent description of this organism which grew from test tubes and a very clear report of the participation by I.G. in Hitler's plans and deeds.

Everyone who is familiar with the higher economics of the chemical industry is aware that Mr. Ambruster has for many years carried on a one-man crusade against I.G. as well as against developments which appear to him to abet I.G.'s designs. This product of his researches, or perhaps more accurately his campaigns, bears the stamp of direct and intimate acquaintance with nearly every phase of the subject.

It is, however, precisely this quality which accounts for some rather obvious defects in the book itself. His perspective is foreshortened, with the consequence that he imputes more than is necessary or probable to the influence of I.G. and upon occasion appears to see I.G.'s sinister profile lurking in the background of every event or policy which he does not like. No one who is familiar with the magnitude and skill of I.G.'s manipulations will gainsay their diabolical cleverness or their repeated success in circumventing and defeating both public and private measures aimed against them. It is quite another matter, however, to see, as Mr. Ambruster does, an I.G. formula in so many disjunctive circumstances, or to perceive I.G.'s hand guiding the action of quite so many "dupes." Nevertheless, despite all the defects in style and the gaps in his reasoning, Mr. Ambruster tells a very important story in a bold and vigorous way.

Much of the information in Richard Sasuly's analysis as in Ambruster's is a matter of public record in the Kilgore hearings and in the reports which the War Department has issued. Sasuly does a good job of condensation and at the same time provides us with an up-to-date picture of I.G.'s present status. Like Ambruster, Sasuly is concerned to point out that Germany and I.G. are always a potentially explosive combination. For the general reader Sasuly's book is especially good because while telling of one of the most fascinating industrial histories of this era it emphasizes the way in which science and industry can become the weapons of philosophies of power.

Both authors, as well as the public, should derive some comfort from the recent indictments of a number of top I. G. Farben officials for criminal complicity in Nazi aggression. Yet it would be dangerous to conclude that the conviction of individuals can resolve the cartel problem in Germany or eliminate I.G. as a potential menace in the future. As long as there is an I.G. in existence, equipped with its vast intangible asset of scientific know-how, its immense research organization, and affiliations reaching into the most vital spots of world industry, vigilance will be necessary to prevent I.G. from employing its alchemy to emulate the Hydra and recoup its power.

The Eternal Enigma

AURELIEN. By Louis Aragon. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. Two Volumes. $6.

I WAS formidably prepared not to like "Aurélien": a Maginot Line of prejudices. Racine's "Bérénice," from which Aurélien borrowed the name of his heroine—unless it be from Barrès—was described as a sigh—"Alas!"—in 1,500 lines. "Aurélien" is "I love you" in 680 pages. In a Du Maurier cartoon two young people are seated in a park. "Darling!" says Edwin. "What, darling?" says Angelina. "Nothing, darling; only darling, darling." The old curmudgeon at the other end of the bench looks bilious. I sympathize with that grumpy listener. Too much is too much, as Madame de Sévigné wisely remarked.

Then I don't like novels in which people sleep around, hucksters' fashion. It is too trite. I object to being dragged day after day to the same shoddy night clubs, meeting the same tarts, ordering the same drinks, as in "The Arch of Triumph" or "Le Sursis" (although Aragon's curaçao appeals to me more than Remarque's calvados). And I am tired of having the five million Parisians who are hard at work serve as a neutral backdrop for a handful of wasters.

Well, I had the same Balaam experience as with Vansittart's book. I like "Aurélien." Two thirds of it describe the slow flowering of a great love, in a world where love is but a flippant jest. Aragon proceeds with the unhurried, unerring, minute pertinacity of a Ph.D. He is in the grand tradition of the psychological novel, from Chrétien de Troyes to Marcel Proust, with Madame de Lafayette, Marivaux, Abbé Prévost, Laclos, Benjamin Constant, Balzac, Stendhal, and (yes, he has his modest legitimate place) Paul Bourget. The book is curiously sincere. It disarms irony.

fate. The scalpel which traces every delicate fiber is more civilized than the great but crude symbol of "Tristan," the love philter. Our most vexing social problems, to which The Nation devotes all its front pages, are the artificial products of man's stupidity: love is the eternal enigma. We might have a sensible political and economic regime tomorrow if only people would stop promulgating "doctrines" from Washington and Moscow. But shall we ever harmonize liberalism, communism, and totalitarianism in love?

Just as Aurélien and Bérénice have brought their love to a point of spiritual perfection, it mysteriously collapses. Bérénice disappears. Then the novel, which had been moving slowly in the background of the romance, comes to the front. It is a good novel too. Edmond Barbentane is an adventurer, a Bel-Ami banking heavily on his good looks. He rigs up an elaborate plot to get rid of his wife while keeping her fortune. His knavish tricks are frustrated, but he wrests victory out of defeat and marries a still richer wife. Aurélien, abandoned and ruined, takes up a modest job with his poky brother-in-law, at Lille.

All the while we have had excellent sketches of Parisian society—the Faubourg St. Honoré set, big business, politics, art, and pleasure; delicate etchings of Paris in all its moods and seasons, particularly of the Seine from the Ile St. Louis; a priceless New Year's Eve dinner of veterans (after all, the war was the only good time most of them ever had); and above all candid-camera pictures of vanguard groups in poetry and painting, the Dada world that Aragon knows so well. All this could be stuffed into "Men of Good Will": only it is much better.

The Epilogue, daringly, melodramatically, gives the key to the abortive story. Eighteen years later, at the time of France's collapse, Aurélien is again in the army. His unit drifts into R—, where Bérénice lives. They meet. They have become a legend to each other. Although Aurélien loves his wife,orgette, "Bérénice was his secret, the undertone of poetry in his life, the thing that had never been quite attained and had never come to an end." The story had been told from the point of view of Aurélien; the two lovers had been presented on the same plane. At the last we realize that Bérénice is a true heroine, that Aurélien is commonplace.

Practical, conventional, stodgy, he is ripe for Pétainism and she for resistance. She judges him at last, and he feels himself judged. It is Madame Bovary's revenge. The little provincial bourgeoisie, wife of a pathetic and ludicrous village druggist, has a pure and ardent soul.

"Aurélien" was not enthusiastically received in France. It may fail here: not the bulk, but the price, is a handicap. It seems to me vastly superior to books with the same setting which have been sensationally successful. The translation by Ethne Wilkins is excellent.

Limited Warfare in the Atomic Era

THE REVOLUTION IN WARFARE.

By B. H. Liddell Hart. Yale University Press. $2.

LIDDELL HART, the British military writer, had been for twenty-five years the outstanding spokesman of the small-army, limited-warfare school of military thought. In "The Revolution in Warfare" he restates the school's position for the atomic era.

The nub of Hart's argument is that the means of warfare have changed radically since the time of Napoleon whereas the concept of war has not. War remains an act of entire nations in arms. In other words, the awful destructiveness of World Wars I and II was not due simply to the development of new weapons but equally to their employment by huge military forces, by the totality of one society against the totality of another. Hart lays the blame for this on the military philosophers, particularly Clausewitz. The military mind, he says, has been bewitched by Clausewitz's description of war as an act of unlimited violence. So war has been made an act of unlimited violence.

I have never been impressed by Hart's arguments and I am not now. For philosophers have less influence on history than history on philosophers. One must turn toward social forces for an explanation of the extraordinary fury of modern war as contrasted, for example, with war in the eighteenth century. The Napoleonic wars and the wars of 1914-18 and 1939-45 were extremely violent because sharply conflicting ways of life were at stake.

Thus Hart is on the wrong track in his discussion of total war. How wrong he emerges clearly in the last chapter, in which he considers the question of future war. He suggests steps to make it a "limited war." However, if there is another war, it will be a war between American capitalism and Russian communism. And that war will unleash passions, violence, and destruction such as no war in history has done. Nevertheless, "The Revolution in Warfare" deserves a reading. As usual Hart does a competent job of summarizing recent developments in the military art.

The Chinese

THEIR HISTORY AND CULTURE

By Kenneth Scott Latourette

A third edition, revised and enlarged, of the standard history of China. It has been brought up to date in the light of historical events and new knowledge of China which research has revealed during the eleven years since the second edition was issued.

Scholars and critics alike recognized The Chinese as an authoritative work. M. S. Bates said in the American Historical Review, "In fullness, quality and modernity of treatment...the work stands alone. Nor is it likely to be surpassed for longish years." The New York Herald Tribune Book Review said, "Mr. Latourette writes with clarity and simplicity, without sacrificing dignity. The scholarship is in content rather than manner. It is an easy book to read, and worth reading."

"Monsieur Verdoux"—III

("Monsieur Verdoux" has been withdrawn and will be re-released only after a United Artists' buildup which will, I hear, try to persuade people that they will kill themselves laughing. I will take care to notify readers of this column of its return, and of changes, if any are made. I am grieved to be so late—or early—with this review, but not very; this film has too long a life ahead of it. It is permanent if any work done during the past twenty years is permanent.)

THE most mysterious line in the film, Verdoux's reference to having "lost" his family, becomes clear if the three are seen as members of a single personality. The wife whom segregation and deceit so inevitably paralyzed was dying a slow death from the moment she became uneasy and failed, with her own kind of misguided tenderness, to beseech her husband's confidence; and the child could not long have survived his mother.

With their death Verdoux all but dies himself. He becomes old, bent, sore, stiff, not only through heartbreak or because all that he most cherished in his nature is destroyed, but because their death has deprived him of the one motive he would recognize for his criminality. The third meeting with Miss Nash, for all its handsome prospects, revives him only to an old man's charming glimmer; but as soon as danger once more requires work of him and, after showing how effortlessly he might escape, he casually surrenders himself to society's vengeance, he limps up and shines like a snake which has just cast its winter skin. All that remains now is memory and the pure tripped ego, the naked will to survive which discovers, with ineffable relief, that there is no longer any point in surviving.

With his soul dead at last, it is no wonder that Verdoux asserts himself so proudly, in the courtroom and death cell, in terms of his dream of himself. He would have explained himself less proudly and with greater moral understanding to his wife, but he had successfully avoided that possibility, at the cost of their marriage and her life. His dream of himself is urgently challenged only once, by the girl whose life he spares; and he successfully resists that challenge in the strangest and, I think, most frightening scene ever filmed.

I had expected this film to be the last word in misogyny; but although there is a good deal of it about, Verdoux's handling of his victims is in general remarkably genial and kindly. The one really hair-raising moment of that sort is the chance second meeting with the girl, the scene in which he brushes her off. After all, Verdoux risks nothing against the poor frumps he kills or tries to kill, except his life. But the girl is infinitely more dangerous. She is the one human being with whom he holds in common everything he regards as most important. Both have known love as passionate pity for the helpless, both could kill for love; both would be capable of maturer love, if at all, only with their own kind. The girl is much closer to Verdoux than his own wife, or his murdered wives; in sparing her he has betrayed both his marriage and his vocation. Since he is above all else a family man and an artist, she threatens the very structure of his soul. But the deranged and deadlocked will which has made and sustained Verdoux is never so strong or so ruthless as when it faces the threat of cure; and I know of no moment more dreadful or more beautifully achieved than that in which Verdoux veers from the girl, the sun on his suddenly shriveled cheek, and mutters in the shriveled, almost effeminate little voice of more than mortal hatred and

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PUBLIC

A HOME IN THE COUNTRY

Are you one of those individuals whose wife and child are eager for a vacation this summer? Are you disappointed that you cannot rent a bungalow and wondering when you will ever solve this problem of summer residence?

Well, there is a solution. A group of cooperative-minded persons bought a tract of 400 acres in Peekskill, New York, developed the land, built beautiful homes and enabled hundreds of families to live in comfort and economy. This original venture, started in 1923, has now developed into a thriving prosperous community. It is called Mohegan Colony.

In 1939 another group of progressive-minded individuals bought a tract of 200 beautiful acres, near the Bronx River Parkway, a single hour's ride from New York, with adequate facilities for bathing, shopping, etc. With the pre-war, war and post-war difficulties in building, we were not able to start construction. However, at this time we are beginning to build bungalows and are assured of the completion of many of them for use this season.

In our organization all the members are fully protected. A parcel of land can be bought for as little as $200. Improvements on the land are made on a low-cost, cooperative basis. Bungalows are built under the supervision of experts and are similarly designed for satisfying the modest-income group of professionals and white-collar workers.

We are convinced we can enable you—of refined tastes but low income—to own your parcel of land, build your bungalow at little cost and protect you against fraud and exploitation. Ours is not a real estate promotion scheme; it is a legitimate, reliable cooperative enterprise. We are incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. You will have the fullest opportunity to examine our financial standing, to visit our property and to participate in our meetings. We especially invite members of labor unions and progressive organizations generally.

A postal card will bring you additional detailed information.

terror: "You go on about your business."

But why does Verdoux become a murderer? One good answer is: why not? Verdoux is a business realist; in terms of that realism the only difference between free enterprise in murder and free enterprise in the sale of elastic stockings is the difference in legal liability and in net income. And if the film is regarded as a metaphor for war, we may blush to ask Verdoux why; or if it is regarded as a metaphor for the destruction of the soul, murder is almost too mild a vocation. Yet we may still ask why, and wonder why Chaplin's only direct statements, most of which are made through Verdoux, are so remarkably inadequate. Verdoux, to be sure, is grandly in character in holding "society" accountable and in absolving the individual; but is this all that Chaplin knows? If so, he is as surely a victim and dupe of evil as Verdoux or the civilization he excoriates, and all that goes deeper in the film is achieved intuitively, as if in a kind of waking dream. If he knows better, then he is gravely at fault, as artist and moralist, in making clear no more than he does, still worse in tossing the mass-audience so cynical and misleading a sop; and one of the purest and most courageous works I know of is, at its climax, pure and courageous only against the enemy, not in the face of the truth. For the answers to why and how criminality can be avoided, we can look inward more profitably than at the film; for all that is suggested in the film is operant in each of us. If Chaplin had illuminated these bottom causes more brightly than we can see them in ourselves, "Verdoux" would be a still greater work of art than it is. But in proposing so richly suggestive an image of process and effect in the world and in the personality, and in proposing it so beautifully, the film, with all its faults, is one of the few indispensable works of our time.

It even contains and implies the beginning of the answer. Good and evil are inextricable, Verdoux insists. But his fatal mistake was in trying to keep them apart. If the film is regarded as a metaphor for the personality, and through that metaphor, as a metaphor for the personality as the family as business as war as civilization as murder, then this is certain: if the man and wife had honored their marriage with more than their child, the murders would never have been committed, the paralysis would never have imposed itself or would have been dissolved, and the wife and child would never have been shut into that exquisite tabernacle of a closed garden, but all three would have lived as one in that poverty for which the wife was forlorn, in the intactness of soul and the irresponsibility of that anarchic and immortal lily of the field, the tramp, the most humane and most nearly complete among the religious figures our time has evolved; whom for once in his life Chaplin set aside, to give his century its truest portrait of the upright citizen.

VOX has issued Bach's Sonata in A minor for unaccompanied violin played by Ruggiero Ricci (Set 187). The work is one that I have always found extremely dull, but that I have heard Szigeti play with exciting style. Ricci is too young to have that kind of style; but his performance exhibits a young artist's mastery of his instrument and feeling for music that are impressive and moving. It is recorded with brilliance and pressed on plastic records with noiseless surfaces that are a relief after the surfaces of Vox's shellac records.

Vox also has issued the Polydor recording of Bach's Toccata, Adagio, and Fugue in C major for organ, as made into a work for piano by Busoni, and performed by Borovsky (Set 193). The work is one of Bach's greatest; but Busoni's treatment of it, which expands Bach's textures and progression of thought with material of Busoni's own devising, is something to avoid; and Borovsky's performance of the Adagio and Fugue is not good. It is recorded with clarity and good balance, but at a low volume-level; and the shellac surfaces are poor.

Another Vox set (163) offers some French piano music played by Gaby Casadesus. The collection includes several charming pieces by Rameau and Couperin and the original and fascinating "Idylle" of Chabrier—as well as pieces by Fauré, Satie, and Ravel that I don't care for. Again I find Mme Casadesus playing with more incisiveness of rhythm and phrasing, more variety of coloring, more musical life than her husband; and her performances are excellently recorded; but surfaces are poor and there is some wavering pitch in my copy.

Still another Vox set (186) offers the Polydor recording of Ravel's "Chansons madécasses" and his arrangements of three Hebrew melodies—music I don't care for, but beautifully sung by Madeleine Grey, soprano, and well recorded. Surfaces again are poor.

Three volumes of Bach's clavier music played on the piano by Erno Balogh have been issued by Disc: the Three-Part Inventions (Set 770; $4.83), the Twelve Little Preludes (Set 771; $3.53), and the Six Little Preludes (Set 772; $3.53). The Twelve Little Preludes are, to my ears, engaging small-scale pieces; but the others are dull keyboard exercises, in spite of being written by Bach. Balogh's playing is not sensitive either in touch or phrasing; and it is well-recorded except for peaks on certain notes. Surfaces again are poor.

On a single vinylite record with not wholly quiet surfaces (4020; $2.31) Disc offers Prokofiev's engaging Sextet on Hebrew themes Opus 34, well-performed by Vivian Rivkin, pianist, David Weber, clarinetist, William Nowinski and George Ockner, violinists, Bernard Milofsky, violist, and William Forst, cellist, and well-recorded.

Disc also offers a couple of volumes of jazz. Of the Mary Lou Williams piano solos (Set 612; $3.15) only "Lonely Moment" and the fast portion of "Blue Skies" are in the style that I have enjoyed; the rest are a mess of newly acquired harmonic luxuriance and stylistic complication. They are superbly recorded; and the surfaces are quiet. As for the Omer Simeon Trio (Set 708; $2.80), Simeon's clarinet-playing is uninteresting, but James P. Johnson's piano-playing, which I have never enjoyed before, is excellent this time. One of his best sides, "Bandanna Days," wavers badly in pitch; and surfaces are poor.

For those who like John Jacob Niles's mannered singing there is Disc's set (732; $3.93) of early American carols. And for those who like Creole songs, a set of them (629; $3.15) agreeably sung by Adelaide Van Wey.

From Circle comes a set (S-3) called "South Side Shake," with a recreation of the music that was produced at Negro rent parties in Chicago in the 1920's. The musicians are Dan Burley, pianist, and "Pops" Foster, bass-player, who used to perform at those parties, and the McGhee brothers, guitarists. Their method is to keep a single phrase going with exciting momentum for the entire side; and for me the vitality of the performance is not enough compensation for the lack of melodic development.

This Circle volume is part of the back-to-origins movement in jazz that recently brought me this by no means unexpected announcement: "Jazz, which in its infancy bounced forth from the decks of Mississippi River side-wheelers, will shortly be a Hudson River feature. Starring foremost New Orleans musicians, who began their careers on the famous riverboats just thirty years ago . . . the first cruise . . . will cast off from Pier 83 . . . at 9 P. M. on June 6." Describing the efforts of Rudolph Blesh and Art Hodes to recover the authentic music that had been lost, the announcement concluded: "The most radical departure of all in the world of hot music is the return of jazz to the river on June 6." But there is still another step to be taken; and I am waiting for the announcement that will begin: "Jazz, which in its infancy bounced forth from the brothels of New Orleans, will shortly return. . . ."

Decca also has done a little reviving of the past by issuing a Brunswick Collectors' Series volume of performances (1926-1928) by King Oliver and his Dixie Syncopators (Set B-1022; $3.50). The only ones I thought outstanding were "Sugar Foot Stomp" and "Snag It" (on 80081).

I got more pleasure from Decca's volumes of the songs from "Annie, Get Your Gun" (Set 468; $5.25) and "Call Me Mister" (Set 466; $4.50), and Columbia's volume of the music of "Finian's Rainbow" (Set 686; $5.50), with Ethel Merman, Betty Garrett, and Ella Logan respectively, and others of the original casts.

Letters to the Editors

Callou, Callay for Harry!

Dear Sirs: "President Truman," said the Red Queen, "is a dear."

"You are speaking of his offer to Greece," said Alice.

"Of course I am," said the Red Queen. "He is unexceptional."

"But," said Alice, "it's a long way away. Don't we have a Monroe Doctrine to keep outside nations from coming into the Americas?"

"This," said the Red Queen, "is a slight extension of the Monroe Doctrine."

The Same Fight

Dear Sirs: At the beginning of 1897, Candia, seeking its freedom, took up arms against Turkey. Macedonia, in a magnificent act of solidarity, followed suit. The war between Greece and the Turks was on.

The Italian youth made ready to assist in the Hellenic resurrection. The University Committee of Rome appealed to the students of all Italian universities and asked advice of the greatest Roman minds. In reply Giovanni Bovio, the great educator and philosopher of true democracy, wired us on February 17: "I advise you to second the Hellenic movement in Candia." Cesare Lombroso wrote, "I would like to be younger and do more than utter words."

Meanwhile the University Committee, in conjunction with many committees scattered all over Italy, began to organize a University Legion and offered its command to General Stefano Canzio, son-in-law of Garibaldi.

However, the Italian government, part and parcel of the Triple Alliance, did not share our vision and sought in many ways to hamper the expedition. I managed, as special correspondent of Avanti, to embark from Brindisi for Corfu, and in Athens I received a last letter from General Stefano Canzio saying he hoped to join us soon.

But just as his ship was about to leave Genoa it was seized by the police. The expedition was stopped, but the many students and volunteers who had reached Hellenic shores joined the Garibaldi Legion organized by Ricciotti Garibaldi. I joined the First Garibaldi Battalion, which moved toward Epirus. On the flank of the Greek troops commanded by Colonel Botzaris, we passed into the territory occupied by the Turks, who were marching toward Jannina.

This campaign had its sad epilogue on May 17 at Domokos in Thessaly, where, among the seven hundred dead and wounded on the Greek side, a hundred were Italians.

There is no doubt that the Hellenic adventure was part of the long-fought struggle for freedom which had found Italy and Greece standing side by side in 1860 and 1866. Today, once again, the liberty-loving sons of the two countries are united in the new struggle for freedom.

Lamb or Falcon?

Dear Sirs: May I be permitted to correct several inaccuracies and to defend myself against certain unjust charges in Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.'s review of my book "Allies Betrayed" (The Nation, February 22). Let us examine a few of Mr. Schlesinger's specific complaints:

1. "Mr. Martin," he says, "is able to turn calmly to so notorious and violent a pan-Serb as Lieutenant Colonel Zhiwan Knezevich as a reliable source." Nowhere do I quote Colonel Knezevich directly or call upon him as a final authority; the several "quotes" I do employ are reproductions of official documents that appear in the Colonel's writings. The authenticity of these documents has been confirmed by ex-Premier Slobodan Jovanovich, as well as by members of the British mission.

2. "The calculation as between Tito and Mihailovich . . . was a simple one," says Schlesinger. "No responsible statesman in 1943 could base his policy on the premise that Britain and America were fighting Russia." The implication here is that the alternative to supporting Tito was supporting Mihailovich in a war against Tito, and that this, in effect, was my position. This is an unpardonable misstatement of my thesis. My argument was that Britain and America could have—and should have—forced a compromise on the two warring factions. Such a compromise, based on a territorial delimitation, was recommended by both the British and the American mission attached to Mihailovich as well as by Lieutenant Colonel Lynn M. Farish, senior American member of the Anglo-American mission at Tito's headquarters. All of them were convinced of its feasibility.

3. Mr. Schlesinger questions my statement that Tito's movement at its height "was a minority movement which had won for itself the active hostility of the Serb, Croat, and Slovene people." I think he would agree in general, however, that in this day and age it is quite feasible for totalitarian minority movements to seize power and maintain themselves in power against a disunited (because democratic) majority. He might also be prepared to accept the word of a number of liberals who went to Yugoslavia fully prepared to be sympathetic, that approximately 80 per cent of the people are hostile to the regime. (I name only Bogdan Raditsa and Hal Lehrman, Nation correspondents, and Ann Dacey of the New Statesman and Nation.) My argument is that Tito's movement, from the very beginning of the civil war, governed by the methods it employs today on a national scale (Schlesinger calls it "an intolerable dictatorship") and was approximately as popular with the Yugoslav people as it is today.

4. "Tito has turned out a despot," says Mr. Schlesinger. It would be interesting to find out when he made this discovery. The fact is that Tito has always been a Soviet despot—and the miniature Soviet regimes which Schlesinger and other liberals mistakenly described as "popular democracy" during the incredible heyday of the Tito vogue were as tyrannical as is the national regime today. Here, indeed, is the crux of the entire problem. If the Partisan movement really was a popular democratic movement, then there could be no excusing any "accommodations"—no matter how limited—directed against it. But if it was not a "popular democratic" movement but a movement of "intolerable dictatorship," the obvious purpose of which was the establishment of a Soviet regime (the peasants of Yugoslavia, many of whom experienced the Partisan regime on their own backs, understood this much better than did Churchill, Deakin, and Schlesinger), then perhaps the Chetniks were right in playing off one enemy against the other.

5. The business of Partisans killing Germans has been fantastically exaggerated. Mr. Schlesinger, unfortunately, now adduces these fantasies as facts. On their own admission, the bulk of the Partisan effort was directed against the Chetniks. "In actual practice," said Cholakovich, one of Tito's commanders, "more men fell on both sides in that fratricidal struggle . . . than in the struggle against the invader and the Ustashi" ("The Epic of Yugoslavia," page 46). The Partisans killed somewhat more Germans than did the Chetniks, but from the standpoint of the conclusion of the war it was all peanuts. The important consideration, strategically, was not killing Germans but tying down Germans—and with their more passive and infinitely less costly policy of limited activity the Chetniks, by their mere presence and occasional action, tied down as many Germans per square mile in their territory as the Partisans did in theirs.

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 28, 1947

The Shape of Things

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO OF THE LABOR BILL has drawn a sharp issue at a point where it should be drawn. Had political considerations and the knowledge that he would almost certainly be overridden induced him to let the bill pass into law unchallenged, then the direst prophesies of an inevitable reactionary trend would have been fulfilled. He has given American liberalism the fighting chance that it seemed to have lost with the death of Roosevelt. Not only did his action unite all branches of the labor movement as a potentially powerful political force, but his clear-headed analysis of a bad bill was a hopeful sign that the Administration was getting back on the Roosevelt trail. Until now, President Truman, in the interests of a phony conception of national unity, has attempted a working compromise with the reactionary forces of both parties which are in effective control of Congress. The Republicans and Southern Democrats should perhaps be thanked for putting their position so baldly that, this time, compromise was impossible. Now the fight begins, and it will carry on until the votes are counted in '48. What must be remembered is that the battle cannot be won by vetoes. A bad bill has become bad law, and we may expect the consequences the President predicted. But the resultant industrial strife must not distract the labor and liberal movement from the main task before it—the task of sending to Congress in 1948 men who would be incapable of repeating what the nation has witnessed in Washington this last week.

TO THE REPUBLICANS, TAX REDUCTION IS the supreme political issue, and it is not surprising that they are both angered and dismayed by the President's veto of H. R. 1. However, their wrath must have destroyed their sense of logic or they would not, in one breath, denounce Mr. Truman's action as "sheer politics" and claim it will insure their own triumph in 1948. Actually, politics can hardly have been a motive for the veto, since tax cuts are always popular, and in this case, while they would have applied on an inequitable basis, they would also have been widely spread. We believe, therefore, that Mr. Truman deserves credit for both courage and sincerity in challenging Congress on this issue, although we are not prepared wholly to indorse his reasoning. The message accompanying the veto declared that the bill represented "the wrong kind of tax reduction at the wrong time." We agree with the first part of the sentence but are not convinced that this is the wrong time for some reduction in the government's "take" from the national income. Mr. Truman cited figures showing that we are still on the crest of the boom, with the economy still subject to inflationary pressures. But signs indicate that by fall, when tax reduction would begin to have an effect, deflationary forces may be gaining the upper hand. In this event, additional effective purchasing power in the pockets of consumers might prove a useful stabilizing factor. That would require, however, a bill very different from the one just vetoed.

HARD UPON THE GREEK GOVERNMENT'S note to the United States promising the fullest cooperation in carrying out the American-financed $300,000,000 rehabilitation plan came the word that seventeen former E. L. A. S. soldiers had been executed in the Aegina Island fortress. This news should be read as a footnote to the article by Constantine Poulos on another page of this issue. It is significant that these men had been under sentence for two years and that their execution had been stayed by protests from the British Labor Party and fifty members of the British Parliament. But America is far away, its Congress not so sensitive to acts of tyranny this side of the iron curtain. And anyway, is not the Greek government the sagging bulwark of democracy that we are determined to shore up? The Greek government, in its note to us expressing its willingness to have us virtually take over the running of its economy, stressed its determination to compose internal differences. But how this was to be done was clarified in another section of the note: "Aid given for military purposes will be used for the restoration and maintenance of internal order." Nothing could be clearer. Full partnership in the economic reconstruction of Greece involves also full partnership in the policy of a regime which, since "liberation," directed a campaign of terror against all who oppose it. Is this acceptable to the American people? Can we with a straight face and a clear conscience urge an international bill of rights at Lake Success and actively support the violation of the elementary rights of human beings in Athens?

DE GASPERI WON A FORMAL VICTORY BUT AT the price of a moral defeat when, last Saturday, he succeeded in dragging from the Italian Constituent Assembly the dozen votes necessary to continue him in power behind the façade of a representative government. With that vote the "Chancellor," as he is acidly called in Avanti, can hardly pretend to govern in the name of a democratic though anti-Socialist majority. His painfully assembled support is the weakest, shakiest, and most heterogeneous on which he has ever stood. It is formed in part of men who had nothing to do with the Liberation, who at heart are against the Republic, and whom a more severe anti-fascist policy would have sent to the tribunals rather than to Parliament. De Gasperi may remain the hero of the Vatican and of Washington, but during this crisis he has forfeited all genuine republican backing. He has thrown himself definitely into the arms of the right, and it is only the right that can continue to carry him. The double role that De Gasperi once seemed eager to play, of a conservative politician leading a progressive coalition, is now finished. He has failed to bring to his side those moderate elements of the left which he hoped to win by playing them off against Togliatti and Nenni. In the Assembly last Saturday he found the entire left impressively united against him. Although a few abstentions from those benches helped him win his vote of confidence, this is not a precedent on which he can rely. At the first showdown on major policy, those few will follow their parties' line and turn against De Gasperi. Perhaps he will be saved by the single vote of Giannini, the semi-fascist leader of l'Uomo Qualunque. But these favors of chance will not help him achieve his main purpose in clinging to power—to delay the general election and prevent the defeat of his party.

NO LARGER THAN A LADY'S HAND, BUT clearly visible, is the shadow cast by the coming visit of Eva Duarte Perón to the British Isles. An embarrassed Foreign Office, helpless to prevent the invasion, must also give a convincing demonstration of welcome. For Argentina is not only tied to England by old bonds, economic and diplomatic; it is also today as during the war an indispensable source of food for hungry Britons. To refuse a polite reception to Señora Perón would be unthinkable. At the same time the anti-fascist sentiment of the British people is already expressing itself in hearty press attacks both on the lady and on the government's plans for receiving her. The Sunday Pictorial drew an official rebuke when it charged that members of Parliament were concerned because Señora Perón, "the wife of a fascist dictator," would arrive in Britain "fresh from a triumphant reception in Franco's Spain," where she "produced the fascist salute on the slightest pretext." But left-wing rumors indicate that the energetic Eva expects more substantial rewards from Britain than the perfumes, jewels, and honors showered on her in Spain. She intends to make sure that she is cut in, personally, on all the contracts for Argentine products now being made in England. This may be distasteful—as well as expensive—for British business men of old-fashioned habits, but they cannot afford to be squeamish; nor can the government. Eva wants money, and England needs meat; and neither propriety nor democratic sentiment is likely to interfere with the success of her visit.

Human Rights

TO FORMULATE a declaration of human rights in the year 1947 may appear to be a task fit only for philosophers or fools. The nineteenth century, tracing its springs of action to the American, the French, and the Industrial Revolution, found it easy to describe human liberty in terms of a man's freedom from oppression by state, church, or other men. The individualism that expressed itself economically in the ascendant capitalist system was the counterpart of nineteenth-century political liberalism. But today, the rise of socialism, the emergence of new social concepts in economics and government, the recognition of rights that a man may claim as a member of society make a generally acceptable declaration of rights much more difficult. In fact, it would seem virtually impossible to work out a definition that would satisfy an American, an Englishman, a Frenchman, and a Russian. An American may claim the right to free speech, to free association, to freedom of worship. But can he claim the right to work or the right to health or to the means of health? And can a Russian, whose security is bound up in his relations to the state, claim the right of protest against what he may conceive to be the unjust powers of that state?

Back of the discussions in the drafting committee of the Human Rights Commission which has been in session for two weeks, these conflicting concepts of right and liberty lie waiting to assert themselves. A distinguished group of delegates from the United States, Russia, England, Lebanon, France, Chile, China, and Australia has been attempting to formulate not one but two statements. On the initiative of Britain, the delegates have been seriously debating a draft Convention of Human Rights which, once passed by the General Assembly and ratified by member states, would be enforceable as international law. All have agreed that however worthy this attempt—and it is significant that it is being made—the road ahead is a long and hard one. Would the United States, for example, be prepared to accept an international convention against race discrimination? Would the federal government, which has in the past proved helpless in such instances, be prepared to have a lynching in South Carolina branded as an international crime within the jurisdiction of an international court?

The other statement of human rights, while bound to encounter many difficulties, is more modest in its aims. The statement would be in fact a Declaration of Human Rights which, in the words of one delegate, would constitute a "matrix from which subsequent conventions would naturally grow." The basis for such a declaration is to be found in a draft prepared with great care by the secretariat of the United Nations. The advantage of the secretariat draft is that it was written after a careful study of bills of rights written into existing national constitutions. Social rights as well as individual rights are included. Unfortunately, this draft was considered too long and too detailed, and Professor Cassin of France was given the thankless task of "boiling down" the statement into a briefer and more general form. The danger is that in the boiling-down process the meat and the marrow of the original will have been boiled out. Another large pious statement will represent no advance toward binding international law. On the other hand, a firm declaration of rights, passed by the General Assembly, while having no legal force, will be bound to exert a considerable moral influence. Before the delegates come together for the Human Rights Commission meeting in August, it is to be hoped that they will all study seriously the secretariat's document, to see if the subcommittee's work cannot be substantially strengthened.

A Slight Case of Murder

THE House last week gave the coup de grâce to federal public housing. The spot was choice, the blow deft, but the hand that delivered it was the building-and-loan lobby's. Whether housing survives or not is now up to the Senate.

The lobby, which makes it a point to get its member associations to hire Congressmen as its lawyers or officers, first influenced a House investigation into the Federal Public Housing Authority. The findings sound like a dossier by our Puritan fathers, and a few little P-1 clerks may now lose their heads for drinking in public. The "scandal," released at the strategic moment, formed part of the committee recommendations to slice a third off FPHA's administrative budget and double the required contribution of the cities in tax exemption.

But the most serious blow is the reduction from $7,200,000 to $2,200,000 in annual subsidies due to local housing authorities and the requirement that their reserves, which are set up annually to cover future rent losses and repairs, be sliced in half.

This may seem harmless, but maintenance of the reserves and payment by the government of the annual subsidies is part of the bargain with private lenders, who have advanced hundreds of millions to housing authorities at interest rates as little as 1.5 per cent, relying on the government's commitment to fulfil its contract. The housing-authority bond up to now was one of the prime securities in the country. As a result, housing authorities have been able to dispense with the need for huge federal loans and have also reduced the required federal subsidies to a fraction of the original estimate. If the authorities are forced to revert to government borrowing, it is doubtful whether any future Congress will authorize the huge federal loans that would be essential.

One would imagine that the House, in its current mood of economy, would encourage financial savings and protect the formulae responsible for them. Yet strangely, even the faith and credit of our government appears less important to the present Congress than the scuttling of public housing. Not only would the agreement with the lenders be breached and the solvency of the projects menaced, but the marketability of public-housing bonds would be affected for all future issues.

Already Wall Street buzzes with the story that the credit of the United States is now good only if the purpose for which it is pledged is the kind that will be politically palatable to every succeeding Congress. It is hoped that in the Senate the influence of the building-and-loan associations will weigh less than the faith and credit of the United States of America.

Marketing the Plan

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

THE job of explaining the Marshall plan to this country and the world is not going to be an easy one—but it is one of the most vital parts of the whole project. First of all it is necessary to let the peoples of Europe know that the plan is in effect a substitute for, not an extension of, the provocative, clumsy anti-Soviet crusade launched by Mr. Truman in Greece and Turkey. Indeed, that crusade itself will have to be amended in practice if the Marshall plan is to succeed. For the co-operation of Russia and its satellite states is essential to the revival of a healthy economy in Europe, as The Nation pointed out last week. It is also essential to the Continent's political health. Even the Vatican has lately expressed alarm over the effect on Europe of the hardening hostility between the U. S. S. R. and the United States. As Walter Lippmann pointed out in a comment on the Vatican's warning, the European nations want American help but not under conditions that will force them toward an irreparable break with the Soviet Union.

The Continent must be convinced that the Marshall plan is aimed at avoiding such a division by making possible a revival of industry and trade on a world scale.

Mr. Marshall's slightly delayed assurance that Russia was included in the scope of his proposal, followed by the French invitation to Mr. Molotov, has happily resulted in Russia's agreement to join France and Britain in exploring the possibilities of the plan. This is a good start. But it will be necessary, if the usual deadlocks are to be avoided, to make it clear on this side that no conditions will be laid down which would shut out nations whose economic and political methods are socialistic or even revolutionary. This final assurance has not yet been offered, and it is admittedly an awkward one to have to advertise. But how can it be avoided? How can we expect Russia to join in drawing up a plan for the restoration of Europe's economy and refuse to include those states which are imitating—however half-heartedly and partially—Russia's economic system? And how can Europe's economy be restored if a large part of Europe is to be denied the dollars required to reanimate the circulatory system of the Continent as a whole?

Europe knows all this. Even the more conservative governments would today refuse to join a coalition against those on the other side of the almost visible ideological line that runs across Europe and through each country. Their best hope lies in a revival of Continental prosperity—east and west, right and left—and in a gradual resulting amelioration of the hostility between Russia and America. If Mr. Marshall accepts this view, as his Cambridge speech indicated, he must make it amply clear to Europe.

In doing so, he must also make the American people understand why the emphasis has shifted from an anti-Communist crusade to the restoration of Europe. This will be still harder, for the country has been stuffed with the imminent and overpowering threat of communism until a large part of the population reacts only to fear of Russian aggression. It was fear of Russia alone that propelled the Greek-Turkish aid bill through Congress. How is the new plan to be carried out in the face of growing reaction and growing nationalism? How are Congress and the people to be convinced of the necessity of spending American dollars to restore Europe? The one way that will work, I believe, is also the only honest way of stating the case.

For the truth is that the United States cannot afford to let Europe's recovery collapse for lack of dollars. This is a simple fact that should equally impress Robert A. Taft and his most left-wing opponents. Without dollars, the other nations will have to stop buying the equipment on which the revival of their industries and agriculture depends. Without increased output of the products we need, they cannot export enough to America to get dollars in exchange. And until both production and exports mount, they are bound to exhaust the limited dollars now available in buying food to keep their people from going hungry. The problem, viewed from this side, is not primarily a problem of foreign collapse or suffering; it is a problem of America's balance of payments with the world as a whole. The Marshall plan, put simply, is an attempt to reestablish the capacity of the world, starting with our best customers, to buy American goods. Our own economy will slump, our prosperity will disappear almost overnight, if the huge output of American factories, whose capacity to produce—as Mr. Sternberg recalls elsewhere in this issue—increased 50 per cent during the war, cannot find overflow markets outside the United States. In essence, this means that our balance of payments will be restored only if we give away goods, or the dollars required to buy goods. If we fail to do so, a depression will result which would not only produce the dangers and miseries we well remember, but would drag the rest of the world into economic depths from which no Marshall plan could pull it.

This story, told fully and honestly by persons, like those included in President Truman's new committees, whose knowledge is widely respected, should convince most Americans of the need of appropriating the billions necessary for Europe's recovery. It will tend to offset the panic fear of Russia, generated partly by Moscow's own provocative methods, partly by the chauvinist press in America, and partly by the monumental blunder of the Truman Doctrine. It will reassure Europe and relieve it of the horrid burden of American benevolence, for the Marshall plan, in essence, is an expression of long-range, intelligent self-interest, not of charity.

Above all, it will relieve this country of the temptation to proceed unilaterally as we did in Greece and Turkey. A new, Europe-wide, anti-Russian crusade would preclude action through the United Nations; but the Marshall plan, based from the start on a request for European initiative, logically implies full utilization of the agencies and powers of the United Nations. The Economic Commission for Europe, headed by the noted Swedish economist Gunnar Myrdal, has already prepared a preliminary report on Europe's economic needs. With this as a basis, the specifications called for by Mr. Marshall can be rapidly perfected. There must be no question this time of by-passing the world organization.

Can Our Dollars Save Europe?

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Washington, June 22

ONE difference between war and peace is that during war men are hopeful. World War II was still in progress when Harry Truman, on June 26, 1945, welcomed the signing of the United Nations Charter as the birth of the "Parliament of Man." As huzzahs resounded from San Francisco around the globe, most people foresaw the development of "one world" and the maintenance of peace through the United Nations. Now that peace is with us, the enthusiasm is gone. And the world seems to be cracking in two. In these depressing circumstances President Truman and Secretary of State George C. Marshall have made an offer of the use of United States dollars as an adhesive to hold it together. Will the dollars do the job?

The grand purpose of their expenditure is to win Russia from the isolationist ways of Communist imperialism and induce it to support our notions of setting the world in order. If Russia fails to go along in the project, the secondary purpose of the money is to create a Western European bloc without Russia and without the Eastern European states which the United States, by its refusal to understand the political currents in those long-oppressed countries, has worked hard and successfully to push into the Russian lap. General Lucius D. Clay, the American administrator in Berlin, said on June 18 that the rehabilitation of Germany "would fit into Secretary of State Marshall's plan for European recovery to great advantage." Evidently German peacetime factories are to back up the dollar in overcoming the destruction caused by German war factories.

The use of American dollars to restore world stability was first suggested by Under Secretary of State Dean Acheson at Cleveland, Mississippi, on May 8. Secretary Marshall presented the proposal at Harvard on June 5 as a combined American-European reconstruction plan. It is the result of lessons learned painfully by President Truman and Secretary of the Treasury John Snyder and the State Department since Alcide de Gasperi, the Italian Prime Minister, came to Washington looking for money last January and was sent home with a promise of $100,000,000 in Export-Import Bank credits. The credits did not solve his problem. He needed to reconstruct his country, and he was given a chance to buy some goods in America. During the next six months the Administration came to understand that it cannot revive Europe by offering individual countries limited commercial opportunities. The economic problem of Europe is how to become productive itself, not how to enjoy the fruits of American production.

The Administration has learned that the Continent

does not welcome American dollars forced upon it in the determination to save Europe according to a made-in-America financial formula. It has called upon Europe, therefore, to reach an agreement "as to the requirements of the situation and the part those countries themselves will take in order to give proper effect to whatever action might be taken by the American government." The Administration knows, too, that the American public was repelled by the brassy suggestion of a crusade in the Truman Doctrine and by the disclosure that America intended to keep the "free" peoples of Greece and Turkey under the native tyrants then haphazardly oppressing them in order to save them from Russia or from native Communists. It is trying to win over public opinion at home by proposals that seem to offer the hope of a lasting peace.

Most important of all, the Administration has learned that the economic plight of Europe is the result of something besides Russian deviltry. It seems to have been caused by the war. So the situation is subject to improvement without the sound effects of moral diatribes shouted in the direction of Moscow.

Nevertheless, a man in the inner circles of the State Department laughed when I asked him if the Marshall proposal was a departure from the Truman Doctrine. He said no, and he was right, so far as the ultimate purpose of both is concerned. Both were conceived as a way to stop Russia without war. That is the all-consuming passion in the State, War, and Navy departments.

To strengthen the government for the capitalist struggle against communism, Marshall is bringing in two Wall Street men as his top assistants; Robert Lovett is to become Under Secretary of State on July 1, and Charles E. Salzman, vice-president of the Stock Exchange, was nominated yesterday to be Assistant Secretary of State in charge of occupation affairs (German, Austrian, Japanese, and Korean).

The Soviet government's acceptance of the invitation of Bevin and Bidault to join in a conference to discuss how the American dollars can best be spent may mark the beginning, not of a new peaceful relationship between the two intransigent Brobdingnagians but of a new phase of their struggle. All Europe, not merely the eastern or the western portion, may now be the prize. If Europe, including Russia, agrees on a plan for utilizing American aid, the United States will be able to circulate freely in Danubia, but at the same time Russia will have an opportunity to spread its benefits through the countries fringing the Bay of Biscay and the North Sea.

Europe's attitude toward the Marshall proposal must be judged by the slowly gathering public reaction rather than by the exchanges between Bevin and Bidault at their spectacular Paris meeting. Already we know that the United States does not appear to all people abroad, even in neighboring Canada, as the gentle lamb described by our statesmen. The proposal to arm Perón, the use of Canada as our Arctic shield, the continued manufacture of atomic bombs, the backing we give the reactionaries who govern Rome—these things puzzle foreigners who have heard that we believe in full freedom for all nations to deal with others, and with ourselves, as they will, provided it is honorably.

The first reaction of the Russians to Marshall's proposal of American aid showed how the seeds of distrust have grown since the Yalta conference, the high-water mark in Russian-American relations. Russia may be won over, but it will not be gulled. "The former political meaning of the United States policy of help remains unchanged," Leontyev wrote in Pravda on June 16. In England and France the moderate papers, the Observer and the Times, Libération and L'Aube, approved the offer of aid. Italian Foreign Minister Sforza called it "one of the most noble attempts to save peace." Not all non-Communists in Europe agreed with him. The Socialist radio in the Netherlands broadcast: "The tragedy of the European situation is that in many cases, though not in all, American aid will be accepted by governments which certainly do not have the well-being of the masses of the people at heart."

The Netherlands government, jointly with Belgium and Luxembourg, sent Marshall a note accepting his suggestion in principle. The three countries dispatched the message on the eve of their merger in a tariff union, a step toward European unity which, if extended across the whole Continent, might accelerate though it could not assure its restoration. The simultaneous formation of an economic union in Eastern Europe has increased American suspicion of Russia, just as Marshall's recent statement that he favored a United States of Europe struck Russia as menacing. The tragedy of the world is that the two great countries can see no good in each other.

The success or failure of the Marshall proposal will not be determined by the attitude of Russia. It depends primarily on the United States. It draws together all the issues of the time. It affects employment and prosperity. If Europe cut down to $8,000,000,000 the $16,000,000,000 worth of goods it now buys every year, factories would close, jobs would be lost. President Truman could not sign the tax bill when he contemplated sending $24,000,000,000 abroad in the next four years. He could not sign a labor bill which would imperil our industrial stability and prevent us from turning out the goods Europe must have. The proposal goes to the heart of the issue between Truman and the Republicans—economy.

Will the penny-pinching Eightieth Congress agree to send $24,000,000,000 across the ocean? It might, if the consequences of a drop in exports were dramatized for it. Yet there is strong evidence that a new isolationism is arising to combat the Administration on this issue. The United States is becoming fearful of exporting. The cry, "We are throwing away our substance," was raised here during the war in an effort to hold to a minimum the movement of lend-lease goods abroad, especially to Russia. Bernard Baruch made the same protest a little over a year ago. In opposing the $3,750,000,000 loan to Britain, he said that the United States should take an inventory of its resources before it sent any more out of the country. Now this miser's chant has been repeated by Herbert Hoover, who told Senator Bridges of New Hampshire that we are exporting more than we can afford. Senator Byrd, the perennial economizer from Virginia, has joined this export-and-die crowd.

The Administration itself stiffened objections to further aid for foreign nations when it encouraged the belief not long ago that the need for big spending abroad was over. Clayton helped along the revolt by his acquiescence in the abrupt cutting off of lend-lease at the close of the war with Japan, and by his vulgar statement last summer that the "grave train" was going around for the last time—meaning the United States would give help through UNRRA for just one more year. Truman could have prepared the country and Congress for the dollar-aid proposal by dealing with it in his budget message last January, but he did not say a word. The truth is that the Administration is just awakening to the significance of Europe's economic problems. It did not understand it in January. Last year's foreign policy, based on economic optimism and political pessimism, has given way to pessimism all around.

Can our dollars save Europe if Congress says yes?

Meet Our Greek Allies

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

Athens, May 29

SO GREECE, still bearing the heavy imprint of the Ottoman Empire, is now an outpost of the West, a bulwark against Slavism and communism, almost a forty-ninth state.

We might as well face it. Let's not cloud the issue with a lot of talk about democracy, free institutions, free nations, and human values. We are out to stop communism because it threatens the American system; we think Greece is the place to start; and we will use whatever methods are necessary, just as the others do, only better and more refined.

Possibly some of the Americans who come to Greece for the first time as members of the American mission won't understand the hypocrisy, arrogance, deceit, and corruption which are the Greek government and the Greek ruling class today. The American embassy will cushion the shock. Dispassionately, patiently, it will brief the newcomers on the "complexities" of the situation. As a precautionary measure, too, the embassy will place some of its own people ("who, after all, know the situation inside out") in the new mission as "special assistants" and "liaison officers"; just as it did with the mission to observe the elections last year and the United Nations Commission of Inquiry this year.

In any case the Americans on the new mission will receive a warm welcome from the nice people, the people who will flatter them in faultless English and say, as one Royalist paper said recently, "It is our great fortune that in this struggle against the left we shall have on our side the most courageous, the richest, and the most decisive power in the world."

The Greeks in power today are good at this sort of thing. They have been doing it with the Germans and British ever since 1915.

On May 6, 1941, nine days after the Germans occupied Athens, Spyros Melas, writing in the newspaper Kathimerini, attacked those who "still felt a nostalgia for a liberal economy and for the liberal prattle of plutocratic democracies." "We must digest the fact," he said, "that the idyllic system of economic anarchy, of super-individualism, of greed, of wealth without bounds, of egotistic waste of life's riches, of monstrous inequalities and unrestrained exploitation belongs to the past, and it shall never return. We must resolutely sweep out the old molds. Revolt against the liberal plutocratic world!"

On March 4, 1947, the day Secretary Marshall confirmed the reports that the United States was moving into Greece, the same writer said in the Athens newspaper Embros that America was "now presenting itself at its proper post, as a Great and True Free Democracy, whose role is to stand as a guarantor of the existence and freedom of peoples. The Greek people believe in the great civilizing mission of America." Melas ended by attacking those "who dare to criticize the supporters of the freedom of the world."

This sort of thing, if they become aware of it, should not upset innocent Americans who come to Greece. They will have to get used to dealing with the people who dealt with the Nazis. Besides, there are too many things in Greece that may upset them. If, for example, they see a photograph such as was published in one of the Royalist papers on April 10, showing seven decapitated heads neatly arranged in a triangle on the ground, they may shudder. But unless someone translates the small items from the newspapers for them, they will not learn about the heads of five boys between the ages of fifteen and twenty which were displayed in front of the gendarmerie station in Sparta as a warning to others who might be thinking of going to the mountains.

Yet the Greek government under our pressure will certainly make some new farcical amnesty offer to the guerrillas, and the American embassy will explain to the neophytes: "You see, the government is acting in good faith. We cannot understand why the bandits don't come down out of the mountains. Of course, most of them would if they could, but their fanatical Communist leaders won't let them."

There are lots of interesting little items in the newspapers that help one to understand what is going on in Greece today, but they are easy to miss, and "besides, there's so much more to the story," as the American embassy explains whenever anyone refers to them. For instance, it was reported in the newspapers on March 26 that Miltiades Bambakas was arrested on a street in Athens. At the police station he was beaten to death. No action was taken by the government. The newspapers didn't mention it again.

Demetrios Androvitsaneas, a sixty-two-year-old veteran of the Balkan wars and a member of the 7th Regiment of E. L. A. S. on the island of Euboea during the occupation, was being treated for advanced tuberculosis in an Athens hospital. Last month they caught up with him. They told him the hospital didn't have room for "traitors" and "Slavo-Communists" and put him out. He died a few days later.

Estia, the newspaper of the big industrialists—the liberal papers have been calling it "the fascist widow" ever since Mussolini's death—recently unburdened itself. "It's a good thing that the Jewish-Communist organization UNRRA is concluding its activities in Greece, for UNRRA thought it could remain neutral in our struggle and give food, clothing, and medical assistance to everyone, regardless of their politics." Now Estia is attacking the Greek War Relief Association of America for having the same incomprehensible attitude about relief.

"The Security Battalions," formed by the Germans with the help of the last Greek quisling government to fight the resistance forces, "are considered instruments of the enemy," declared a statement signed in Italy on September 26, 1944, by General H. Maitland Wilson, Supreme Allied Commander in the Mediterranean Theater, and by Harold H. Macmillan, British Resident Minister. On April 16, 1947, the Athens daily Ethnikos Kirix said in an editorial that "the successful organization and arming of the Security Battalions during the occupation was a stupendous accomplishment on the part of Rallis and his coworkers." Rallis was the quisling Prime Minister.

One minor collaborator was executed on December 4, 1944, as a gesture which it was thought might halt the revolt then beginning. The second collaborator to be executed since the liberation of Greece was shot three days after President Truman unveiled his famous doctrine.

"There is freedom of the press, isn't there?" "Why, sure, just look at the leftist papers published here in Athens." But let the American members of the new mission try to buy a leftist newspaper in any city except Athens and Salonika, in Levadia, Lamia, Larissa, Trikala, or Volos, or even a centrist paper in Sparta or Preveza. Since last July the E. A. M. paper in Salonika has been suppressed three times and the Communist Party organ five times. Each suppression has meant court decisions against the editors and printers, with one man sentenced to five years' imprisonment, two to seven years, one to fourteen and one-half years, one to twenty years, one to fifty-two and one-half years, and three given life. (The data on sentences were obtained from the Information Department of the British embassy in Athens.)

Of course, there is another way of taking care of the press. On March 30 three armed men entered the printing plant of the Communist paper in Salonika, fired at the workers with tommy-guns, and then threw a grenade as they withdrew. Three printers were killed and seven wounded. The gendarmes guarding the plant "happened to be away from their posts," the government explained. No one has been arrested yet. (Fifty-five leftist papers have been closed down by official suppression, terrorism, or destruction of the printing plants by rightist mobs and security authorities since the present government came to power in April last year.)

One more story to fill in the picture. First Lieutenant Panayiotis Katsareas, a Greek army reserve officer, joined the Security Battalions and fought with the Germans against the guerrillas during the occupation. After the resistance movement disbanded and laid down its arms, Katsareas was made a regular army officer with the rank of captain and took up the struggle against the unarmed members of the resistance.

With a band of his own although he was on the government pay roll, he roamed the Sparta area killing men, women, and children. From August 1 last year to October 10 he killed at least fifty-eight persons, thirty-five of them on one day in the little mountain village of Bam-bakou in Laconia. The government in Athens issued statements "denouncing him" and "ordered his arrest." But Katsareas knew they were not serious. He sat calmly in Sparta visiting with his friends in the gendarmerie and the army, attended public functions in the company of federal and provincial authorities, and made speeches on holidays.

The resurrection of the guerrilla movement cramped his style, however, and he didn't go very far up the mountains. One day last March he strayed a bit too far from Sparta and in a battle with the guerrillas was killed.

The next day, March 21, the military commander of Laconia, Major George Kourkoulis, addressed a letter to Katsareas's men in which he said: "You must not cry for your unforgettable leader. He did not die. He is with you and with us. . . . Inspired by the example of this heroic figure, go forward with us to the great victory. . . . Vengeance on the cowardly murderers!"

That day Katsareas's men entered the town of Gytheion, dragged thirty-two political prisoners out of the local jail, and executed them in the public square. Major Kourkoulis's statement was published in the Sparta newspaper Ethniki Phoni two days later, and in the next few days Katsareas's band killed thirty-two more people in villages near Sparta.

Three ministers rushed to the Peloponnesus from Athens—by sea. No one was arrested. No one was punished. The Minister of Public Order, Napoleon Zervas, informed the government from Sparta of his decision not to remove Major Kourkoulis from his post. Returning to Athens, the Ministers of War and Interior explained that the massacre of the political prisoners was a "natural rising of the nationalist populace."

The Royalist press in Athens ho-hummed and noted that since most of the men in the prison were under sentence of death anyway, it did not really matter very much, and one paper even recommended that political prisoners held in other jails should be transferred to Gytheion. (British sources estimate that there are 11,000 political prisoners in Greek prisons today.)

Still no one has been arrested or punished. And all this happened while the House and Senate were considering President Truman's request for aid to the government of Greece.

It is a miserable situation we are inheriting, full of hatred, cruelty, bitterness, and iniquity. But let's not kid ourselves on this point, either. We are not likely to bring about many fundamental changes. The Greeks in power will use us for all we are worth. We think we are doing them a favor; they know they are doing us a bigger one. They'll take the dollars, they'll make some revisions in their economic and political policies to please us, and sooner or later they'll ask for more money. Even $250,000,000 won't go far toward winning a civil war and rebuilding a shattered and looted economy. That will take more millions, and "stronger" methods.

The 250 Industrial Giants

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

NOW that American credit and American production are to be geared to the economic needs of the war-damaged nations of Europe in an effort to avert the progressive disintegration of the political and economic life of the Continent, it becomes more than ever necessary to examine the structure of the system on which this whole enterprise depends. We know that the productive capacity of the United States outstrips that of the other nations of the world put together. We know the dollar is the currency on which all others, even the pound sterling, are based. What remains is to see clearly how the controls of the American system are operated, to identify the groups and individuals that have in their hands the economic levers. For under our free-enterprise theory, however modified in practice, the people who dominate American business are also, to a large extent, the economic dictators of the world.

Today the amazing fact is that 250 leading corporations in the United States produce a volume of goods equal to that of the rest of the capitalist world, including the residual industry of this country. This state of affairs is the result of two lines of development which began long before the recent war.

The first is the steady growth of America's share in total world production. Throughout the last hundred years American output has increased faster than that of the rest of the world. Britain, whose production in 1850 equaled the combined totals of all other countries, was outstripped by the United States as early as 1880. After that date the United States not only had the lead but steadily increased the margin between itself and the other industrial powers. America's share of production at the outbreak of World War I was a little more than one-third of the world total. Nothing more clearly indicates the declining importance of Europe and the growing preponderance of the American role.

In 1913 Europe accounted for 53 per cent of world production, but by 1919 and 1920 this had sunk to 41 per cent. The goods turned out in the United States in 1928 actually exceeded in volume those produced by the whole of Europe. In that year, the last before the great economic crisis, the relative contributions to world production of the major industrial countries were: the United States, 40 per cent; Germany, 12 per cent; Great Britain, 9 per cent; France, 7 per cent. This country was already producing 60 per cent more goods than the three next largest industrial nations combined.

But the effect of World War II on the balance of economic power was even more sensational. During and since the war American productive capacity has enormously increased; so that in the present year it is approximately 50 per cent greater than it was before 1939. What is even more important than the rise itself is, of course, the fact that it has occurred in an epoch during which the rest of the world has experienced a sharp decline. Physical destruction and the depletion of resources and capital have increased the disparity which America's huge war production would in any case have created. Years will elapse before the Soviet Union can reach even its pre-war levels of output, and Germany will not regain its pre-war productivity in any near future no matter what policy the occupying authorities adopt. In varying degrees this holds true for most of the other countries directly involved in the war. The result is that, on a conservative estimate, the United States is now producing 60 per cent of the entire output of the world, including Russia.

At no time during the last hundred years has any single state achieved such economic preeminence. Nor is American superiority only a question of manufactured goods, for industrial growth has naturally been accompanied by a huge expansion of financial power. Before the First World War the big capital-exporting countries were England, Germany, and France. Britain alone possessed as great a volume of capital invested abroad as the rest of the world combined. Germany became a debtor country as a result of the war of 1914-19, while France not only lost the greater part of its foreign investments but found itself unable to continue to make loans to other countries. In the decade between the two wars only Britain among the European nations continued to export any considerable amount of capital.

It was in the ten years following Versailles that the United States appeared on the scene as a major exporter of capital. "From 1919 through 1929 foreign loans floated in the United States provided some $7,500,000,000 of new capital to other countries," says a Department of Commerce bulletin published in 1943, "or more than the total of similar issues floated in the United Kingdom, France, the Netherlands, and all other capital-lending countries combined." Since World War II, of course, Britain has joined the debtor countries, and American superiority in the financial field is unchallenged. Today the United States possesses not only the most powerful of all productive systems but also a monopoly of money power.

This establishment of world dominance has been accompanied by a rapid tightening of industrial power within the United States. The development was summarized in a recent Senate report on "Economic Concentration in World War II" in these words:

Closely paralleling the rise in importance of corporations was the increasing sphere of activities controlled by a relatively small number of corporate units. Thus the 200 largest non-financial corporations increased their relative importance from ownership of one-third of the assets in 1909, to 48 per cent in 1929, and to 59 per cent in the early thirties. The sharp upward sweep in the twenty years before the crash of 1929 is confirmed by another series [of figures] showing that the percentage of the total net income of all non-financial corporations (income corporations only) earned by the 20 largest . . . increased from 33 per cent in 1920 to 43 per cent in 1929.

Developments during the last years of peace and the first part of the Second World War are described in the Senate report as follows:

For the period 1931 to 1942 data are available indicating the percentage of total manufacturing assets held by corporations possessing more than $50,000,000 in assets. This group of corporations represents the giants of industry and may be used broadly to measure the trend in concentration up to recent times. In 1942 there were 205 such giant manufacturing corporations. This group of manufacturing corporations, after declining in importance from ownership of 46 per cent of the total in 1931 to 37 per cent in 1934, rose sharply to the point of ownership of 49 per cent of all the corporate manufacturing assets in 1942.

The power concentrated in the big corporations became even greater during the war than in the preceding decades. The value of the nation's present facilities for production can be estimated by adding to the $40,000,000,000 of gross capital assets of the year 1939 the $20,000,000,000 worth of new war-time plants that are available for peace-time use. Who owns this vast, highly equipped productive system? How much of it is controlled by big business and how much is held by smaller firms?

The answer to these questions is to be found in the holdings of the 250 largest manufacturing corporations, 31 of which are controlled by 5 financial groups. These corporations are, for the most part, the traditional giants of American industry. In 1939 they owned 65 per cent of the nation's fixed capital. During the war they operated 79 per cent of all new plant facilities built with federal funds, and in September, 1944, held 78 per cent of the primary war-supply contracts. Possessing nearly $30,000,000,000 of capital assets in 1939, they have added $3,700,000,000 in privately financed new facilities and have operated additional plants accounting for nearly $9,000,000,000 of the $11,500,000,000 war-time facilities estimated to be usable for peace-time production. If these industrial giants finally acquire the plants on which they have purchase options, their holdings will come to $38,500,000,000, or 66.5 per cent of total usable facilities in America.

Even today these 250 huge corporations control two-thirds of American industry. They are able to produce as much as the whole American economy before the war, when the United States produced almost half of the world's goods. Today with European industry hampered by lack of material, plant, and buying power and by the destruction of capital values, the 250 American giants can produce as much as the rest of world industry within and outside of the United States. This is an economic fact to be pondered by the nations of Europe as they prepare to qualify for American help under the Marshall plan.

Perón's Expanding Empire

BY ALBERT C. HICKS

THROUGHOUT its 122 years as an independent nation Bolivia, landlocked Andean republic, has dangled as a tempting prize before a succession of Latin American caudillos thirsting for power and riches. In the nineteenth century they coveted its silver and gold. During the twentieth it has offered tin and oil and the potential wealth of its vast unworked mineral deposits.

Always a weak nation despite its natural resources, Bolivia has never relied upon its own military power to protect itself against its neighbors. The four biggest countries of South America lie adjacent: Argentina, Chile, Brazil, and Peru. But in the event of a threat by any one of these, the other giants would combine to check the aggressor. For the nation that gets control of Bolivia's natural wealth can dominate the continent.

This fact lies behind many of the political maneuvers of Juan Domingo Perón, chief of the Argentine state. Prevented from using force against Bolivia, Perón has taken a more devious but very effective course.

After the Bolivian revolution of July, 1946, the Revolutionary Junta produced documentary proof that the fallen dictatorship of Gualberto Villarroel had been in league with Perón and had planned to make Bolivia a vassal state of Argentina. With his friends the militarists out of power and the interim government opposed to his schemes, Perón could only hope for a counter-revolution. Four major efforts to bring one about were made before February, 1947, and although all were abortive, they served to shake the structure of the struggling democracy.

As soon as the interim democratic government was set up under Judge Tomás Monje Gutierrez, Peronista newspapers in Buenos Aires loosed a barrage of vituperation at Monje and his ministers. Two months later a former Bolivian army officer made an attempt on Monje's life, and a mob of revolutionaries, suspecting a militarist coup, hanged the would-be assassin and two of Villarroel's former henchmen. Perón at once had his Congress condemn the La Paz government, charging that it had instigated the mob action.

When Bolivians went to the polls to choose a constitutional President in January, 1947, the elections were declared entirely free and democratic by all objective observers. Perón's newspapers, however, screamed that they were a fraud. Before the results were made official, Bolivian counter-revolutionaries told Aymará Indians in the Lake Titicaca region that the La Paz government planned to massacre them and confiscate their lands. They then passed out arms and ammunition to the Indians and the expected uprising occurred. After it had been put down there was an investigation into the source of the arms, since it was known that Bolivian militarists had not been allowed to retain any after the revolution. Whatever facts were uncovered, they were not made public. If the trail led to Perón, the Bolivian government could hardly have been expected to reveal it.

Perón's strongest weapon was starvation. He forbade all shipments of foodstuffs, including livestock and packed meats, from Argentina to Bolivia. While the order was put in force immediately after the revolution, the Bolivians did not feel the results of it at once. But by December it was apparent that they faced a serious shortage of food. The interim government appealed to the United States for help. Washington rejected the plea on the ground that commitments for food deliveries elsewhere precluded further exports. This left Bolivia almost wholly dependent upon Perón. Surrender to his demands was inevitable if Washington persisted in refusing aid.

Unfortunately Washington also refused to pay the price Bolivia sought for the tin of the independent companies headed by Mauricio Hochschild. Great Britain has long contracted for the total output of the Simon Patiño mines. In 1942 the United States government signed a contract for the 17,000-ton yearly output of the independents. The contract ran out this year, and Hochschild, acting for the independents, negotiated with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for its renewal with a rise in price from 69 cents a pound to 76 cents. The mining companies, backed by the Bolivian government, which depends upon the exportation of tin for revenue, argued that the seven-cent rise was in line with the soaring prices of all minerals. The RFC offered to pay first 72, then 73, then 74 cents, but the Bolivian government stood firm on its demand for 76 cents, maintaining that increased production costs made mining tin unprofitable unless this price could be obtained.

Left begging for a tin market, running out of food, torn by internal strife, its democracy tottering, Bolivia was ripe for Perón's plucking by the time Enrique Hertzog, elected President in January, took office in March. A trade mission from Buenos Aires headed by a special ambassador had spent February in La Paz furthering Perón's plans with a lavish display of generosity—it offered to pay 76 cents for the entire tin output of the independents, to provide a loan of $65,500,000, and to resume the movement of foodstuffs into Bolivia. Perón's reward was to be Bolivia's economic dependence upon Argentina, which in a very short time must lead to political dependence. Most of the funds involved in the agreement were to be used for industrial and transportation projects greatly needed in undeveloped Bolivia. These projects, however, were to be managed by a joint commission dominated by Perón's appointees.

President Hertzog's first major act was to sign this trade treaty. One of its provisions bound Bolivia to ship Argentina 8,000 tons of the independents' 17,000 tons of exportable tin in 1947. The tin started moving immediately, the first shipment being made in March, whereupon the RFC belatedly rushed in with an offer of 76 cents and salvaged 9,000 tons of the 17,000 tons.

Having obtained the treaty with Bolivia, Perón announced to the Argentine Congress that the time had come to modernize the army. "Our pacifist tradition of respect for all peoples is not sufficient," he said. "A minimum of foresight is necessary in the midst of an armed world." The army, he declared, would be the guardian of the republic and contribute "to the defense of the southern part of the American continent." These utterances were intended not only to intimidate his neighbors but to remind Washington that in the event of another world war the Argentina of Perón, proud possessor of a modernized army and with Bolivia's mineral resources at its disposal, would be a force worthy of respect.

Blueprints for a pan-American military alliance have long been under consideration in Washington. Spruille Braden has opposed such an alliance. Even before he became Secretary of State, General Marshall was considered one of its leading advocates. Perón wants it because then the United States would send him more arms and ammunition.

In his bigger-and-better army speech Perón spoke of his industrial-socialization program, which would enable the nation to produce "armaments and materials of war." For advocates of the pan-American military alliance in the United States these were reassuring words. For Bolivia and other neighboring countries they evoked the image of a bully flexing his muscles. With Argentina in control of Bolivia's minerals and receiving arms from the United States, Brazil, the only South American nation now powerful enough to stand up to Perón, will find itself virtually impotent. Of course if a military alliance of all the Americas is formed, Brazil will also receive material aid from the United States. But Perón is now in a position to build a great, aggressive war machine.

As a formidable military power Argentina would become the Latin American pivot of a pan-American military-defense program. The United States would then be obliged to rely on Perón's integrity and respect for democracy. But alliance or no alliance, Perón's record indicates that he will fight on whichever side will best serve his interests.

The Chinese Students

BY JEAN LYON

Peiping, China, May 23

A MIXED sense of impending tragedy and of history in the making pervades university circles here this week. Nearly five thousand students paraded through Peiping's main streets three days ago in spite of a proclamation by Chiang Kai-shek and an emergency measure adopted by the State Council which suggested, although there was no definite prohibition, that student demonstrations were not welcomed by the government authorities. Other thousands of students in Nanking, Shanghai, Tientsin, and more remote university centers also held demonstrations. Reports of clashes between students and police or between students and unidentified persons are still coming in, and several reported deaths have heightened the tension.

Martial law was invoked in Peiping last night. The garrison commander has stated that in the future parades will be forbidden. University authorities, fearful of more violence and bloodshed, are trying to persuade the students that their job is in the classroom and not on the soapbox.

But the students have certainly found their tongues and the courage to use them. How significant their movement becomes may in part depend upon how far the government means to go in controlling or suppressing them. They seem in the mood this week to defy any attempt to stop them. "We have a new constitution which guarantees us freedom of speech," one of the student leaders remarked on the day of the parade. Some observers think this movement may prove to be of as great historical importance as the student protest against China's acceptance of Japan's Twenty-One Demands after the First World War.

But the political atmosphere in China at present is such that no one seems quite certain how spontaneous, how unified, or how genuine the movement is. Many persons, particularly those in government circles, insist that the strikes were incited by Communist agitators within the universities. The Generalissimo outlined this view in his statement to the nation on the evening of May 18, after several students had been hurt in a fracas in Peiping with the 208th Division of the Youth Army, and at the moment when student strikes were threatening to become widespread. Some of the students and a good many acute political observers believe that the agitation was first instigated by a clique within the Kuomintang to discredit the group which now dominates the newly reorganized government. It is thought that as the demonstrations became widespread, the agitation snowballed, and its instigators lost control. A third theory is that the students may have a few independent ideas of their own, and that the movement is largely honest student reaction to conditions in the country.

It is indisputable that the students live on a subnormal diet in their college dining-rooms. Only those with funds from home for supplementary food and those who can qualify for the limited supplies of bean milk and the like supplied by international relief organizations can hope to keep their energy and health up to the standard necessary to handle their work. The incidence of such diseases as tuberculosis is startlingly high. Moreover, throughout the war period and in their trek back east last summer, the students have seen more of the country and of the conditions prevailing in vast areas of it than any other student generation in all China's history. It is not strange, therefore, that in their demonstration at Peiping they had two slogans: The people of China must not starve; the civil war must stop. With irrefutable logic they maintain that the nation's economy has been distorted by the heavy costs of civil war, and that until the civil war ends the people will not have enough to eat. They have carried their protest far beyond their own personal needs.

The demonstration was impressive. The students marched for five hours through the city streets. By the end of the afternoon their black hair was grayed by the dust. Hundreds of them ran beside the marchers doing special jobs along the sidewalks and up the alleys. Some plastered posters on city gates and garden walls. Some talked with the shopkeepers and coolies, housewives and peddlers, who lined the streets. Girl students in blue denim overalls and boys in faded khaki trousers carried buckets of tar and wrote large black-lettered slogans on whitewashed walls and paving stones. Their hands were black and their earnest faces smudged and perspiring. Among the paraders were perhaps a hundred air-force and army veterans in uniform, a number with service stripes from Burma campaigns—all now college students.

Behind the demonstration, at least apparently, was an orderly representative body of thirty students in Peiping from eleven different institutions. Strike headquarters were in a large classroom building on the Pei-ta (Peiping National University) campus. Only two important colleges in the city stayed out of the joint strike and parade—the Catholic college and China College. On the strike committee were the presidents and officers of the regular student associations, which one student explained "are organized very much like your American government. We have a congress and an executive body." Student associations and student assemblies representing the entire student-bodies voted on the strike action. Tactics were heatedly discussed. One of the arguments was about whether telegrams urging the end of civil war should be sent to the Communists as well as to the National Government. Peiyang University students did send a wire to the Communists. In other universities the argument prevailed that since they were not in Communist territory messages would have little effect.

Money for the printing of fliers and for the paper of the hand-made posters was raised in the lobby of strike headquarters. Students who went in and out of the building dropped their money in cardboard boxes.

Some forty professors and lecturers at Pei-ta came out with open expressions of sympathy for the students. Dr. Hu Shih, Pei-ta's president, although he had previously urged the students not to take so much time off from their studies, allowed them to quote him on May 19 as being sympathetic, and contented himself with urging them to keep their demonstration orderly and controlled.

It would be difficult for anyone not to subscribe to the two major protests made by the students—against starvation and rising prices, and against the civil war. One hears the same protests from almost everyone in China, whether he is a government representative or a roadside huckster. In voicing them, the students are only saying publicly what millions feel. Neither protest in its simplified form can be called the exclusive property of any one political party or group within a party.

Although the students offer no solution for China's problems, they may, if their actions win widespread sympathy among the people, exert effective pressure upon the government to make it seek and find a solution. Whether or not the students will gain great popular support remains to be seen. It depends partly on the methods the government adopts to handle the increasing unrest among them. And it depends partly on the students themselves—on whether they are being used as political puppets or are actually developing a genuine, unified student movement.

Bigotry in B-Flat

HOW THE BERKSHIRES FACE THE MUSIC

BY HORACE SUTTON

Pittsfield, Massachusetts, June 19

PRECISELY at 3:30 p. m., Sunday, July 13, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will rap his baton on a music stand at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, and leading the orchestra in an all-Bach program formally open the 1947 Berkshire Music Festival. Before the series ends four weeks later at least a hundred thousand people will have poured into the village to hear the concerts, operas, and chorales. They will jam Tanglewood's Finnish-designed, $80,000 Music Shed, spill over on to its green lawns, lie under its birches, evergreens, and pines. On Saturday afternoons the crowds will come with their picnic baskets and pay a dollar to listen to the Boston Symphony in rehearsal. On Sunday mornings they will stretch out in the sun and watch the waters of Stockbridge Bowl ripple in the summer wind.

When these music lovers seek a place to lay their heads at nightfall, the story will become less melodious than malodorous. According to Haydn Mason, director of public relations of the Berkshire Hills Conference, the annual music festivals at Tanglewood aggravate a Berkshire sore point into what the county now considers a very important problem. Of the forty-three hotels and inns which the conference lists in its 1947 vacation guide Mr. Mason estimates that 50 per cent will not welcome Jews. At least one is militant on the subject.

"Actually we would have a problem here anyway because of our proximity to New York," says Mr. Mason, "but the Jewish people are artistic as a race, and the festival has amplified our predicament. I would say that 98 per cent of our inns would have no objection if Jews would conduct themselves according to ordinary standards, but they don't. Here's what happens. A car pulls up full of boisterous people. If they turn out to be Irish—o. k. If they're Italian—o. k. If they're Americans, nobody says anything. But if they're Jews, thumbs down."

As the official information center for the Berkshires, Mr. Mason's office gets some 15,000 inquiries about accommodations each year. The letters are opened and placed in a huge cardboard bin. Regardless of the type of name, Mason says, each applicant is sent a copy of the Berkshire Hills Vacation Guide, which lists the hotels, and another pamphlet which lists guest houses. Neither mentions clientèle restrictions. The prospective Berkshire vacationist then makes a selection and writes to one of the hotels. Mason says that half the hotels listed write back, "Please be advised we only cater to . . ." or "We only welcome. . . ." The guest houses, he indicated, are not so strict since they do not serve food, and Jews do not have as much opportunity to mingle with other guests.

During the 1946 summer season the festival and its related activities drew an estimated 160,000 persons to the Berkshires. Of this number Mason estimates that only one-half could be accommodated with the type of service and facilities the county would have liked to provide. Some 10,000 rooms in the county, Mason's office figures, brought a total return to the area of $100,000 a day. With perhaps an even larger crowd coming this year, some festival ticket-holders will be sleeping as far away as Danbury, Connecticut, sixty-two miles to the south.

The smart Jew who is aware of the local attitude, Mason says, does not even attempt to find a place in Berkshire County. He goes to a hotel in Albany, or he takes a room at a tourist house on the road before he gets to the Berkshires. There are 117 tourist houses, cabins, and small hotels between Danbury and Tanglewood, according to Mason's tally. "Other Jews," he says, "may sleep in their cars."

From Albany to Tanglewood is a thirty-seven-mile trip, but Mason explains that "it's only ten miles to Lebanon Valley, which is lined with guest houses." Copake Falls, New York, is "90 per cent Jewish, just like the Catskills." And Canaan, Connecticut, just over the state border, he says, is "wide open for them."

The Berkshire Hills Conference, which functions like a local chamber of commerce, is supported by a taxpayers' appropriation and by voluntary contributions. Although it is denied officially, apparently some strain exists between the conference, an old, established agency which aims to promote the whole Berkshire region over an eight-month period, and the infant music festival, which though it lasts only a month overshadows all other community activities. Mason quotes a townsman as saying last year, "I wouldn't give a dime to the Berkshire Hills Conference; look at all the Jews it has brought to the county." "We didn't bring them," Mason explains privately, "it's the music festival that brought them. But don't get me wrong. Some of our best families in Pittsfield are Jewish."

The Berkshire Hills Conference, which has two Jewish members, has gone on record against racial discrimination. They say that if any anti-Semitism exists in the area, they have not fostered or supported it. They agree that "some resort hotels in the county pursue a restricted-clientèle policy," but they make it plain that such an attitude "does not represent the policy of the Berkshire Hills Conference." Pittsfield journalists believe that local anti-Semitism stems mainly from the types of dress affected by the counselors and children from nearby Jewish camps and from the public's behavior at the festival rather than from "names and faces." A scorching letter was printed last year in the Berkshire Eagle berating visitors for sun-bathing and indecent dressing. With this exception the Eagle has given complete support to the festival.

Though Pittsfield elders have clearly rejected anti-Semitism, Jewish visitors to the Berkshires this year may expect a chilly welcome. A few weeks ago a man and his ill wife arrived at a New England hotel which they found to be run down and dilapidated. Hearing of another place where he thought his wife might be more comfortable, the man called and explained his predicament. The rest of the conversation went like this:

"Yes, we have a double room."

"Oh, that's fine."

"Are you a Christian?"

"No, I'm not."

"Well, then I don't think you'd be very comfortable here."

Tanglewood is near Lenox, Massachusetts. There is parking space on the grounds for 4,000 cars. The New Haven Railroad furnishes limited train service from New York to Great Barrington, Stockbridge, Lee, Lenox, and Pittsfield. The New York Central and the Boston and Albany also run to Pittsfield. Commercial air service operates to Albany and to Springfield-Westfield, and there is direct bus service to the concert grounds from all neighboring towns.

Tanglewood's first two Sunday-afternoon concerts, on July 13 and 20, will be given by skeleton orchestras of forty musicians. The regular week-end series begin on July 24, with three sets of programs scheduled for each Thursday evening, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon thereafter until August 10. Some 400 students who are studying at Tanglewood will present student-orchestra concerts, student operas, chamber music, and choral concerts. Tickets for the regular series are $6 for boxes, $4, $3, and $2.50 for other reserved seats. General admission is $2, and patrons are invited to bring blankets, beach chairs, and picnic baskets. Admission to student concerts is limited to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, which invites inquiries at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. All the concerts of the regular series will be performed by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky as director.

The first guest conductor in the history of the music festival will be Leonard Bernstein, who will appear on Sunday afternoon, July 27—a fact I thought interesting under the circumstances.

Del Vayo—Socialist Troubles

DURING three days in the second week of June the Socialist parties of Europe met at Zürich. Other bigger events—the Hungarian crisis, Secretary Marshall's Cambridge speech—made the conference pass almost unnoticed. Yet it was an important event revealing again the difficulties that obstruct the rebuilding of the Second International. Like the previous sessions at Clacton, Paris, and Bournemouth, the Zürich conference failed to find a solution. A new committee under French chairmanship was instructed to carry on the effort and maintain contact among the national parties. But the problems at issue were fully discussed, and the debate threw new light on the obstacles ahead.

The main one, of course, arises out of the difficult international situation. The continuing tension between Soviet Russia and the West has exercised its baneful influence on the Socialist parties more than on any other political group, creating such wide divisions as to leave little common ground on which an international organization could be set up. While eastern Socialists have tended to move nearer to Russia, in the degree to which the chance of an accord among the powers diminishes, Socialists in Western Europe have generally taken the contrary course. This obstacle to the re-establishment of the Second International would disappear as soon as relations between the three big powers improved. It may have been in the hope that ultimate reconciliation may be achieved next November at the Foreign Ministers' conference in London that the Socialists decided to hold their next meeting one month later, in Belgium.

Intimately dependent upon the course of Russian-Western relations is the other major problem with which the European parties have been wrestling since the end of the war: what principles should control Socialist policy toward the Communists? An intelligent previous report by Dennis Healey, secretary of the International Section of Transport House, recognized the special situation in which the Socialists of the Eastern European states find themselves. Unlike certain self-styled progressives who stamp as a Moscow tool any Socialist leader willing to work with the Communists, Mr. Healey emphasized the loyalty and wisdom of those eastern Socialists who, by adapting their policy to the situation existing in their countries, have maintained the parties and preserved a considerable measure of Socialist influence.

The problem is not one that affects Socialists in the eastern areas only. France has the same problem. So has Italy. And it presents more than one aspect. It is not merely the question of whether one wishes to collaborate with the Communists but of what are the alternatives to collaboration. British Laborites are here in an advantageous position. While in power they need not worry lest errors on their part give Conservatives or Liberals a chance to capture any considerable section of the party's membership—as, in France, the M. R. P. has captured from the Socialists considerable numbers of voters who oppose collaboration. Nor is there a threat from the far right such as De Gaulle's leadership offers the French Socialists. On the other hand, British Labor is secure against the left; the Communists so far provide no serious competition. At each convention the Labor Party promptly turns down the annual Communist request for affiliation and passes on to other subjects. In France the highly organized Communist Party, with 1,000,000 members and 5,000,000 votes, cannot be so lightly disposed of. On the contrary, the French Communists are in a position to capitalize on every Socialist slip, every sign of weakness. In these circumstances it is almost impossible to rebuild the Second International on the basis of a rigid position for or against collaboration that could be applied indiscriminately to all national sections.

The problem inevitably repeats itself inside each national party. The Italian Socialists split at the beginning of this year as a consequence of a long and bitter controversy over relations with the Communists. In France the party divided almost evenly in the National Council debate on Premier Ramadier's decision to govern without the Communist Party. Out of this dispute came the Executive Committee's dissolution of the Socialist Youth organization. During the Socialist commemorative celebration before the Mur des Fédérés the Socialist Youth had demonstrated against that decision, shouting: "Ramadier must go! Long live workers' unity!" The dissolution order followed. Thus another issue has arisen to plague the party convention in August.

The Socialist crisis which began soon after the Russian Revolution and dragged on through the inter-war years until the authority of the Second International was largely dissipated has been accentuated by the conflicts growing out of World War II. To the old subjects of controversy have been added new ones. There is, for instance, the dispute about the real substance of democracy. Here in America an oversimplified attitude dismisses as purely Communist any doubt about the effectiveness of pre-war types of democracy. In Europe some of the most learned and liberal Socialists are engaged in a continuing debate on the question of the various representative forms of government. There are some who even maintain that "direct democracy" as practiced by the Commune and the insurrectional sections of Paris seventy-six years ago was a more genuine expression of the will of the people than the parliamentary system. Socialists are also divided on wage and financial policy. Another controversial point is how to handle the new fascism, which, encouraged by Allied support of reactionary regimes on the Continent, is growing increasingly insolent and aggressive.

It is to be hoped that somehow the Socialist parties will succeed in overcoming their present difficulties. Europe needs them. There is a great mass of Socialist opinion, traditionally educated in freedom and radicalism, which does not fit in any other party. Its loss as an effective political force would be a great one, even for the Communists, although they often prefer to ignore this and do everything in their power to weaken the Socialist position. Only the reaction would benefit by their success.

Shifting the Tax Burden

THE tax bill which President Truman has successfully vetoed was planned by its Republican authors as a mere appetizer, something to keep the G. O. P. angels in a good humor until the main dish was served next year in time to stimulate campaign subscriptions. Several weeks ago the cooks began their preparations when Representative Knutson's Ways and Means Committee opened hearings on revision of the Internal Revenue Code. At the same time the committee summoned to its aid an allegedly bi-partisan group of advisers, heavily weighted with conservative business men, under the chairmanship of Roswell Magill, Columbia law professor and former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Despite this paraphernalia of careful inquiry there is some reason to suppose that leading Republicans on the committee have already made up their minds about the broad changes to be made in the tax system. In its Tax Report on June 11 the Wall Street Journal gave an interesting preview of fiscal events to come. The Republicans, it said, would not succeed in trimming federal expenditure this year to less than $34 billion, and further economies in the 1949 budget, which will precede the Presidential election, are not likely to be impressive, since "Republican leaders are already passing the word that they will be more generous next year in appropriating funds for reclamation projects and other domestic programs." The Wall Street Journal goes on to explain that this means budgets well in excess of $30 billion at least until June 30, 1949, and only modest margins for tax reduction, apart from that provided in the vetoed bill. Consequently "the emphasis in Congress is shifting from tax relief to tax-law revision, meaning redistribution of the tax burden."

The probable nature of that redistribution is indicated by the choice of Professor Magill to head the advisory committee, for he is well known as an advocate of excises and other indirect taxes. In the Tax Review of March, 1947, he set forth at some length his ideas on what to do about taxes. His major premise was that "since we believe in free enterprise, we must do all we can to make it work." What makes it work? "Essentially the driving force . . . of business management," answers the Professor, whose minor premise, therefore, is "that the tax system should be so drawn as to encourage and develop the incentives of American business men to produce and work." What will do this? More "take-home pay" for executives and investors. So, Professor Magill concludes, the first step in a sound tax program would be a sharp downward revision of surtax rates with a ceiling of 50 per cent on any income. A second necessary step, in order to encourage investment, would be the elimination of the present double taxation of that part of a corporation's income which is distributed in dividends.

Professor Magill believes that the budget can be trimmed farther than it has been but concedes that it will remain much higher than before the war. Hence there is need to compensate for the loss of revenue which his tax reforms produce. Formerly, he points out, the government drew most of its revenues from indirect taxes, but in recent years it has relied increasingly on income taxes. We should now, he considers, reverse this trend and "make use of the excises to meet a substantial share of the tremendous expenses we face."

The idea, in short, is to shift the tax burden from investment to consumption, from the high to the middle and low brackets, which will no doubt be consoled to know that in theory taxes on consumption make for more stable revenue. Supposedly, when national income nose-dives, the yield from income taxes drops much more steeply than that from excises and sales taxes. As Professor Magill explains: "People smoke and buy liquor and go to the movies in bad times as well as in good." Perhaps, but most people indulge in such luxuries very much less in bad times. And they certainly buy fewer automobiles, tires, radios, refrigerators, sporting goods, transport, and telephone calls—some of the goods and services on which excises are now levied.

Personally I am very skeptical about the theory that excise taxes would prove a stable source of revenue in the event of a sharp fall in national income. Our present system of excises has never been tested by a depression, and although it covers many things which are hardly luxuries, it also covers few that are absolute necessities. That is to say, it is based on articles for which the demand is fairly flexible. To make the system proof against depression it would be necessary to include within it the real essentials of life—basic food and clothing. A good stiff sales tax on bread, for instance, would be a very steady source of revenue under all conditions. It might even yield more in bad times, for then people eat more bread and less of the quality foods. A tax on milk would also help to fatten the Treasury. Alas for the tax reformers! The exclusion of staple food and clothing is, as the Wall Street Journal regretfully admits, "politically necessary."

It seems to me, therefore, that before the Republicans get very far with their current investigation they are going to find themselves in a three-pronged dilemma. If they want to use sales taxes as stabilizers of revenue, they must commit political suicide by levying them on basic necessities. If, on the other hand, they decide to cross the depression bridge when they come to it and concentrate on increasing excise revenue now so as to compensate for income-tax reductions, they will have to tax all currently untaxed articles, except food and clothing, very substantially in order to raise a billion or two extra. It is doubtful, in fact, if the 7½ to 10 per cent manufacturers' excise tax which Representative Gearhart of California is toying with would prove sufficient.

It would be high enough, however, to be very unpopular at a time when everyone is kicking at the price level, and might well cause a substantial shrinkage in demand. In that case the shifting of the tax burden from investment to consumption would result in conditions very discouraging to investment. Sometimes our tax "reformers" forget that an even more important incentive to producers than low taxes is an effective demand for the product.

BOOKS and the ARTS

AMERICAN AUTHORS' AUTHORITY—ROUND II

BY ANTHONY BOWER

THE plan for the establishment of an American Authors' Authority, brain-child of James M. Cain and the Screen Writers' Guild of Hollywood, which seemed to have been smothered by controversy a few months after its inception last July, has recently been revived. The Screen Writers' Guild has published a special supplement to the March number of its official magazine setting forth some of the arguments for and against the proposal to set up a central authority of which the four guilds of the Authors' League of America—the Screen Writers', the Dramatists', the Radio Writers', and the Authors'—would be member organizations, and to which authors would assign their copyrights with a view to facilitating bargaining for fairer practice in author-employer relations. The supplement contains a breezy foreword by Mr. Cain describing the "Tough Mug" whom he designates to captain the team of "ringers in the backfield"—"drop-kicking, forward-passing, swivel-hipping guy at quarterback" and "fast ends"—which constitutes his prospective leadership of the A. A. A.; among other items are the proposed Articles of Incorporation and the By-Laws, couched in legal terms and claiming to incorporate "modifications of the original proposal."

That the revised plan contains any modifications of or improvements over the original plan is vigorously denied by the American Writers' Association, a body formed under the presidency of Rupert Hughes specifically to combat the A. A. A. plan at the time of its launching. The American Writers' Association asserted then, and still asserts, that the A. A. A. would set up a control over authors similar to that exercised by Petrillo over the musicians of this country, that it threatens the writer's freedom of expression, that the revised plan gives the proposed authority "the same absolute power over the work of writers that was so dangerous in the first plan," and that it completely ignores the profound difference between the problems confronting screen writers and the problems faced by free-lance writers, poets, novelists, and textbook authors.

That there is a profound difference between these two categories of writers is very true. The screen writer, employed on a salary basis by a movie company, lives the uncomfortable life of a wage-earning Schéhérazade; moreover, his work automatically and by established custom becomes the property of the company as he writes it. The free-lance author deals with his publisher on very different terms. The usual contract—for an author whose popularity is not absolutely established—would give him an advance of between $500 and $1,500 against royalties of 10 per cent on the first 2,500 copies of the book sold (based on the retail price), 12½ per cent on the next 2,500 copies, and 15 per cent thereafter. This is standard practice and, in general, is considered fair. Practice in regard to subsidiary rights is, however, by no means standardized and very often not considered fair; it is in this field that the A. A. A. declares that the free-lance author is insufficiently protected and would benefit by the establishment of a centralized authority. Subsidiary rights are book-club, reprint, first-serial, second-serial, movie, radio, dramatic, foreign (British), and translation (foreign non-British) rights. The publisher usually retains a 50 per cent share of the book-club, reprint, and second-serial rights, and an interest, subject to negotiation, in the foreign and, if possible, the film rights. The rest of the subsidiary rights customarily remain with the author, but the contract varies according to the ability of the author's agent, the popularity of the author, and the disposition of the publisher.

No one denies that the author is sometimes the victim of sharp practice, particularly in the matter of subsidiary rights; the present professional organizations—the four guilds, the Authors' League, the American Pen Women, the A. W. A., and the prospective A. A. A.—are all in agreement on this point. But the A. A. A. contends that the present organizations have, in all the years of their existence, done too little to improve the situation in the matter of "the copyright laws, separation of rights, revision of tax laws, or protection of civil rights." The present copyright law is superannuated, dating from an era when movie and radio rights were undreamed of, and allowing an author no claim to his copyright until the publisher makes it for him—an act interpreted by some publishers as giving them a permanent interest in all rights stemming from the copyright. Conformity, and more liberality toward the author, in the matter of subsidiary rights is generally approved. The present tax laws are most certainly unfair to writers, and an author's civil rights, particularly in regard to prosecutions for indecency, are sometimes too feebly defended. All this is recognized more or less by both sides.

It is the method of approach which is the subject of contention. The established organizations and the A. W. A. want to leave things to time and to themselves. The A. A. A. wants to embark on an immediate crusade and to set about "belling cats," in the form of publishers, editors, and radio and movie companies, in short order. The means by which it proposes to do this are stated in two of the proposed Articles of Incorporation of the A. A. A. Paragraph 3 reads: "To hold in trust for the creators, the copyright, title, and all forms of interest and ownership in, literary properties of all kinds, and to assign, deal in, transfer, dispose of, license, lease, and grant interests and rights of all kinds in such properties." And Paragraph 4 reads: "To act as trustee, representative, or in any other capacity on behalf of creators of literary properties and owners of interests therein, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to take all lawful steps to preserve, enforce, and protect rights arising out of, or under, copyright, title, or other interests in literary contracts, give quittances and releases."

It is to these articles that the A. W. A. takes particular objection. It maintains that with the legal title to his work assigned to the A. A. A. the author would be completely at its mercy; it would be both a holding company and a closed shop, the owner of his property and the eventual dictator of his thoughts. Once the Authority had established its control over the literary market, which to be really effective it would have to do, it could easily dictate the moral and political content of the works it handles and successfully boycott any writer of whom it disapproved. By its very construction it could, and probably would, come under the control of a militant minority, and the freedom of the writer and his essential integrity as a creative being would be intolerably threatened.

Without doubt there are valid arguments on both sides. Publishing has become a vast commercial enterprise. Banks and stockholders demand a good return on their investments and dictate up to a point the policy of some houses, and the author is at times the victim of increasing commercialism. The Authors' League has been in existence for thirty-five years, and all abuses have not yet been righted. The A. A. A., if it were established, would undoubtedly start its career with vigor and redress some wrongs; later it might well become monopolistic and dictatorial. The remarkable part, however, of the whole controversy is the vituperative quality of the attack and counter-attack. The A. W. A. has said bluntly of the A. A. A., "It happens to be a notorious fact that those who hatched the plan and those most energetic in pushing it are of the pro-Communist persuasion." Mr. Cain is here excused ("It is only fair to say that Mr. Cain himself does not seem fully aware of the implications of the plan but to have been the carrier of other men's ideas"). Mr. Cain says of the opponents of his plan that though they might not compose "as one newspaper said, a fascist front, there was no getting away from it that some of its more vocal members had got themselves nice little

Stalag Luft

In the yard, by the house of boxes,
I lay in the ditch with my bow;
And the train's long mourning whistle
Wailed from the valley below
Till the sound of my rabbit gnawing
Was the grasses' tickling shadow,
And I lay dazed in my halo
Of sunlight, a napping echo.

I saw through rainbow lashes
The barred and melting gaze
Of my far-raiding captors.
(The dappled mustangs graze
By the quills of the milky leggings.)
After some feverish days
They smile, and the numbing laces
Are cut from my wrists with praise.

When I woke the rabbit was gnawing
His great, slow, ragged bites
From the wood of the wired-in hutches,
And dusk had grayed the white
Leghorns hunched on the roosts of their run.
The train mourned below
For the captives—a thinning echo. . . .
It all comes back to me now.

reputations over a period of some years as militant reactionaries, meaning stooges for corporate interests."

Among the calmer voices Louis Bromfield has said, in a letter published in the March Supplement of the Screen Writers' Guild Magazine, that he objects to the A. A. A. plan because he dislikes the idea of surrender of copyright by the author and because of the inherent possibility of boycott and control by the A. A. A., and Taylor Caldwell, in an interview in which she makes the rather surprising statement that "of course writers who are not best-sellers have nothing to worry about, so they can despise any sort of union of authors," comes out in full support of the Authority.

When even the ideological lines are none too clearly drawn—what with Upton Close and Dorothy Thompson in opposition to the plan and Taylor Caldwell, poor deluded Mr. Cain, and the crypto-commies in favor—how is the outsider to choose sides? To climb on the fence requires more effort than resting in statu quo, and for the line of least resistance there seems to be a valid argument. The present airing of grievances may provoke movie and radio companies and publishers to a general adoption of practices more favorable to authors; moreover, most authors are in the capable business hands of agents, and the victims among them are comparatively few. The A. W. A. seems to have proved that there is at least a slight danger that a central authority such as the A. A. A. might establish a monopolistic control over the output of authors, and though writers have survived through the ages the most drastic threats to their freedom, and though as Henry James remarked there is always "the periodical prattle about the future of fiction," still there is no point in self-inflicted coercion.

NOTES BY THE WAY

By MARGARET MARSHALL

SOME WEEKS AGO I reviewed "The Girl and the Ferryman" by Ernst Wiechert, an anti-Nazi German writer who stayed in the Third Reich and yet managed to survive honorably. The book seemed to me to be permeated by the elements we have come to think of as Germanic in the bad sense—crude mysticism of the earth-and-birth variety and an utter humorlessness—which bothered me until I found that it was an old novel published in 1932.

Now Greenberg: Publisher has brought out "Forest of the Dead" ($2.50), a new book by Wiechert, in which he gives an account, in the third person, of his quarrel with the Nazis and his sojourn in Buchenwald.

The name Wiechert assigns to his principal character is Johannes. The hero of Johannes was, and apparently still is, Martin Niemöller. When the pastor was taken, Johannes's dreams were haunted, and it was his obsession with Niemöller's fate that led him finally to write a letter to the branch office of the Nazi Party in his district, a letter in which he quoted the Führer of the Reich, no less, who had "dared to say: 'Justice must be justice, even for Germans.'" Johannes knew what must happen as a result of his act but was easier in his mind for having taken his stand. He quietly went about preparing for the ordeal, disturbed only by fears for his family and doubts of his capacity to resist his torturers. Soon afterward he started on his journey through hell.

After some preliminary stages he reached the Forest of Beeches. Buchenwald then was filled not with "foreign slaves" but with Germans who were opposed to the regime and whose fate was so persistently ignored by the world at large. Mass extermination had not yet begun, but cruelty in all its forms, both crude and subtle, held holiday in the dismal place—leaving its marks not only on the beaten bodies of the victims but even more vividly on the faces and bearing of the persecutors.

Johannes was maltreated less than many others, but his imagination and his sympathy for his fellow-prisoners caused him to suffer even the kicks and blows and indignities which he himself, by chance, did not incur.

That morning Johannes stepped out of the barracks to see the elegant physician busy throwing rocks in order to disperse the patients that had gathered. . . . When the yard was empty, he brushed off his gloves and said, "Cowardly mob!" and went back into the barracks. When he had disappeared inside, those who had fled came from behind the trees and took up their old places.

A stone in the back of the head could be fatal, and Johannes was present on one occasion when an old man was struck down and killed in this way. And there were other, equally haphazard ways. Death was truly a casualty in Buchenwald.

After several months Johannes's release came, unexpectedly and suddenly. "Everybody came and wished him luck. His heart was heavy as he looked into their silent eyes. No farewell anywhere hurts more than that from a concentration camp." And Johannes departed, but he carried with him a heavy burden.

The wounds Johannes bore were not merely his own, not only those of the thousands whom he would leave behind, nor even were they only those of his own people. All of humanity had been shamed here, and who could say that this was possible only with his own nation and the other "dictatorships"? Time had dug deep into the ground beneath the nations, and from the depths stinking springs had gushed forth. But no one knew how far they branched below the earth and what would be the fate of other people if their soil were drilled.

Wiechert tells his story in muted and rather pious terms—he is a devoutly religious man—but it is none the less impressive. One may feel that Johanes's admiration for Niemöller was misplaced and find his simple religious approach a bit archaic. But one can only have profound respect for his purity and integrity, his modesty and his courage. And in an age when that minute particular, the human individual, has all but disappeared from the calculations of those who rule and misrule the world, and always in his name, Wiechert's abiding respect for "God's image" is salutary.

Metaphysical or So

THE WELL-WROUGHT URN. By Cleanth Brooks. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.50.

MR. BROOKS'S new book on the well-made poem—his pleasant title is from Donne, naturally, but refers also to urns in Shakespeare, Gray, and Keats—comments at length on ten well-known English poems in terms of their structure, the key word being "paradox"; an eleventh chapter essays a theory of poetry; in appendices the author argues with other critics, and reprints the poems, except "Macbeth" and "The Rape of the Lock." He is reliably acute on Donne's "The Canonization," Herrick's "Corinna's going a-maying"; interesting in developments of Miss Spurgeon's discovery of the obsessive clothes imagery in "Macbeth"; very good on the light-dark symbolism in "L'Allegro—Il Penseroso," and on Yeats's "Among School Children," though "Her present image" unquestionably refers to an aged woman (the error produces a whole system of misunderstanding), and to dismiss the poet's doctrine of prenatal recollection as merely "fantastic" is fantastic. The same dismissal in part accounts for an unacceptable reading of Wordsworth's Ode, but other critical defects are responsible as well: a disbelief in the literal, and oversubtlety. For this last

Practical Psychiatry

(Between Mental Health and Mental Disease)

BY DR. B. LIBER

Adj. Professor of Psychiatry, Director of a Mental Hygiene Clinic

PRACTICAL PSYCHIATRY is a book on mental hygiene dealing with EVERYDAY difficulties of the average person rather than with rare or very abnormal cases. It deals with conditions which occur in all classes of society, among all sorts of people. There is hardly a family completely free from some mental trouble.

As a guide to mental health and psychic happiness, it helps the individual to solve his own and his family's problems and to adjust himself and others to surrounding circumstances and to society as a whole. In the first place it teaches where the trouble lies. It traces the growth of the mind from childhood through adolescence to maturity and discusses the question of SEX and MARRIAGE frankly.

With a minimum of theory and technical terminology and about 250 case histories as illustrations, all taken from the author's wide experience, this volume offers a practical and sensible approach to the almost normal and slightly abnormal or mildly unadjusted person seeking to correct the mental entanglements that confront him in this complex world.

PRACTICAL PSYCHIATRY is the pioneer book on the incipient or light mental cases or the transition cases between mental health and mental disease.

It is written for doctors and for intelligent laymen. Anyone who can read any book can read it with much profit.

It is recommended by reviewers and great authorities

New York World-Telegram: "A well-known physician tells how some of our most alarming anxieties and difficulties yield to mental hygiene."—The Philadelphia Inquirer: "Dr. Liber has performed a valuable service in giving the layman a means of intelligent understanding of mental health without tiring, scaring or boring the reader."—Medical Times: "The practical aspects are emphasized without delving into the controversial theoretical considerations or technical terminology. It is one of the best books the reviewer has seen for the intelligent layman in which common sense psychiatry is kept to the front."—Dr. Adolf Meyer, Dean of American psychiatrists says: "I like your direct common sense which gives valuable data to the reader."—Upson Sinclair: Out of your long experience you have offered your readers a great deal of common sense and advice."—The Atlanta Journal, N. Y. State Journal of Medicine, N. Y. Medical Week, The Daily Worker have also praised this book.—Etc., etc.

From the Newest Reviews:

The Deseret News, Salt Lake City (June 12, 1947): "This book is intended for the laity and, while avoiding technical discourse as much as a doctor can, it gives fascinating descriptions of the symptoms of oncoming troubles with analysis of results, prevention and treatment. And it provides the information in a lucid and authoritative manner."—Frank Winn. (This reviewer calls some of the stories "literature worthy of the classics" and about other parts he says, "they could be easily seized upon by some movie magazine desirous of making an authentic picture.")

The Sunday Mirror (New York, June 8, 1947): "When an expert like Dr. Liber writes a popularly slanted book 'Popular Psychiatry' and writes it so that the average paper-cover bookman can get plenty of help from it in matters sexual and mental, we give pause and thanks."—Charles A. Wagner.

Mr. Brooks apologizes so often that it seems unamiable to charge him with it, but there it is, and it corrupts also the accounts of the "Ode on a Grecian Urn" and "Tears, Idle Tears." But here one feels perhaps some failure of taste, as with eighteenth-century poetry. He does not recognize the Housman-like passion flickering in the opening stanzas and steady in the final stanzas of Gray's "Elegy" (for West's death, when he first began the poem, as well as for himself, the "Elegy" wants comparing with "Lycidas"); and his study of Pope is not likely to satisfy anyone familiar with the magical variety of Belinda's great poem—for instance, of the couplets where the rape occurs:

The Peer now spreads the glitt'ring
Porfex wide, T'inclose the Lock; now joins it, to divide. . . .
 The meeting Points the sacred Hair
 dissever
 From the fair Head, for ever and for ever!

The book contains admirable remarks and much truth, besides having the merit of directing attention to such poems. Taking a low view of its reader, however, it is perhaps good teaching rather than criticism; and its prose is troubling. Three points related to the analyses have general interest for even a brief review. Of Macbeth's speech about the grooms' daggers "unmannerly breech'd with gore," he stops a disparaging quotation from Abbott (p. 29) just short of the sentence in which Abbott, following Warburton and Johnson, explains what Mr. Brooks ignores, that "language so forced is only appropriate in the mouth of a conscious murderer dissembling guilt." Tennyson's ships in "Break, Break, Break" can seem "idle and finally irrelevant" only if in connection with the "vanished hand" of the next line their stateliness on their way "To their haven under the hill" has failed to produce in the critic the image of a funeral procession it recalled in the poet. And more talk about Keats's insistence on "Beauty is truth, truth beauty" was made unnecessary some ten years ago by H. St. Quentin's realization that "Ye" means not everybody-in-time-to-come but the figures on the urn (whose experience now is limited to the Beautiful as there depicted—whence "tease us out of thought," the line always ignored above); the aphorism alone should be in quotation marks as in Forman and De Selincourt, though regrettably not in Garrod's recent edition. Critics from Eliot on have wasted time largely over this.

Either I imperfectly understand Mr. Brooks's theory of poetry ("a structure of meanings, evaluations, and interpretations; and the principle of unity which informs it seems to be one of balancing and harmonizing connotations, attitudes, and meanings") or there is nothing very new about it. A poem, I take it, cannot contain one thing only: out of several things it makes its single effect. Some of these, we learn, are different from others. In the laboring of this, "paradox" behaves like an acrobat. I share Mr. Brooks's interest in the history of English poetry and his resistance to the critical relativists, but to pinch the diversity of observable phenomena into a single set of terms or insist on anything resembling a unanimity of style seems to me to be indiscreet, or worse. Worse, because it will blind you. Every man is entitled to insensitivities; but when, in one of his rare forays into the judicial, the critic writes of "More happy love! more happy, happy love!" "I am not sure that this stanza can altogether be defended. . . . There is a tendency to linger over the scene sentimentally: the repetition of the word happy is perhaps symptomatic of what is occurring," one wonders what he thinks of another line hitherto much and miserably admired: "Never, never, never, never, never." He writes, in fact, "The method of art can, I believe, never be direct—is always indirect." I wonder.

A HISTORY OF RUSSIA. By Sir Bernard Pares. Fifth Edition. Revised and Enlarged. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.
RUSSIA IN PERSPECTIVE. By George Soloveychnik. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

IF WE continue to misunderstand Russia it will not be the fault of the publishers. Here we have two additions to the spate of books designed to dispel our ignorance of that country by authors who may fairly be described as anti-Communist but pro-Russian. Both are historians, and both make the point that the policies of the Soviet government can be better explained by their examination in the light of Russian history and geography than by reference to the works of Marx and Lenin.

Sir Bernard Pares has given both heart and mind to Russia since he first went there in 1904. The period of revolution caused a painful separation, but once Stalin had consolidated his power and proved he was first and foremost a Russian patriot, reconciliation was achieved. Now Sir Bernard is probably as persona grata at the Kremlin as he once was at Tsarskoe Selo. Nevertheless, he is a candid friend who has plenty of harsh words for the purges and for the frequent brutalities of Soviet economic policy.

At the same time in an epilogue, which together with a chapter on "the second Fatherland War" forms the new material in this edition, he admits to "much general sympathy" with the broad aims of Soviet foreign policy. He regards it as unfortunate that "nearly all the sharpest debates in the U. N. are challenges to a Russian recovery of what she had before 1914 or to questions that are to be solved on her doorstep." That is to say, they are geographical rather than ideological challenges and appear to the Russians an effort to reimpose the cordon sanitaire. As such they will be strenuously resisted and, Sir Bernard suggests, could lead to a Russian-German combination that would be a deadly threat to the West. To avert that danger, he declares, we should try to understand the historical basis for Russia's policies and concede to it the equality of treatment to which it is entitled by its power and achievements. That done, the Soviet Union would be likely to concentrate on peaceful internal development and the ghost of world revolution would be laid.

The author of "Russia in Perspective" makes much the same point. Mr. Soloveychnik, who fled from the red terror as a young man and is now a British subject, urges us to remember that "despite all possible relapses into Communist technique and phraseology, Russian history has resumed its course and that the world is once more dealing, not with a synthetic revolutionary body, but with the eternal Russia." To support this thesis he gives us an impressionistic sketch of Russian history which stresses the continuity between the old Russia and the new. Like the most modern school of Soviet historians he sees a clear line from Vladimir Monomakh, Grand Prince of Kiev Russia, through the Terrible and Peter the Great, Generalissimo Stalin.

All the same, fellow-travelers will not like this book, for although it aches many of their conclusions, it states facts and arguments that sentimental devotees of the U. S. S. R. will find highly embarrassing. Mr. Solovetchnik sees the last thirty years in Russia, not as a glorious advance toward socialist democracy, but as a bloody retreat from fantastic utopianism to a more or less normal system of autocracy. We need no longer fear "militant communism," he assures us: "There is a new Soviet istocracy today, and it does not differ greatly from any other privileged class in its formative period."

While I believe this statement has a large element of truth, I do not find it particularly reassuring. Nor am I happy to be told that the Soviet state of today presents a synthesis of nationalist traditions and revolutionary impulses. That is a very explosive mixture, as Napoleon once proved.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Memorandum

REFUGEES IN AMERICA. By Maurice R. Davie. Harper and Brothers. $4.50.

REPRESENTATIVE Frank W. Fellows of Maine is a man with a grievance. As chairman of the House subcommittee on immigration and naturalization, he told the New York Times recently, he has been receiving vast quantities of mail from all parts of the country urging favorable action on all to ease our immigration restrictions in favor of D. P.'s in Europe. Mr. Fellows described it as "tremendous pressure of the type I don't like." I wish he'd gone on to specify what type of tremendous pressure he did like; nevertheless, because I had some experience during the war in handling government paper in Washington, I sympathize with the Representative from Maine and his hard-pressed staff, which is having to spend its time toting bags of telegrams and letters instead of thinking. It occurs to me, therefore, that it might be helpful if I cast my review of "Refugees in America," a report on the most authoritative and thorough investigation we have had on this subject, in the form of a memorandum which the subcommittee might use. I don't know whether Mr. Fellows likes this "type," either, but at least I'm sure that he and his fellow-committeemen have long ago grown accustomed to it:

SUBJECT: Book on Immigration

To: Representative Frank Fellows,

Chairman, Immigration and Naturalization Subcommittee, Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives.

1. Attention is directed to the recent publication of "Refugees in America," a book of 453 pages (including an index and some pages of photographs, together with appendices), study of which, it is believed, may prove relevant to the work of the addressed subcommittee.

Publisher is Harper and Brothers, which careful investigation discloses to be an old-established firm in New York City, with no known Communist, leftist, or prematurely anti-fascist connections (though it appears to have foreign ties in the form of an office in London, England).

Book is the final report of the Committee for the Study of Recent Immigration, a private body sponsored by various social-service organizations: American Christian Committee for Refugees, American Friends' Service Committee, Catholic Committee for Refugees, United States Committee for European Children, National Refugee Service. Note should be taken of the fact that the organizations cited represent various religious denominations. It is feared, also, that they do not fall into the category of leftist or Communist organizations, though they are thought to have displayed evidences of excessive activity on behalf of anti-Hitler, anti-Franco, and anti-Mussolini refugees before the United States entered the war. Furthermore, Catholics are known to have international connections, whereas the Friends (also known as Quakers) are pacifists, and it is considered possible that the names of the organizations may hide Jewish participation.

Author of the book is Maurice R. Davie, director of the research staff of the aforementioned Committee for the Study of Recent Immigration, and chairman of the Department of Sociology of Yale University, an institution located at New Haven, Connecticut.

2. The Committee for the Study of Recent Immigration from Europe, the introduction to the book declares, was established to conduct inquiry into numbers of refugees admitted since 1933, their countries of origin, religious affiliations, professions or occupations, effects in the United States socially and economically, assimilation of same into the American population, etc., etc. The committee states it believes "little reliable information is available on this subject, while rumors and misconceptions are widespread." Information was obtained through the use of questionnaires distributed by local community organizations, from personal interviews, and from refugee organizations. Method of presentation was discovered by undersigned to be factual and statistical, with quotations from statements by refugees documenting conclusions reached by the author. No overt editorializing or dependence on mass emotional appeal was found.

3. Book professes to show that many incorrect ideas are entertained by general American public on the subject of refugees. It is suggested that the most important of these may be that pertaining to jobs: book states that refugees have not taken away jobs from native-born Americans but that in many cases they have even established new industries providing employment for native-born whites. Book also argues that despite war-time shortage of physicians it was very difficult for qualified European physicians to practice as a result of what are termed "discriminatory" state laws and the attitude of medical associations.

4. Book quotes a number of refugees to the effect that they found disheartening amount of discrimination here against minorities, and it is stated that many non-Jewish refugees were surprised to find that as refugees they were popularly assumed to be Jewish, and hence refused admission, on occasion, to hotels, etc. (Some of the evidence in this connection comes from writers, painters, and the like, and can therefore, it is thought, be ignored.) Most refugees have nevertheless, according to book, managed to establish themselves socially and intend to stay in our country. It is significant that a large number have already become citizens.

5. It is earnestly recommended that the chairman authorize the purchase of a quantity of copies of book sufficient to permit distribution to all members of the subcommittee. The early chapters, summarizing conditions in Europe which led to the flight of the refugees, are alone believed worth the price ($4.50) as a handy reference to largely forgotten pre-war conditions; it is true that this aspect of the immigration question has thus far been avoided in the deliberations of the subcommittee, but it is known that certain organizations—many of them undoubtedly subversive, left Communist, or humanitarian—hope to inject it into hearings on modification of restrictions on the entry of so-called displaced persons into the United States as requested by the Executive.

6. It is further recommended that the staff of the subcommittee be instructed to begin work without delay on refutation of statements set forth in book, to take steps to restrict circulation of same, since it appears to give substance to charges that the subcommittee is blameworthy in its refusal to revoke quota restrictions on immigration in view of conditions in Europe, a continent which lies on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean.

JEAN VIGO'S "Zero de Conduite" and "L'Atalante" are being shown for the first time in this country, at the Fifth Avenue Playhouse. Reviewing space is unavailable until next week. Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

READER has written me a report on some of the addresses at the Harvard Symposium on Music Criticism which no texts or summaries were read. One is Professor Lang's, which affirms my surmise that he had had no idea of what Forster was talking about. Lang began with the statement that music criticism is an art, not a science, and a critic must convey an illusion of life in the music and the love he has for it—an obvious bow to Forster. Then, in logical sequence, our critics are therefore bad because they were not musicians, they couldn't read score, they couldn't even play the piano, they didn't know the literature of music or about music: for instance a music critic in New York who spent most of his time railing at music scholars had only a few weeks earlier discovered the famous de la Laurencie, an important French music scholar whom everybody knows; and he hadn't discovered him for himself, but through a correspondent. And my reader comments: "Doubtless his inaccuracy about the whole musical scene is as scandalous as his misreading of your article."

The report is interesting in a number of ways. For one thing, it reveals how Lang's inaccuracy enables him to escape the impact of a demonstration that in answering a piece of writing by Ernest Newman he suppressed the essential part and misrepresented the rest or that his article on nineteenth-century chamber music in a New Friends booklet was a schematization of imagined data. That may sound as though I consider all this inaccuracy conscious; but the report on his Harvard address convinces me that it isn't. The man who just elicits and then misreads those demonstrations is the man who—addressing an audience which includes the distinguished critic who is a composer and presumably able to read score as well as write it, and a number of distinguished critics with professional musical education and the ability to read score and play the piano—nevertheless hurls forth his charges that the critics are bad because they are not musicians, can't read score, can't play the piano. He is, also, the man who takes it, in these charges, from a statement about the critic's function being to convey an illusion of the life in a piece of music. He is, in short, a man with a muddled mind. A man with a muddled, inaccurate mind whose job at a great university is to teach students in musico-historical research rigor and accuracy.

Two choral works commissioned for first performance at the Harvard Symposium were repeated in New York by Robert Shaw's Collegiate Chorale at its Carnegie Hall concert. They were Hindemith's "Apparebit Repentina Dies," a setting of a Latin hymn of the fourth to seventh centuries, and Copland's "In the Beginning," a setting of the verses of Genesis which tell the story of the creation. In the Hindemith work I found the recitative of the Judge and the judged expressively effective and moving; but the rest, for me, had no expressive power or interest to make its elaborately contrived ugliness worth listening to. As for the Copland work, I find the word "lovely" written in my program next to "And on the seventh day God ended His work" and "And God blessed the seventh day," but "nonsense for mezzo-soprano" written next to "These are the generations of the heavens"; and about the rest I recall the complete arbitrariness of the melody's progressions—the way it went now up now down with no discoverable reason either in any coherence of its own or in any relation to the words.

Giving both these works before Mozart's great Mass in C minor brought the length of the concert to almost two and a half hours—which meant that I was too tired to hear some of the music I cared most about. Beautiful performances, but poor program-making.

Columbia offers excerpts from Adam's music for the ballet "Giselle" performed adequately by Constant Lambert with the Covent Garden Opera Orchestra (Set X-277; $3). The recorded sound is heavy, and gets muddy and gritty near the ends of the sides. Also, excerpts from Menotti's music for the ballet "Sebastian" are well performed by Mitropoulos with the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra of Philadelphia (Set X-278; $3). The recorded sound is good, with the violins clear, though not lustrous. And on a single disc (71968-D; $1) are two inconsequential piano pieces, Beethoven's Polonaise Opus 89 and Mendelssohn's Scherzo a Capriccio in F sharp minor, well played by Kilenyi, with the recorded sound dull and wooden.

Just for the Record

Dear Sirs: Mr. Mezerik's article, Under the Sign of the Flying Red Horse (in The Nation, May 3), is a crackerjack. I am particularly impressed by the skill by which he was able to suggest the political atmosphere of present-day Texas without using any offensively direct characterizations.

The only inaccuracy I noticed occurs in the third paragraph on page 510, where he says, "The regents set up an inquisition. . . . The Regulars . . . obtained an investigation by the state senate . . . to whitewash. . . ."

As it happened, that committee had been set up for other purposes by the previous legislature, then adjourned. It was definitely sympathetic to Rainey. The lieutenant governor, John Lee Smith, a fascist out-and-out, did all he could to prevent the committee from acting, even to threatening its members with loss of committee appointments. But the committee appealed to the attorney general for clarification of jurisdiction, got a favorable decision, and proceeded. The Bullington testimony was not sought by the committee but forced on it by Bullington. Indeed, when Bullington had finished the long harangue on the subject of Rainey's alleged dereliction in the homosexual matter, Senator Wardlow Lane, who was doing the questioning, inquired sweetly, "Do you have any more dirt you would care to spread on the record, Mr. Bullington?" The whole committee record was so favorable to the Rainey cause that it was buried—has never been published or, so far as I know, transcribed from the stenotype script. This, of course, was the work not of the committee but of the lieutenant governor and the next legislature.

Lone Star Liberals

Dear Sirs: There are a few cheering exceptions to A. G. Mezerik's generally accurate characterization of Texas newspapers (in The Nation, May 3). A small but growing number of Texas people are being reached by honest, liberal weeklies. Several returned veterans have bought or started small-town weeklies which will immunize their readers against N. A. M. handouts. The unpretentious State Observer, founded in 1906, every week sends out a vigorous and accurate account of what goes on in the state capital.

The Texas Spectator is devastatingly and impudently critical of the boys that own Texas. A city editor and an expert reporter on a large Houston daily resigned good jobs to found it in October, 1945. While using up the stake of their original backer, they gained two thousand subscribers loyal and enthusiastic enough to raise more than $8,000 to see the paper through its second year. The fund came largely in small amounts from liberals who could hardly pay the $5 subscription price.

The Senate investigation of Rainey's dismissal was not obtained by the Regulars. Through their spokesman, Lieutenant Governor Smith, they did their utmost to prevent it. It followed Bullington's sensational press release about the homosexuals and gave Dr. Rainey his only opportunity to offer testimony from responsible officials praising his handling of the matter. In general, the testimony was so damaging to the regents' position that they prevented the publication of the record. At the next election they saw to it that Penrose Metcalfe, chairman of the committee, was ousted from the state senate.

It is not surprising that Mr. Mezerik's information about the investigation was inaccurate: the record is not available. Under the Sign of the Flying Red Horse is a brilliant account of what goes on in Texas. JACK CARTER

Beloved Gentleman

[We have refrained from making any editorial changes in this letter lest we be accused of distorting the writer's meaning.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Dear Sirs: In the edition of your weekly magazine, Vol. 164, Num. 19 of May 10, 1947, appeared an article entitled Election Day in Santo Domingo by Albert C. Hicks, who is the same bitter writer of the loathsome book "Blood in the Streets," which the American public rejected because of its untruthfulness.

Mr. Hicks has proved by his attitude to be an evil-disposed writer attacking offensively and systematically the Honorable President of the Dominican Republic, Generalissimo Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina, whether by books or articles in newspapers and magazines with insults and indignities, which only prove his ostensible irritation against him and when a man reach this ground is because undoubtedly he does not have nobler arms to use and necessarily has to receive the contempt of the rest of the public because he is judged as not having any of the qualities of a gentleman.

It is very easy to put in evidence that Mr. Hicks who boast so much of infamy paying a visit to my country, only a few hours from Florida by air. I extend cordial invitation to any newspaperman who might be interested in knowing the exact truth, to visit the Dominican Republic, where a solid and lasting peace is enjoyed and where a progress never dreamt of in its history, has been achieved. Generalissimo Trujillo was elected on May 16, 1947, President of the Dominican Republic, term 1947-1952, by an overwhelming majority never registered in any other election and is very beloved by his people. He gratefully return in this way everything he has done for them.

The truth of all this can be easily verified, as I said before, paying a visit to my country, the Dominican Republic.

The Whitewash Won't Stick

Dear Sirs: El Consulado General understandably disturbed by my article which appeared in The Nation's May issue. His is a difficult task, slapping whitewash on such a black background.

Señor Compres Perez says that Trujillo, in the alleged elections of May won "by an overwhelming majority never registered in any other election. He knows better. Trujillo in previous elections won by a unanimous vote. In May, with a shabby display of pseudo democracy, Trujillo had 40,000 votes registered against him out of announced total of more than 800,000 votes, or approximately half of the tire population.

I predicted in my article that after elections, should the Dominicans "encourage to exhibit their distrust for the regime, the Benefactor would be prepared for any emergency." To there has appeared in several New York newspapers, under a P. R. dateline
